fand foot all choife foldiers. And now hearing that he was come into Epirus, and incampedin c Scanderberg his Valchaal, tent out three espials to discouer in what order he lay: one of which spies was Bala. banus his ktofman (but not fo knowne to Scanderbeg) by whose persuasion the other two when they had taken ful view of Balabanus his army, and should have returned to Scanderbeg to have given intelligence of that they had seene, like false traitors went over to Balabanus, and disco. ucred vinto him all that they knew concerning Scanderbeg: hoping thereby to receive some gic at reward, as their fellow had before borne them in hand. Scanderbeg maruelling that hisef. pials returned not againe as they were appointed, and doubting that they had bin by theene. my intercepted, and vling many times in matters of fuch importance to trust himselfebelt. presently went out with fine lusty soldiers, and rid forth to discouer the maner of the enemies lying Balabanus like a crafty fox, mistrusting that Scanderbeg deceived of his first spies would H for like purpose send forth others, laied certain horsmen in secret ambush in divers places to intercept them if it were possible. These horsmen lay not so couert, but that they were in good time descried by Scanderbeg and his followers (who with Argus eies, pried into every bush and thicket as they went) before he was altogether fallen into their danger : and yet but fo that he came to handy stroks, where Scanderbee and his followers oppressed with multitude, were glad to fly as fast as they could into the next wood, the Turks horsmen following them at the heels. It fortuned that as they were flying, a great old tree was fallen croffe the way, which Scandering putting spurs to his horse, leapt ouer with one of his men after him; the other source nor able to get ouer, turned backe upon the Turks, and there fighting were flaine. One of the Turks which so hardly pursued Scanderbeg being wel mounted, forced his horse to leape the tree, and fill followed after Scanderbeg; who looking backe and feeing but one, turned you him and flew him : the other Turks having flaine foure of Scanderbegs men which could not get ouer the tree returned. And Scanderbeg accompanied but with one of his followers, came backe a. gaine to his campe; and there with all speed put his army in readinesse to go against Balabanus before the comming of his companion, with the other part of his army. Voon which refolution, after he had with cheerfull perfuations encouraged his fouldiers, and filled their minds with hope of victory, he fet forward, and came with great freed vnto the valley of Valchaal where Balabanus lay, Scanderbee had divided his army into foure squadrons; whereof Tanusiu had the leading of one, Zacharias Groppa of another, the third was committed to Pcieus Emanu. el and Scander beg himselfe conducted the fourth. So setting forward, he fent before certaine K companies of harquebusiers, and archers, to proube the enemy and to draw him forth vito battel, Balabanus also shewed himself with his army in seemly order before his tents, but there Rood fast and would not stir, expecting continually the comming of his fellow. Which Scanderbee perceiving, and that he fought but todally out the time, and as one vnwilling to fight had againe retired his army into the fafety of his trenches; drew neerer and neerer vnto him, continually skirmi (hing with fuch as he fent out, daring him to the field, & brauing himvato his trenches, in such sort, as if he would have forced the same, and by strong hand have fet him out thence; wherat the Turks fretted and chafed exceedingly informuch that they were ready to rise against their Generall, because he would not lead them forth to battell, but suffer them to be so diffgraced. Balabanus mindfull of that he had promifed to Mahomet his great lord and L master, did what he might to have deferred time; but when he saw that his fellow camenos, and that he could no longer delay the matter being fo continually affailed & braued by Scan derbegs fouldiers, that his Turks therewith prouoked, were ready oftentimes to have issued out without his direction, and now no remedy but that he must needs fight, placed his men in good order, and so went out of his trenches to give battell, himselfe leading the left wing thereof: where betwixt him and Scanderbeg was made a fierce fight, many falling on both fides. But Scanderbeg firengthned with the old garifon of Croia, and the most expert soldiers of Dibra, prevailed upon the Turks & forced them to give ground, yet still keeping their order. The fight was fo great in this part of the battell, that in other places they flood almost still as 100kers on, expecting the doubtful fortune of their Generals which thing Scanderbeg perceiting, M drew certaine troups out of the right wing, whereas he faw was least danger, which speedily fetching a compasse about, charged the side of the enemies army; and againe withdrawing themselues, and with wonderfull celerity wheeling about, set vpon the backe of them that fought in the left wing: fo that the Turks there fiercely charged both before and behind, by

A them of Scanderbeg his army, fell in other places with a great flaughter. Balabanus with exceeding courage gainstood his enemies, so long as there was any hope left : but when he saw the fortune of Scanderbeg to prevaile, and all about him to become desperat, he made shift for himselfe, and fled out of the battell as fast as he could. The rest of the army being in other places before troubled and difordred, fled allo, fome one way, fome another, every man as his fortune led him. Some few that followed Balabanus escaped: the rest were for most part either flaine or taken prisoners.

Scanderbee had scarcely well breathed himselfe after this victory, and divided the spoyle among it his fouldiers, but that newes was brought to him in Post from the lady Mamiza his fister, then lying at Petrella, That Iacuppe Arnauth was by the way of Belgrade come into Epi-B rus with an army of fixteene thousand horsemen, burning and destroying the country before him, and then lay incamped in the plaines of Tyranna the leffe. When Scanderbeg to prote the minds of his fouldiers, had cheerefully imparted vnto them fuch newes, as was like to be the beginning of new labour and perill; they were therewith nothing difinaled, but ready to follow him with fuch cheerefulnesse of countenance and mind, as if they should have gone to some great feast or banquet; reckoning of them, but as of the remnant of a discomfitted army. This cheerefulnesse of his fouldiers, Scanderbeg tooke as an affured token of his good successe; and having all things in readinesse, presently set forward, and in short time came to the place where the enemy lay. Iacuppe hearing of his comming, removed his campe into a corner of the plaine Tyranna, necre vnto a little hill, as a place of more fafety for his army to lie in. C Scanderbee having taken the Plaine, incamped his army in the same place from whence lacuppe was but a little before departed, where he rested one whole day. The next morning, to terrific his enemies (who as yet had not heard of the ouerthrow of Balabanus) he caused divers of the Turks heads which were flaine in the late battell (which he had brought for that purpose) to be cast before the trenches of the enemy; and withall, divers of them which were taken prisoners, to be showne: which lacuppe beholding, in great despaire faid, I see the euill hap of Mahames. Immediatly after, Scanderbeg fent forth 500 horsemen to skirmish with the Turks, commanding them, so soone as they were charged by the enemies to retire, if haply they might so be drawne into battell. Which fell out accordingly: for Iacuppe now seeing his fellow was not to be looked for, and willing also without further delay to try his fortune, came D readily into the field, and began a fierce battell : which endured not long; for Scanderbeg perceiuing in what part of the army lacuppe was, bent his greatest force that way, and fingling him out, with his owne hand flew him. Wherewith the Turks being discouraged, forthwith Jacuspe staine him out, with his owne hand flew him. Wherewith the Turks being ancouraged, forthwith by scandible, betooke themselves to flight, and in flying, were for most part slaine or taken. Those which and his army escaped the present sury of the sword, stragling thorow the country by thicke woods and blind discomfitted. waies, were by the country people either staine or taken prisoners. In these two battels were flaine of the Turks 24000, and 6000 taken. And of Scanderbeg his men were loft about a thousand. Scanderbeg and his foldiers were so weary of the slaughter of the Turks, that when it was told him the next day, That Balabansu was fled but with one corner of horiemen, and might easily be surprised if he were well pursued; he said, O let some of our enemies live to report E their owne flaughter, and our victory. After that Scanderbeg had in this fort vanquished these great captaines, he presently entred into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, and roaming vp and downe at his pleasure without resistance, made hastocke of all that came in his way: and after returning to Croia with victory, brake up his army, and gaue his foldiers leave to depart euery man to his owne dwelling.

Whilest these things were in doing, Mahomet had with great rewards procured two Turks 1465 to undertake to kill Scanderbeg. These traitors came unto Scanderbeg as sugitives, making such thew of the detestation both of Mahomet his tyrannicall government, and vaine superstition, that they were both of Scanderbez and others, reputed to be indeed the men, they defired to be accounted and so after they had learned the principles of the Christian religion, were by F their owne desire baptised. But treason against Princes whom God hath in his most mighty protection, cannot be long couered; much leffe, without his great sufferance performed. So fortuned it, that these two salse dissembling traitors, expecting nothing but opportunity to performe their diuelish deuice, vpon some occasion sell at variance betwirt themselses, and in their heat let some such words fall, as being taken op by some there present, drew them both onto suspition; and thereupon being streitly examined, it was at last by them confessed, That co they were fent by Mahomet, of purpose to have slaine Scanderbeg : for which their treason they seere both prefently executed; as they had right well deferued. When Makomer understood at Balabanes was ouercome, lacup flaine, and both their armies almost quite destroyed, heaf ter his impatient manner fell into a great rage, and became as a man almost franticke : and af revards calling together his great Baffa's, refolued by their aduice, not to fend any more Ge als against Scanderbeg, but to go himselfe in person, with such an army as should at once make an end of his wars in Epirus for euer. Hereupon commissions were directed thorowall his kingdome, and an army raised of two hundred thousand men. Whereof Scanderbeg having certaine aduertisements, fortified all his cities and strong holds, especially the city of Crois: you the fortune whereof depended the whole state of his kingdome. Into this city he puta H firong garrison of his most valiant and faithfull soldiers, and thorowly furnishe the same with all things necessary for the enduring of a long siege : and left one Balthazar Perduci (agrave and worthy captaine) Gouernour thereof. With like care he prouided for the safety of his other cities, and tooke order that the country people were either received into the firens towns or elfe connected into other places of refuge, and left nothing abroad in the country for the Turks to prey vpour, as he had in like case done long before, at the comming of old Anu. rath to the fiege of Crois, as is before in his life declared.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fet all things in order, his old friend Balabanus with foure. score thousand horsemen (the forerunners of Mahomet his army) was entred into Epirus. and ranging over the country two daies, came and fate downe before Croia: vpon whom the Mehantt com- Gouernor at his first comming made many braue sallies. In few daies after came Mahants with his huge army, and there incamped also: who at his first comming summoned thecity, requiring to have it delivered vnto him, vpon such vnreasonable conditions as it pleased himfelie, (as the manner of the Turke is:) whereunto the worthy Gouernor returned him no other answer, than by continuall thundring shot into his campe. Whereupon Mahomet caused such ordnance as he had to be planted for battery; and commanded other new to be cast, of such mettall as he had for that purpose brought in masseall which, he did rather to strike a terrour into the minds of the defendants, than for any great hope he had of taking the city by forces knowing by his owne experience, that it was a place almost impregnable. Whilest Mahomet was thus bufied, and little or nothing prevailed, Scanderbeg lying abroad in the woods and I mountains, with a small army of most valiant and couragious soldiers, continually cut of the forragers of Mahomets army, and fuch as brought in victuall or necessaries for his campe: and many times in the night suddenly brake into one quarter or other of the Turks great campe, with great flaughter, and with continual lalarmes never suffered them to rest in quiet. Mahomet feeing his army to decrease dayly, and no hope of winning the city but by famine, which would require a long fiege: and fearing also to make that same place againe samous by some notable mischance which might happen unto himselfe under the wals of Croia, as had before vnto his father Amurath; determined to returne himselfe to Constantinople, and to leave Ballbanus with a great part of his army to continue the fiege. Vpon which determination, he committed the charge and ordering of the whole matter for the continuing of the siege, to Balaba. L mus, joyning vnto him eight of his most expert captaines; yet so, as that they should be all at Balabanus his command. And so leaving with him three and twenty thousand of his best souldiers, and with euery one of the other eight Captaines seuen thousand mo, departed himselse with the rest of his army from Croia, towards Constantinople. But by the way as he went be tooke from Scanderbeg certaine small forts, and with faire promises corrupting the Gouernor of a place called Chidna, wherein eight thousand of Scanderbee his soldiers lay, had the same deliuered into his power, vpon his faith before given, That all the foldiers with the rest of the people should in safety depart thence. But after the tyrant had them in his power, without regard of faith or promise, he caused them all most cruelly to be cut in pieces, sparing neither man, woman, nor child, to the great griefe and weakning of Scanderbeg, who had not at any time before receiued fo great a losse. And after he had so raged, he in great melancholy return ned vnto Constantinople.

Scandarbeg disdaining to have his chiefecity besieged by Balabanus, (sometime one of the basest of his sathers subjects) and yet finding himselfe vnable to relieue the same, for as much A as the fouldiers were with continuall wars fore wasted, and his wary enemies lay so encamped, as that they were not but by a strong army to be remoued, sent unto the Venetians and other the consederat princes of Albania, Illyria, and Dalmatia, praying of them aid now at his need against that enemy, which premailing against him, would forthwith set vpon them. All which princes promifed forthwith to fend their fuccours. At the same time also he passed ouer into Italy fecretly, and difguised in simple attite, came to Rome, to crave aid of Paulus the second of that name, then great Bishop: by whom he was honourably entertained, but obtained nothing of that he came for; focold was his denotion: onely at his departure he gaue vnto Innetrio, Scanderbeg his treasurer, a poore almes of three thousand duckats.

Scanderbeg returning into Epirus, found all fuch aid ready as was promised from the conse-B derat Princes, but especially from the Venetians, which was for most part drawne out of their garrisons of Scutari, Driuasto, Alyssa, and Dirrachium: so that he had in few daies in his army thirteene thousand source hundred choice souldiers. With this strength he marched towards Croia: but vnderstanding by the way, that lonima was within a daies journy, comming with a new supply to his brother Balabanus, he drew out certaine troups of his best horsemen; and coasting ouer the country in the night, suddenly came vpon the Turks, and put them to flight: where among it others, Ionima himselfe, with his sonne Hedar, were taken prisoners; Scanderbeg whom he shewed the next day in bonds to Balabanus. This exploit so happily performed, he surrect blood with all speed returned to his army; and so marching to Crois by plaine force day. with all speed returned to his army: and so marching to Croia, by plaine force draue the of Bardbanu, Turks from the mountaine Cruina, their greatest strength, and neerest to the city of Croia. and Hedar ble some. C Which thing when Balabanus faw, he with certaine troups of horsemen rid euen to the gates fonne. of the city, persuading the desendants to yeeld the city, making them in the name of his ma-fter fuch offers and promises as he thought might most moue them. But they nothing regarding his words, but rather infenced with his prefumption, fallied out vpon him, and inforced him to retire but he therewith enraged, and halfe mad for anger, came vpon them with a fresh charge, thinking by plaine force to hauedriuen them backe into the city. Inwhich skirmish he was by one Georgius Alexius, with a bullet, thot quite thorow the throat; and feeling himfelfe mortally wounded, letting spurres to his horse, ran as fast as he could to his campe, where he presently sell downe from his horse and died. The Turks discouraged with the death of their General, & the comming of Scanderbeg, role the same night, & with great silence retired D themselues vnto the plain of Tiranna, about eight miles from Croia. Scanderbeg the next morning entring the forfaken tents of the Turks, found theringreat store of corne and other vicuals, which he caused to be forthwith conneied into the city, & in triumph followed after himfelfe, to the great joy and comfort of his late belieged subjects: whom he highly commended for their fidelity, and bountifully rewarded according to their deferts. The same day he fent certaine companies of fouldiers to take the streit passages whereby the Turks must needs passe in their returne out of Epirus; which when the Turks understood, they sent two messengers to Scanderbeg (who seemed to be men of good account in the army) offering in the name of the rest of the captaines and commanders, to deliuer vnto him their horses and armes, so that they might in fafety depart with their lines. Which their request Scanderbeg propoun-

E ding to his counsallors & captains, was by them diversly difgested. In conclusion they receiued this answer from Scanderbeg himselfe, That as they came into his country, without his commandment, so should they not by his leave depart thence. The Turks receiving this short answer by their messengers, & considering that they must needs in that bare country in short time perish, either with famin or with the sword; the same night departed from Tiranna, and in the dead time of the night entring the aforefaid fireits, by plain force desperatly brake thorow and escaped, but not without their great losse: for whose escape the common souldiers murmured grieuously against Scanderbeg, and were not without much ado appealed. In short time after, Scanderbeg recouered all such places as Mahamet had before taken from him, and put to sword the foldiers he had left for the keeping of the same : which done, he brake up his ar-

F my, retaining only two thousand horsmen & a thousand foot for the defence of his frontiers. The Turkish tyrant hearing of the euil successe of his affaires in Epirus, as that his Generall 1466 was flaine, Croia relieued, his army discomsited, and all that he had done, brought to nought, fretted thereat exceedingly, and was therewith fo much grieued, that he could not for a feafon eat or drink, or take rest, his discontented thoughts so much troubled him. In the end, to remedy the matter, he resolued the next Spring to go again in person himselfe with a most puissant G army into Epirus; and fo if it were possible, to make a full conquest thereof: of which his pur. pole Scanderbeg vinderstanding, prouided for his comming, as he had in former time. The Spring being come, Mahemet according to his former resolution, with a mighty army entred opring octing conte, reserved in the second into Epirus, and there with exceeding labour and charge, first repaired or rather re-edified the old ruines of the city of Valmes, wherein he left a strong garrison, of purpose to trouble that part of the country. From thence he marched to Dirrachium (now called Durazzo, but of old time Epidamnum) a city vpon the sea coast, then in the possession of the Venetians, famous for many things in the time of the Roman Empire, but especially for the flight of the Roman Senat thither, and their entertainment there in the time of the civil wars betwirt Cafar and Pom. peins. This city Mahomet thought to have taken unprovided, & fo vpon the sudden to have car. H ried it; but was therein much deceived, finding it firongly fortified and manned bothby the Venetians and Scanderbee. Where when he had there spent some time, and to his great losse in vain attempted the city, he rife vpon the sudden and retiring into Epirus, came and fat down againe before Croia, of purpose by his sudden comming to have terrified the citizens; and vainly perfuaded, that he had left Scanderbeg in Dirrachium, for that in the affailing therof he had discourred many of Scanderbegs men, and thereby supposed him to have been there also. the greatest cause why he so suddenly rise and came to Croia. At his first comming he offered great rewards and large priviledges vnto the citifens, if they would forthwith yeeld vntheir city; otherwise he threatned vnto them all the calamities of warre, vowing neuer to depart thence before he had it: whereunto he received no other answer out of the city than was sent ! him by the mouth of the cannon or brought him by many most braue fallies. Scanderbes in the meanwhile continually molesting his campe, and every night falling into one quarter or another thereof. Mahomet taught by experience, to what small purpose it would be for him to lie there long, rife with his army, and marched againe to the sea side, to a place now called the head of Redon voon the guife of Venice, not far from Dirrachium, where Scanderbeg had begun to build a new city called Chiurill, not yet finished : which Mahomet in despight of the man, rased downe to the ground. After that, hearing that many of the Epirots were retired into the mountaines, he went to feeke them out, and was with great loffe by those mountaine people repulsed: Scanderbeg still following them at the heeles, and awaiting all opportunities, dayly cut off part of his army. So that at fast the tyrant despairing of any good to be done in that & expedition, was glad to depart out of Epirus, having archieued nothing worth his comming, and fo, full of discontentment and melancholy returned vnto Constantinople.

After all these great troubles, Scanderbeg tid ouer most part of Epirus to view the state of his kingdome, and foat last came to Lyssa (a city of the Venetians, which he had alwaies specially liked) there to confer with the Venetian legat and other the confederat princes of matters concerning their state in generall, as his manner was : but more particularly, how they might take the city of Valmes, which Mahomet had the last yere built in the seignory of Aryannites Comynat, and much troubled that part of Epirus. But whilest he lay there, he fel sieke of a feauer, which daily so increased upon him, that he became sicke euen unto death; and now perceiving his end to draw nigh, tent for his wife and fon, with the princes and lords his confe- L derats, & the embassadors of the Venetians, into his bedchamber. Where after he had at large with greater pain notably discoursed of his troublesome life led among them, than he had before passed the same, and carefully sorewarned them of the dangers like to ensue, he earnessly exhorted them to continue in vnity & concord, and valiantly to stand in defence of their religion, country, and liberty. And afterwards turning his speech to his wife and his son, commended them both with his kingdome to the tuition of the Venetians : who by the articles of the confederation betwixt him and them, were in honor bound to protect his fon and kingdome, during the time of his minority, and afterwards peaceably to place him in the same. In fine, be willed his wife after his death to passe ouer with her sonne into Apulia, where they might in fasety and quiet line vpon such possessions as he there held by the gift of King Ferdinand. And M to after he had with most feruent praier commended his soule into the hands of Almighty God, departed in peace the 17 day of lanuary, in the yeare of our Lord 1466, when he had liued about 63 yeares, and thereof reigned about 24. His death was worthily lamented of all Christian Princes, but especially of the Venetians and Princes of Albania, who had now lost

A their most carefull watchman and inuincible champion: the sorrow of his subjects is not to be expressed, every man bewailing him, as the only stay of the common-weale, and as if with him they had loft all their hope. His dead body was with the generall lamentation of all men o roially buried in the cathedrall church of S. Wicholas at Lysia: where it rested in peace, vn- Scanderbeg butill that about nine yeares after, the Turks comming to the fiege of Scodra, by the way tooke ried at Lyffa. the city of Lyssa, and there with great denotion digged up his bones, reckoning it in some part The body of of their happinesse, if they might but see or touch the same : and such as could get any part scandarbee digged up by thereof, were it neuer so little, caused the same to be set, some in silver, some in gold, to hang the Turket, and about their necks, or weare upon their bodies; perfuading themselves by the wearing thereof of them greats to be partakers of fuch good fortune and hap as had Scanderbeg himselfe whilest he lived: B which is not vnaptly by Gabriel Fairnus of Cremona, thus inverse expressed.

The death of Scanderbeg

Namque vt is affertum toties cum lande paternum Imperium exacta moriens atate reliquit : Illicet immanes tenuerunt omnia Turca. Tum clari Herois venerati nobile bustum, Offaque, marmoraque, inuittum condentia corpue. Abstulerant, sibi quifque in partes fecta minutas, Tananam us bellica vis, & Martius ardor inesset : Et genium prastare bonum, sortemque valerunt. Sicque alus tumulum virtus parat, abfluit illi: Atque eadem diro venerandum prabuit hosti.

In English thus:

The bloudy bane of faithlesse Turks, and terrour of that name. Epirus strong defence and guard, lay buried there with fame: Within that tombe wherein long fince, Great Caftriotus lay : But now those limbes and tombe defac'd, are carried quite away. The remnants of that worthy wight out of his graue were torne; And being dead, could find no reft, but were for lewels worne. For after he, farre spent with age, gaue place to fatall doome, And left his fathers kingdome, got and kept with great renowne Forthwith the cruell Turks preuail'd, and all things there posses: Who worshipping his stately tombe, and place of quiet rest, Dig'd vo his bones, and brake the tombe wherein he did remaine: And glad was he that could thereof fome little part obtaine. As if in them some martiall force, or vertue great had beene: Or fortune rare, such as before in him was living seene. So vertue, which to others gives a sepulture and grave, Bereft it him, yet for'st his foe in honour it to haue.

Most part of the times of those wars betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, the Venetians by sea rayeth intering gary (according to his promife made vuto the Venetians) entered in the kindome of Bossa, I Fomibel 1 sty. where by force he ouerthrew the strong forts which the Turks had built for the desence of their frontiers, and manfully draue tnem out before him vntill he came to Iaziga (of some called laitze) the chiefe city of Bosna, which he at length tooke: and following the course of his victory, scarcely suffered the Turks to breath, vntill he had by force wrested all that kingdome out of their hands. Wherewith Mahomet being exceedingly grieved, in great fury came with a strong army into Bosna, and laid hard siege to Iaziga, which was by the Christians right valiantly defended, untill Mathias with a puissant army came to the reliefe thereof: who fo troubled the Turks campe with continual skirmishes on the one side, and they of the towne with desperat fallies on the other; that at length the proud Turke was driven to such extremity, that he was glad fecretly to seale away by night with all his army into Seruia, and I for hast to leave behind him both his tents and great ordnance, which (the Turks Histories report) he caused to be cast into the river, because it should not come into the hands of the Christians. Mathias after he had thus valiantly put to flight his enemies, & relieued the city. followed the Turks into Seruia, and tooke part of that country also, which together with Bolna he vnited to the kingdome of Hungary. In these warres, Mahomet had such proofe of the force and power of Mathias and the Hungarians, that for a good while after he had so great flomacke to prouoke them farther: for why, the name of Mathias was now become into the Turks no leffe dreadfull, than was sometime the name of his father the valiant Huniades,

The Venetians at the same time also with their gallies scoured the seas, & landing their men fometime in one place, sometime in another, did great harme in many places of the Turksdo M minion necre vnto the sea coast. Amongst other their Generals at divers times sent from that flate, one Nicholas Canalis succeeding Lauretanus (whom we have before spoken of) as soone as he had received his charge, came with his fleet into the bay of Salonichi, and landing his men, burnt divers townes and villages alongst the sea side: And afterwards returning into PeloA ponefus, he fortified the towne of Legosticium in the gulfe of Patras; which worke the Turks with their often skirmishes laboured to have hindred, but in despight of all they could do, it was brought to perfection, and a strong garrison therein left for the defence thereof; which done, he returned againe to Eubœa. Shortly after, he with the same fleet put to sea againe: and failing along it the coast of Macedonia and Thracia, surprised the city of Enus which flandeth.vpon the mouth of the river Meritza, called in antient time Hebrus, vpon which riuer the femous city Hadrianople, and Philippopolis are also scituate. Canalis after he had taken the spoyle of the City, returned to his Gallies, carrying away with him two thousand captines into Eubœa. At the same time also, the Venetians giving aid vnto Nicholas Duchaine against his brother Alexius, then at variance for the principality of Zadrima, neere vnto the B river of Drino in Epirus, gave a great overthrow to the Turks which came in the quarrell of

Mahomet not a little offended with the harmes done unto him by the Venetians, and per- 1470 ceiuing that the Island of Eubœa (now called Nigroponte) was for the commodious scituation and ftrength thereof, the chiefe place from whence they wrought him all these wrongs, and whither they afterwards retired againe, as vnto a most sure place of refuge; determined with himselfe at once to be even with them for all, and to imploy his whole forces both by sea and land for the gaining of that place. This Island of Eubœa is about an hundred miles in length, and lieth oner against that part of Græcia which was of old called Bæotia, from whence it is feparated with a narrow streit of the sea; it aboundeth with come, wine, oyle, fruit, and wood C fit for shipping. The chiefe city therof, was in antient time called Chalcide, and of latter time Nigroponte, by which name also the whole Island was knowne: albeit the Turks now call it, Egribos; a populous, rich, and strong city; so fortified with wals and Bulwarkes, that (in most mens jugements) it seemed a place impregnable. Vnto this strong city, Mahomet resolued to lay fiege; knowing well; that vpon the fortune thereof depended the state of the whole Island. Wherfore he affembled a might y army, and made great preparation both by sea and land: and when all things were in readinesse, sent Mahomet (the great Bassa of the court) with a fleet of three hundred gallies, and certaine other small vessels well furnished with souldiers mariners, and all things necessary by sea into Eubœa : and with a great army marched himselse by land through Achaia, untill he came ouer against the city of Chalcis. The Venetian Admirall hea-D ring of the comming of the Turks fleet, fet forward to have met them neete vnto the streits of Hellespontus: but after he had by his espials descried the great number of the enemies fleet, finding himselfe tooweak, shaped his course to the Island of Sciros. The Bassa comming out of the fireits of Hellespontus, couered the seawith his fleer, & holding on his intended course, without let came to Eubœa:where at the first landing, he tooke Stora and Basilicon, two small townes, which he rased to the ground, and from thence went directly to Chalcis. As soone as chalcis the townes, which he rafed to the ground, and from thence went directly to Chales. As toolic as the this great fleet was there arised, Mahomet caused a great bridge to be made of his smaller vest the bridge to be made of his smaller vest. fels ouer the Greit betwixt Achaia and Euboea: whereby he passed all his army, and so belaied by the Tarke. the city round both by fea and land. And after he had planted his battery, began most furioully to shake the wals a wherein he had in short time made faire breaches, and the sooner, for E that one Thomas of Liburnia (chiefe canonier of the city) before corrupted by the Turks, by Tressentathe fignes agreed vpon, gaue them certaine knowledge in what places the wals were weakest: eigwhereby they to aptly planted their battery, as if they had taken view on the infide of the wals. Which foule treason was at length perceived, and the traitor therefore worthily executed. Yet little prevailed the tyrant thereby; for such was the industry of the defendants, that what soeuer he had by the fury of his great ordnance beat downe by day, that, they with restleffe labor repaired again by night. Thus was the fiege continued thirty dates, in which space many a sharpe assault was given by the Turks, to their great losse; and the city still valiantly defended by the Christians. At length the Venetian Admiral (to the great comfort of the befieged) came with his fleet within view of the city, making semblant as if he would have given P the Turks battell. Whereupon it is reported, that Mahomet was about to have raised his fiege, and have got himselfe ouer into the maine, for feare the Venetians should with their gallies have broken the bridge, and so have shut him up into that Island which thing it was thought the Admiral might have done to his great praise, if he would as a couragious chiefetaine have aduentured the matter, as he was earnoftly requested by the captaines of enery private gally;

who generally grieued to fee him fo great a commander, to let flip fo faire an opportunity. G But he fearing to come any neerer, came to an anchor and moued not, neither gaue any figne or comfort or reliefe to the belieged. Which thing the Turkish King quickly perceiving and therewith encouraged: having now in divers places beaten downe the wals, and made them faultable, brought on his men to the breaches, promiting them the spoile of the city, with many other great rewards and high preferments according to their particular deferts, wheref he faid he would himselfe be an eie witnes. Hereupon the Turks gaue a most sierce and surious affault; which the defendants with inuincible courage received, and made fuch flaughter of them, that the ditches were filled, & the breaches made vp with the bodies of the dead Turks. But such was the number of that populous army (the greatest strength of the Turks) that the living little felt the loffe of the dead : Mahomet continually fending in new supplies of fresh H men in stead of them that were slaine or wounded : so that one could no sooner fall, but twoor three (tept vp in his roome, and fo fuccessively, as if new men had sprung out of the bodies of the cad. Twife they had even won the breaches, and were both times with wonderfull flangh. ter beaten out againe. This deadly and dreadfull affault was maintained a whole day and night without intermission. At length the defendants being for the most part slaine or woon. ded, and the rest wearied with long fight, and vnable to defend the towne now affaulted almost tound, retired from the breaches into the market place, and there like resolute men, sold their chalif inten lives at a deere price vnto the Turks. Among & the flaine Christians, were found the dead by dies of many notable women, who feeing the ruine of the city, chofe rather to die with their friends in defence thereof, than alive to fall into the hands of their barbarous enemies.

Muhamet being now become Lord of the city, and having loft forty thousand of his Turks in that fiege, in revenge thereof caused all the men that were found in the city alive, to be me to most cruell death, especially the Italians, upon whom he shewed his tyranny with most exquisit and horrible forments. Paulus Ericus Gouernor of the city, with a few others, who with him were fled into the castle, without resistance deliuered the same vnto him, upon his faith. full promife, that they might in fafety depart: but after that he had got them into his power, the perfidious tyrant without regard, commanded them all to be cruelly murthered. The Gouernors daughter a maiden of incomparable beauty, was among it the rest taken prisoner, and for her rare perfection, by them that tooke her presented to Mahomes as the mirror of beauty: The barbarous tyrant greedy of fo faire a prey, fought first by flattering words and faire per- K fuation to induce her to confent to his defire; but when he could not fo prevaile, he fell into another vaine, and began to shew himselfe in his owne nature, threatning her with death, torture, and force, worse than death it selfe, if she would not otherwise yeeld onto his appetite. Whereunto the constant virgin (worthy eternal! fame) answered so resolutely, and so contrary to the tyrants expectation, that he being therewith enraged, commanded her to be present. ly flaine. The horrible and monstrous cruelty, with the filthy outrages by that beatly and barbarous people committed, at the taking of that city, passeth all credit. Chalcis thus won, the rest of that fruitfull Island without further resistance yeelded vnto the Turkish slauery.

Canalis the Venetian Admirall, who all the time of the fiege, had in the fight of the City lien at anchor as a looker on, fearing now that the city was loft, to be fet you by the Turks fleet, hoised saile, and laded with dishonour returned in haste vnto Venice, where he was by the commandement of the Senat committed to prison, and afterward with all his family exp under which it yet groaneth. This calamity happened unto the Venetian state, or rather (10 fay truly) to the generall hurt of the Christian common weale, in the yeare of our redemp I

Shortly after, when Mahomet was departed with his army out of Euboea, and his fleet returned to Constantinople: the Venetians with their gallies, attempted to have vpon the sudden surprised the city, a little before lost. But Mahomet had therein lest so strong a garrison, that when the Venetians had landed their men, they were againe enforced to retire to their M gallies and to forfake their Island.

Chalcis thus loft, with all the Island of Eubœa, the Venetians chose Petrus Mocenica, valiant and discreet gentleman, Admirall of their fleet, in stead of Canalis and by their embal sadours solicited Sixtus the south of that name, then Bishop of Rome, and Ferdinand King A of Naples, with Lewis king of Cyprus, and the grand master of the Rhodes, to joyne their forces together with theirs against the great and common enemy: which thing all the aforesaid Christian princes promited them to do. And the more to intangle the Turke, they at the same rime sent Caterinus Zenus their Embassadour with rich presents vnto Alymbeius V sun C. Sanes, the great king of Persia, to incite him on that side against the Turkerin which negotiation Zenus fowell behaued himselfe, that the next yeare following, that great king tooke vp armes against Mahamet, and had with him mortall wars, as shall be in convenient place hereafter declared. Mahemet not ignorant of the proceedings of the Venetians, and that they did what they might to stir vp as many enemies as they could, and to bring him (if it were possible) into hatred with the whole world; and well knowing how much he had offended the minds of the B Christian princes with the cruelty he had of late vsed against them of Chalcis, thought it not belt as then further to prouoke them, and so happily to bring all at once about his cares; but for a feason to lie still at Constantinople, as if he had been desirous now to live in peace, not meaning further harme : hoping thereby, that although he concluded no peace with any of them(which indeed he was not defirous of) yet that trad of time might mittigat the hanoufnes of the fact, and coole the heat of their displeasure; whereby it came to passe as he wished; that nothing worth the speaking of was that yere attempted against him: and because the Perfian king was the man of whom he stood most in doubt, he sought by his Embassadors to pacific him, and to withdraw him from the league of the Christians : requesting him, if it were for nothing els but for the community of the Mahometan religion, wherein they well agreed, C and were thereby the professed enemies of the Christians, to withdraw his hand, and in their cause to cease to take vp armes: vrging now (for that it so stood with his purpose) the zeale of religion, whereas otherwise he regarded (as was thought) no religion at all. But Zenus the Venetian Embassadour lying continually in the Persian court, so wrought the matter with V sur-Cassanes, that he told the Turks Embassador plainly, That he could not nor would not longer, endure the manifest injury and wrong done vnto him by the Turkish King : and farther, that he had made a faithfull league with the Christian Princes, and therefore would to the vttermost of his power make it knowne vnto the world, that he would effectually performe what thing soeuer he had promised : and so dismissed them, now no lesse discontented than were before the Persian Embassadorus at such time as they returned from the Turks court, having

D obtained nothing they then requested concerning the Emperour of Trapezond. The yeare following, Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall with his fleet arrived in the Isle of 1472 Lesbos, where he did great harme. From thence he passed the bay of Adramittium into the The Venetians leffer Afia, and fore spoiled the country about Pergamus. After that he landed again at Cni older by King dissupon the coast of Caria, where he tooks a great books and (a having done the Turks or Fridmand, the dissypon the coast of Caria, where he tooke a great booty: and so having done the Turks ex. Bistop of Rome, ceeding much herme in Asia all alongst the sea coast opposite to Gracia, he returned laden and the great with spoile towards Peloponesus. In his returne about the promontory of Malea, vpon the Khrder, doctor coast of Peloponesis, he met with Richaiensis comming vnto him with 17 gallies from King Turks great Ferdinand: by whom he was certified, that the great Bishops fleet was ready to come forth long the tead alfo. After mutual gratulation, as the maner at fea is, the Admirals joyning their fleets in one, of the lefter landed at Methone, now called Modon, then a city of the Venetians in Peloponesus: where Ass. after they had well refreshed their soldiers, and taken in fresh victuals, they put to sea againe; and failing through the Islands, landed in Asia, where they were at their first landing encountered by the country Turks, whom at last they put to slight, and by the space of source daics tooke what pillage they could in the country: where the fouldiers found great flore of rich booty, especially of Turky carpets, which are there made in great abundance. From thence they failed to Halicamasus, which is part of Caria (where sometime stood the stately tombe which Queene Artemesia built for her husband Mausolus, accounted amongst the wonders of the world) where they tooke a wonderfull spoile. There came vnto them Wicholas Bishop of Modrussa, with twenty gallies sent from the great Bishop whom the other two Generals F welcomed with great joy. At the same time also came thither two gallies from the great master of the Rhodes. With this flect of eighty flue gallies, they failed to the Isle of Samos ouer against Ephesus (sometime a place of great same, but then altogether desolate and vnpeopled) there to confult for their further proceedings in those warres. Loosing from Samos, they tooke their course alongst the sea coast of Asia, and landed at Attalia, the chiefe city of Pamphilia, a place of great traffique : where they found in the subburbs of the city great of flore of many rich commodities, brought thither out of Ægypt and Syria; whereof they took what pleased them, and burnt the rest together with the subburbs. Vnto the city it selfe they began to lay fiege, but perceiving that it was not without great losse of their men to be taken they departed thence: and running all along it the coast of Pamphilia, burnt and destroicd what came in their way, and fo returned backe againe to Rhodes: where they mer an Embaffadour from Viun. Cassanes the Persian King, to the Bishop and the Venetians, for great ordnance. whereof that so mighty a Prince was altogether vnfurnished. Of this Embassadour they vn. der Rood that Vlun Coffanes was entered into league with the Christian Princes, and now busine in making preparation against the Turke. At which time Mahomes requited the Venetians with no leffe harme in Epirus and Dalmatia, than they had done to him in Afia: for now that H Scanderbeg was dead, the Turks mightily prevailed vpon the weake Princes of Epirus and Al. bania, with the countries adjoyning. The Christian fleet departing from the Rhodes, landed in the country of Myndians, a part of Caria, and with great spoile returned to the Island of Naxos, one of the Cyclades: from whence King Ferdinand his gallies returned home, laded with much rich spoile: for now the yeare was far spent. Yet after the departure of the Kings gallies, Mocenicus with the Legat returned backe again into Afia, and there landing their men tooke the famous city of Smyrna in Ionia, and when they had taken the spoile thereof, set it on fire. At which time also they did great harme about Claxomene, not farre from Smyrna. So Winter drawing now fast on they returned, laded with the rich spoiles of Asia; the Legat into Italy, and Mocenicus into Methone.

The infatiable defire of Soueraignty, whereunto the Turkish King was naturally inclined. had continually armed him, not onely against the Christian Princes, but against others also Macount no comments which we can of their owne superstition: making no great difference betwirt the one and the other, if vnisibe Mahos to he might extend his dominion. He had long before under the pretence of a friendly parky craftily circumuented the King of Mysia, a country in Asia, and having got him withinhis danger, cruelly put him to death, and by force fubdued his kingdome, left not one of the kings bloud aline. After that, he inuaded Cilicia, which the Turks call Caramania, where the two young brethren, Pyramet and Cassambet reigned, and draue them both out of Cilicia: of whom Pyramet the elder, fled for refuge to V fun. Cassanes; Cassambet the younger assisted by his old friends, fought by force of armes to recouer againe his inheritance wrongfully by the Turke & possessed, and was besieging certaine townes, upon the sea coast, which being taken from the Turks would eafily draw all the rest of the kingdome after them. Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall being now with the first of the Spring come voon the coast of Cilicia, at the request of Caffambet, landed certaine companies of his men under the leading of Victor Superantius, and certaine pieces of great artillery, wherewith he so battered the wals of Sichinum, that he enforced the Turks therein to yeeld up the city; which he deliuered to Cassambet. In like maner he tooke the city of Corycus, which he also restored to Cassamber. At last he laied siege to Seleucia, which standeth vpon the river Orontes, and was built by King Seleucus, one of the succeffors of Alexander the Great, diffant from the sea about five miles: the Governor of this city discouraged with the fight of the great artillery, delivered the city to the Venetian captaine, L who by the appointment of the Admirall restored the same to Cassambet. Who by this means brought againe into his kingdome, gaue great thanks vnto the Admirall, promising both for himselfe and for his brother to be alwaies friends unto the Venetians. Mocenical departing from Cilicia, landed his men in Lycia, and harried that country alongst the sea coast. And this Mocenicus sailed into Cyprus, to appease a great insurrection there raised against the Queene, who was by her husband at his death left to the protection of the Venetians: which rebellion when he had well quieted, hearing that Triadanus Grittus, was by the decree of the Senat appointed Admirall, and already come into Peloponesus, he with as much speed as he could hasted thither, to give vp his charge, and so to returne home againe to Venice.

About this time the great Persian King Vsun Cassanes began to make wat vpon the Turkish N emperor Mahamet, for the better understanding wherof, it shall not be from our purpose briefly to shew by what means this V fun-Cassanes, of a small Prince as pired to the kingdome of Persia, and so in thort time grew to that greatnesse, that he was justly accounted amongst the greatest monarchs of the world then living; as appeareth by these warres betwixt him and the great

A Turkish Emperour Mahomet. This Vsun Cassanes of whom we now speake, was the sonne of that Tachretin, who with other poore Princes was driven into exile by the violence of Baiazet the first great grandfather to this Mahomet the Great, Emperour of the Turks, and was againe restored by great Tamerlane, as is before declared in the life of Bajazet . By the death of Tachretin. his fon V sun-Cassanes (of some called also Asymberus) obtained that small territory, which his father had in Armenia: nothing answering vnto the greatnesse of his conceits. Wherefore not contented with fuch possessions as was from his father descended vnto him, hee began to shoulder for more roome, with such weake Princes his neighbors as he thought he might best deale withall, wringing one prouince from this Prince, another from that, and thrusting some others quite out of all that they had: and in thost time fo inlarged his dominion, that he had got into his hands a great part of Armenia, and was reputed both for a mighty and fortunate Prince. Infomuch that Calo Ioannes, then Emperor of Trapezond (whose power altogether an. fwered not to the greatnes of his stile, being for most part thut vp within the bounds of Pontus, and fearing the greatnesse of the Turkish Emperour Mahomet, whose name began then to grow dreadfull vnto his neighbor Princes) gaue to him his onely daughter Despina in marriage, by fuch allyance to ftrengthen himfelf against the Turkish tyrant, if need should require. At which marriage it was agreed, That V fun Caffanes should in the right of his wife enjoy all the kingdome of Pontus, after the death of Calo toannes her father, and of David his brother: and that Despina should so long as the liued have the free exercise of her Christian Religion. By this woman, V (un Cassanes had a daughter called Martha, whom I willingly remember, for that the was the mother of Hyfmael, afterwards the great king of Persia, commonly called Hyfmaelthe Sophy; of whom more shall be faid hereafter in the life of Selymus. Viun-Cassanes honoured with this marriage, and strengthened with this new allyance, ceased not, after his wonted manner, dayly to incroch vpon his neighbor Princes: and proceeded fo far, that at length he began to lay hand upon a part of Armenia, which was then part of the Dominion of the Persian King. Zen (whom some call Ztokies, which was indeed the name of his father) reigning then in Persia, by his Embassadors admonished, and in fore commanded V sun-Cassadors to hold him selfe content with his owne, or at least, with that he had alreadie wrongfully taken from others, & not to prefume to come within the bounds of his dominion, threatning otherwife to take him as an enemy achis state, and to turne his forces upon him. With which ombassage Vsun-Cassanes being much offended, gaue the embassadors no entertainment, but commanded them with freed to get them out of his Kingdome, and to tell their Master, That he would shortly himselfe in person come and debate the matter with him face to sace. With which proud answer from to meane a Prince the Persian King moued, leuied such an army for the intading of him, as was thought to have been sufficient to have subdued a fane greater Prince: and so appointed, set forward toward Armenia. V sun Cassanes much inferiour to this great King in wealth, and number of men, but not in haughtines of minde, and veliantnes of courage, flayd not to expect the comming of fo puiffant an enemy, but full of hope fet forward to meet him, and by great journies fought to come vpon him before he could have any knowledge of his comming: yet had he then in his army scarcely one man to ten, but al armed with couragious hearts, & conducted by a most fortunat chieftaine which seared nothing. So holding on his way, at length he met with the great army of the Persians, with whom he prefently ioined battell: and after a long and cruell fight overthrew them in the plaine field, with fuch a flaughter as might well have weakned the forces of a right great kingdome. The great king more intaged then discouraged with his ouerthrow, raised a far greater army than before the very strength of his kingdome:resoluing now, not to send any more his lieuteriants, but to go in person himselfe against so desperat an enemy. All things being in readinesse, he set forward, and at length met with the Armenian Prince, whom he found as ready to give battell as he was at the first. So being both desirous to try their fortune, they lovned battel, wherein the vian cassine Persians were againe discomfited and put to slight; and moe of them slain in that battell, than in a great butwere brought into the sield in the first army. Lenzes the Persian king was there slain with Vian the king of the king of Caffanes his owne hand, & Cariasuphus his son taken prisoner:whom the Armenian prince vsed Persa. with the greatest honorcould be deuised, giving vnto him the honor and title due to the Perfian king, taking to himselfe the bare name of the protector of the Persian state: which he did onely to please the Persians, and to keep them quiet vntill he had got some moreassired possession of that kingdome. But after he had in the two former battels broken their greates of Arength, and then vnder the colour of a peaceable gouernor got into his power the regall city of Tauris, with the rest of the cities & strong places of that great kingdome, and that all men had him now in great reuerence and admiration for his great vertues; he fecretly dispatched out of the way the poore titular King his prisoner, (the last of the posterity of the mighty 74. merlane) and tooke voon himselfe the highest place, which admitteth no partner. Whilest this refiles Prince was thus tumbling in the world, and not yet well fetled in his new gotten king. dom, Mahomet the Turkish Emperor, no lesse ambitious than himselfe, had scornfully rejected the Embassadors and Prefents which V fun-Cassanes had fent; and having shamefully putto death David the Emperor of Trapezond, his allyance, had converted all the kingdom of Pon. tus (which V fun-Caffanes of right claimed as his wifes dowry) into the form of a province and u fo vnited it vnto the Turkish empire. Which so manifest a wrong, V sun. Cassames in the newnes of his folate atchieued greatnesse, durst not aduenture to addresse; but after that he was surely feated and had with the course of time ouercome all dangers at home, being dayly prickt forward with the remembrance of the former iniuries (still suggested by the importunity of his wife Despina, and the solicitation of the Venetians, to whom he had by solemn promise bound himfelfe) he determined now to take the matter in hand, and to try his forces upon his proud enemy the Turkish Emperour. Hereupon he raised a great army, and being well appointed of all things necessary, passing through Armenia toward Pontus, neere vnto the river Euphrates was encountred by Multapha (Mahomets cldeft fon, a yong Prince of great hope) and Amurah the great Bassa of Romania, whom Mahomet (fearing such a matter) had sent before with a I strong army out of Europe, to ioine with such forces as Mustapha had already raised in Asia so to withstand the inuasion of the Persian. These two great Commanders Multapha & Amerath ioyning battell with Pfun Cassans, were by him in the plain field ouerthrown; where Amerath the great Baffa himfelie, with thirty thousand Turks were flain. Mustapha with the rest of the army by (hamefull flight fauing themselues.

Gans in field

Now when Mahomet understood that Amurath was slaine, and his army discomfited, he was therewith exceedingly troubled; but purpofing to be thereof reuenged, gaue order into all parts of his dominions for the leuying of his new forces; fo that at the time by him appoin. ted, was affembled a great and mighty army of 320000 mep. V fun-Cassanes in like maner was in the field with an army, nothing in number inferior vnto his enemy. These two Mahometan r Kings, drawing after them their huge armies, met together neer the mountaines of Armenia, where at the first encounter, one of the Turks great Bassa's was slaine, with 40000 Turks with which hard beginning the proud tyrant was fo daunted, that he could hardly be perfused to prough is fortune any further, but contenting himfelfe with that loffe, was about to have retired; and had undoubtedly fo don, if fome of his most expert and valiant captains which might be bold with him, had not sharply reproued him, that having so populous an army as scarcely felt that small losse, he should once thinke of returning without victory. With which their comfortable persuasions he was againe encouraged to give battell. Yet for his more safetie he withdrew his army into a streit betwixt two mountaines, and with his carriages fortified the front thereof, as with a trench; behind which carriages he placed his great ordnance, and L on the either fide his archers. The Persians, as men of great valour, and thereto encouraged with their former victories, came on as men fearing no perill, to have charged the Turks come in their strength; presenting their whole army before they were aware, into the mouth of the Turks Artillery, which suddenly discharged among st the thickest of them, brake their ranks, and tooke away a number of them. Besides that, the Persian horses regrified with the was: quainting and thundring report of the great ordnance, were not to be ruled by their riders, but starting back, ran some one way, some another, as if they had felt neither bit norrider; Which their confusion Mahomet perceiuing, presently tooke hold of the occasion offred and with his horsmen fiercely charged them, being now by themselves intangled and out of order. News. thelesse the Persians made great resistance, and slew many of the Turks : but still sighting M confusedly and out of order, they were at the last inforced to fly: in which flight a great mum ber of them were flaine, and their tents also taken. Zeinal, Vsun Cassanes his eldest some, la bouring to stay the flight of the Persians, was slaine with a small shot. So the honour of the day remained with the Turks : yet had they no great cause to brag of their winnings, having

A lost in that battell forty thousand souldiers whereas of the Persians fell not about ten thoufand Mahomet containing himselfe with this deare bought victory, returned homewards; and Vlun-Callanes leaving another of his fons with his army for the defence of Armenia, returned likewise to Tauris. But whilst the Christian Princes were in their greatest expectation, what might be the eyent of these wars betwixt these two mighty Mahometan kings; they upon the fudden concluded a peace, and confirmed the same with new affinity, excluding the Christians quite out of the same. This last battell betwixt Mahomet and V sun Cassanes, was fought in the yeare of our Lord 1474, about foure yeres before the death of Viun-Cassance, who died the fifth of lanuary in the yeare 1478.

In the time of these wars died the noble Mustapha, Mahomet his eldest sonne, at Iconium ha. The drait of the B uing frent himfelf with reuelling among his paragons; or as tome write, commanded to die. molte Maftaby his father, vpon this occasion. This youthfull Prince vpon a time comming to the court to buildest female fee his father (or as they terme it, to kiffe his hand) became amorous of the wife of Achmetes Baffa, a Lady of incomparable beauty, and daughter to Ifaac Baffa, the chiefe man in the Turkish empire, next vnto Mahames himselse: but finding no means to compasse her in whom his foule lived, he awaited a time when as the (after the manner of the Turks) went to bathe her felferand there as he found her all difroabed, shamefully forced her, without regard either of his own honor, or of hers. Of this fo foule an outrage, Achmets her husband, with his cloathes and hat all rent for madnes, came and grieuously complained to Mahomet, crauing vengeance for the same. Vnto whom Mahomet againe replyed, Art not then thy selfe my slaue ? and if my son C. Mustapha have knowne thy wife, is the not my bondflave, he hath to doe withall? Ceafe therefore this to complaine, and hold the selfe therewith content. Neverthelesse he in secret sharply reproved his son for so hainous and dishonorable a fact by him committed, and commanded him to goe out of his fight: and as he was of a feuere nature, caused him within a few dayes after to be secretly strangled. Neuerthelesse, the wrong done to the Bassa, sunke so deep into his haughty mind, as that he would neuer admit excuse therfore, but put away his wife, the ground of the implacable hatred betwixt him and the great Bassa Isase his father in law, and in fine, the very cause of his veter destruction, as is afterward declared in the life of Bajazet.

Mahomet deliuered of his greatest feare, by the peace he had lately concluded with Vsun-Cassanes the Persian king, was now at good leifure to imploy alk his forces against the Christi-D ans. And bearing a deadly hatred against the Princes of Epigus and Albania, with a wonderfull defire to extend his empire voon the Ionian & Adriatick, that he might from thence but look toward Italy, which he began now to long after the determined with himselfe first to subdue those countries, as standing in his way, both for the invasion of Italy, and of the territories of the Venetians. And for a fmuch as the strong city of Scodra (otherwise called Scutary) then in the possession of the Venetians, for the commodious scituation therof seemed to give him the best entrance into the countries of Albania, Epirus, Dalmatia, and to such cities as the Venetians held alongst the sea coast, he resolved there to begin his wars.

This city was of great strength, as well for the naturall scituation thereof, as for the strong fortifications therin made by the hand of man: which thing Mahomet was not ignorant of but E prefuming of his owne ftrength and power, vainly perfuaded himselfe, that no place was now able long to hold out against him. Wherefore having prepared all things fit for the besieging thereof, he sent Solyman Bassa an Eunuch (whom he made his lieutenant generall in Europe, in the place of Amuras & Bassa, before slain by Vsun Cassants) with 80000 soldiers to besiege Scodra. This great Baffa according to his charge came, and with great pomp incamped round a - Solyman Eaff. bout the city, the fine and twentieth of May. Shortly after having planted his battery, he be-besset be dra with an gan most furiously to shake the wals, and ceased not by all meanes he could deuise, to trouble army of tights the defendants: and when he had by force of the cannon don what he could, gaue divers tharp thousand men. affaults unto the City, but was still with great losse valiantly repulsed by them of the City. Long it were to declare, how often, and in what terrible manner that warlike Bassa Mahomet, F his chiefe captaine, attempted to have woon the city: as also to shew how they of Scodra, directed by their worthy Gouernor Antonius Lauretanus, valiantly defended themselues and their City: nothing was omitted that the enemy could do or devise for the gaining thereof; but all his devices and attempts were so met withal by the defendants, that they served him to no other purpose but to the destruction of his people. Whilest the Bassa thus lay at the siege of

feision of that kingdome. But after he had in the two former battels broken their greatest G frength, and then under the colour of a peaceable gouernor got into his power the regall city of Tauris, with the rest of the cities & strong places of that great kingdome, and that all men had him now in great reuerence and admiration for his great vertues 3 he fecretly dispatched out of the way the poore titular King his prisoner, (the last of the posterity of the mighty Tamerlane) and tooke voon himselfe the highest place, which admitteth no partner. Whilest this refiles Prince was thus tumbling in the world, and not yet well fetled in his new gotten kingdom, Mahomes the Turkish Emperor, no lesse ambitious than himselfe, had scornfully rejected the Embassadors and Prefents which V sun-Cassanes had sent; and having shamefully purto death David the Emperor of Trapezond, his allyance, had converted all the kingdom of Pontus (which V fun-Caffines of right claimed as his wifes dowry) into the form of a province, and formited it unto the Turkish empire. Which so manifest a wrong, V sun-Cassanes in the newnes of his so late atchieued greatnesse, durst not aduenture to addresse; but after that he was surely feated, and had with the course of time ouercome all dangers at home, being dayly prickt forward with the remembrance of the former injuries (ftill fuggested by the importunity of his wife Defina, and the folicitation of the Venetians, to whom he had by folemn promife bound himfelfe) he determined now to take the matter in hand, and to try his forces upon his proud enemy the Turkith Emperour, Hereupon heraifed a great army, and being well appointed of all things necessary, passing through Armenia toward Pontus, neere vnto the river Euphrates was encountred by Mustapha (Mahomets eldest son, a yong Prince of great hope) and Amurath the great Bassaof Romania, whom Mahomet (searing such a matter) had sent before with a I firong army out of Europe, to joine with fuch forces as Mustapha had already raised in Asia, so to withfland the invation of the Persian. These two great Commanders Mustapha & Amurath ioyning battell with I'fun Caffanes, were by him in the plain field ouerthrown; where Amurath the great Baffa himfelfe, with thirty thousand Turks were flain; Mastapha with the rest of the army by thamefull flight fauing themselues.

Now when Mahonet understood that Amurath was flaine, and his army discomfited, he was therewith exceedingly troubled but purposing to be thereof reuenged, gaue order into all parts of his dominions for the leuying of his new forces; fo that at the time by him appoin. Interest cr. ted, was affembled a great and mighty army of 320000 mep. V sun-Cassaner in like maner was in the field with an army, nothing in number inferior vnto his enemy. These two Mahometan Kings, drawing after them their huge armies, met together neer the mountaines of Armenia, where at the first encounter, one of the Turks great Bassa's was slaine, with 40000 Turks: with which hard beginning the proud tyrant was so daunted, that he could hardly be persuaded to proue his fortune any further, but contenting himfelfe with that loffe, was about to have retired; and had undoubtedly fo don, if some of his most expert and valiant captains which might be bold with him, had not sharply reproued him, that having so populous an army as scarcely felt that small losse, he should once thinke of returning without victory. Withwhich their comfortable persuasions he was againe encouraged to give battell. Yet for his more safetie he withdrew his army into a ftreit betwixt two mountaines, and with his carriages fortified the front thereof, as with a trench : behind which carriages he placed his great ordnance, and L on the either fide his archers. The Perfians, as men of great valour, and thereto encouraged with their former victories, came on as men fearing no perill, to haue charged the Turks even in their strength; presenting their whole army before they were aware, into the mouth of the Turks Artillery; which suddenly discharged amongst the thickest of them, brake their ranks, and tooke away a number of them. Besides that, the Persian horses terrified with the vnacquainting and thundring report of the great ordnance, were not to be suled by their riders, but flarting back, ran some one way, some another, as if they had felt neither bit norrider. Which their confusion Mahomes perceiving, presently tooke hold of the occasion offred, and with his horsmen fiercely charged them, being now by themselves intangled and out of order. Neverthelesse the Persians made great resistance, and slew many of the Turks : but still fighting M confusedly and out of order, they were at the last inforced to fly: in which flight a great number of them were flaine, and their tents also taken. Zeinal, V fun Cassants his eldest sonne, labouring to flay the flight of the Persians, was flaine with a small shor. So the bonour of the day remained with the Turks : yet had they no great cause to brag of their winnings, having

A loft inthat battell forty thousand souldiers; whereas of the Persians fell not aboue ten thoufand, Mahomet containing himselfe with this deare bought victory, returned homewards: and Viun-Cassanes leaving another of his sons with his army for the desence of Armenia returned likewife to Tauris. But whilft the Christian Princes were in their greatest expectation what might be the event of these wars betwixt these two mighty Mahometan kings; they woon the fidden concluded a peace, and confirmed the fame with new affinity, excluding the Christians quite out of the fame. This last battell betwixt Mahomet and V fun Caffanes, was fought in the yeare of our Lord 1474, about foure yeres before the death of V fun-Cassanes, who died the fifth of lanuary, in the yeare 1478.

In the time of these wars died the noble Mustapha, Mahomet his eldest sonne, at Iconium ha- The death of the B uing spent himself with reuelling among his paragons; or as some write, commanded to die, "ble Mustaby his father, you this occasion. This youthfull Prince you a time comming to the court to busiless from the court to busiless fr fee his father (or as they terme it, to kiffe his hand) became amorous of the wife of Achmetes Baffa, a Lady of incomparable beauty, and daughter to Isaac Baffa, the chiefe man in the Turkith empire next vnto Mahanet himfelfe: but finding no means to compate her in whom his foule lived, he awaited a time when as the (after the manner of the Turks) went to bathe her felferand there as he found her all difroabed, framefully forced her, without regard either of his own honor, or of hers. Of this fo foule an outrage, Achmets her husband, with his cloather and hat all rent for madnes, came and grieuously complained to Mahomet, crauing yengeance for the same. Vnto whom Mahomet againe replyed, Art not then thy selfe my slave? and if my some r Multapha have knowne thy wife, is the not my bond flave be hath to doe withall? Geale therefore thus to complaine, and hold the felfe therewith content. Neverthelesse he in fecret sharply reproved his fon for for hainous and difhonorable a fath by him committed, and commanded him to goe out of his fight: and as he was of a feuere nature, caused him within a few dayes after to be secretly strangled. Neuerthelesse, the wrong done to the Bassa, sunke so deep into his haughty mind, as that he would neuer admit excuse ther fore, but put away his wife, the ground of the implacable hatred betwirt him and the great Bassa Isase his father in law, and in fine, the very cause of hisveter destruction, as is afterward declared in the life of Bajazet.

Mahomet deliuered of his greatest feare, by the peace he had lately concluded with V sun-Caffanes the Persian king, was now at good leifure to imploy all his forces against the Christi-D ans. And bearing a deadly hatred against the Princes of Epipus and Albania, with a wonderfull defire to extend his empire you the Ionian & Adriatick, that he might from thence but look toward Italy, which he began now to long after; he determined with himselfe first to subdue those countries, as standing in his way, both for the invasion of Italy, and of the territories of the Venetians. And for a fmuch as the strong city of Scodra (otherwise called Scutary) then in the possession of the Venetians, for the commodious scituation therof seemed to give him the best entrance into the countries of Albania, Epirus, Dalmaria, and to such cities as the Venetians held alongst the sea coast, he resolved there to begin his wars.

This city was of great strength, as well for the naturall scituation thereof, as for the strong fortifications therin made by the hand of man: which thing Mahomet was not ignorant of, but B prefuming of his owne strength and power, vainly persuaded himselfe, that no place was now able long to hold out against him. Wherefore having prepared all things fit for the besieging thereof, he fent Solyman Baffa an Eunuch (whom he made his lieutenant generall in Europe, in the place of Amurath Baffa, before flain by V fun Caffanes) with 80000 foldiers to befiege Scodra. This great Baffa according to his charge came, and with great pomp incamped round a - Solyman Eaffa bout the city, the five and twentieth of May. Shortly after having planted his battery, he be- befiegeth Scogan most suriously to shake the wals, and ceased not by all meanes he could deuise, to trouble army of sight, the defendants: and when he had by force of the cannon don what he could, gaue divers tharp thousand men. affaults unto the City, but was still with great losse valiantly repulsed by them of the City. Long it were to declare, how often, and in what terrible manner that warlike Bassa Mahomet, F his chiefecaptaine, attempted to have woon the city: as also to show how they of Scodra, diseded by their worthy Gouernor Antonius Lauretanus, valiantly defended themselves and their City: nothing was omitted that the enemy could do or deuise for the gaining thereof; but all his deuices and attempts were so met withal by the defendants, that they served him to no other purpose but to the destruction of his people. Whilest the Bassa thus lay at the siege of

Scodia, Mocenicus having received such commandment from the Senat, came and joined him- G felfe to Grittis the new Admirall, who then lay with his fleet in the mouth of Boliana, a great river running out of the lake whereupon the city of Scodra standeth. These two great Com. manders being met together, were both as one man, and with a wonderfull confent did what they might for the furtherance of the common good, a thing not common : first they put strong narrifons, with all things necessary, into Colchinum; Lyssa, Dirrhachium, and other cities of their feigniory voon the fea coast. After that, they went up the river Boliana with certain gallies, and came within fight of Scodra, and there by fires in the night, and other tokens of comfort, encouraged the defendants, as with an affured promife of reliefe : which thing it grieued the Turks to behold, who therfore went about to have thut in those same gallies with a great chaine drawn crosse the river, where it was narrowest betwixt them and the sea: but in H doing thereof, the Venetians out of their gallies slew 500 of the Turks, and wounded divers others, and so returned again to sea. It was afterward attempted by the aforesaid Admirals, if a new supply might have been put into the city; but the enemy had so beset the same, that it Matthew King was not possible to be done. In the meane time, Matthias King of Hungary (receiving a great yerely portion of the Venetians for the defence of their countries against the Turke) hearing Twite to for that Scodia was befreged, began to make fuch spoyle in the Turks dominions, bording your fate the first of him, that Mahomet was glad to call home the great Baffa from the fiege of Scodra, to defend his own frontiers. So the Bassa after he had lien three months with his great army at the fiege, and loft 14000 of his men, wherof the greatest part died of ficknes taken by long lying in the rotten moorish ground neere vnto the river, by commandment from his Master, rose with his army and departed. The Venetians also, which lay all that while thereabout in their gallies, were toucht with the same contagion : Triadanus Grittus died thereof, and Mocenisus the other Admirall fell thereof dangerously sicke, but being somewhat recoursed, returned home, and was shortly after for his good service chosen Duke of Venice, Marcellus the old Duke being then dead. With this diffhonor taken at Scodra Mahomet was fo discontented, that he appointed a yearely fee vnto one, to put him in mind dayly of the fiege of Scodra.

The same yeare that this great Bassa Solyman had in vain besieged Scodra, he was afterward fent with a great army into Valachia, where he was fo intangled in the woods and fens, by Stephanus the Vayuod, that he loft all his army, and with much ado escaped himself, by the won-derfull swiftnesse of a maie whereon he rid.

The yeare following, which was the yeare 1476, Mahomet sent out a great fleet to sea, under the conduct of Geduces Achmetes, his chiefe counsellor and man of war, (whose very name was dreadful in all places where he came) in hope to have by treafon furprifed the Island of Crete: but that plot was in good time by the Venetians perceived, the traitors executed, and he of his purpose disappointed. Whereupon he changed his former purpose for Crete, and sent the fame Achmetes with his fleet into the Euxine (or as the Turks call it, the black fea) to befiege the rich city of Caffa. This city was in antient time called Theodosia, scituate in the country of Taurica Chersonesus, fast by the sea side, and had of long time bin in possession of the Genowaies, and was a place of exceeding great trade, untill that this great Emperor Mahomet hauing taken Constantinople, and falling out with the Venetians, had by his strong castles built L vpon the streits of Hellespontus and Bosphorus, taken away both the traffique of Merchants into those seas, and all possible meanes for the Genowaies to fend succor to that city : yet it is credibly reported, That one valiant Captaine undertooke to carry his companie (in number not about one hundred and fifty men) by land from Genoa to Caffa, not much leffe than two thou fand miles, and worthily performed what he had undertaken. Achinetes comming thither with his fleet, inclosed the city both by sea and land : which divided in it selfe by reason of the divers disposition of the Inhabitants, being of divers Nations, some Genowaies, some Greeks, some Armenians, but most Tartais, could not long hold out, but was in short time giuen up to the Baffa, upon condition, That the Genoway Merchants, who were there both in number many, and exceeding rich, might in safetie depart rhence with their wealth. M Which promife the Baffa performed not , but when he was poffeffed of the city, fent fuch as he thought good, to Constantinople, and commanded the rest vpon paine of death, not to depart thence, or to conuey away from thence any part of their substance. In short time after, the whole countrey of Taurica Chersonesus yeelded unto the Turkish obeisance. At which

A time also the Tartar Princes, namely the Precopenses and Destenses, terrified with the greatneso; the Turke, cowardly yeelded themselves as tributaries vnto him; ever fince which time they have lived a most service and troublesom life, subject to every command of the Othoman Emperor; for whom they have done great service many times in their wars, against the Persians, the Polonians, the Hungarians, Transyluanians, and Germanes, as in the process of this Hiflory well appeareth; and as the aforefaid nations their neighbors, with others also further off. have even of late to their great loffe felt.

Although the Venetians had in these latewars lost the great and fertile Island of Euboea, with the strong city of Chalcis, the surest harbor for their gallies; yet held they still divers frong towns and commodious hauens by the fea coast, both within Peloponesus & without n as Methone, Corone, Tenarus, Naupactum, & others: which standing as it were in the bosom of his empire, Mahomet fore longed after. And therefore to fatisfie his ambitious defire, fent Solyman (the great Baffa of Europe) with a firong fleet into Peloponefus. Who entring the guife of Corinth, at his first comming layd siege to Naupactum, now called Lepanto, a city flanding in the gulfe of Corinth, in the countrey of Ozolar neer vnto Locris, ouer against Peloponelus. Antonhus Lauretanus (for his late good feruice done in defending of Scodra, made Admiral for the Venetians) came with speed to Naupactum, and in despight of the enemy so famished the city both with men and what societelse was needfull, that the Passa now out of hope to win the city, rose vpon the sudden with his army, and in a great fury departed, after he had lien there foure months. In this fret returning towards Constantinople, he put certain c companies of his men to thore in the Island of Lemnos, in hope to have voon the fudden furprised the City of Coccinum: but as they were about to have entred, they were contrary to their expectation, manfully relisted by such Christians as by chance were next the gate:where the notable courage of Marulla (a maiden of that city) was much commended who feeing her father flain in the gate, tooke vp the weapons that lay by him, and like a fierce Amazon notablyreuenged his death, desperatly fighting in desence of her countrey, with those sew which were there at the first; and so kept the Turks out, vntill the rest of the citisens (moved with the alarme) came to the gate, and forced them not without forme loffe, to retyre again to their gallies, Not long after, Lauretanus came thither with his fleet; but before his comming, the Baffa was departed thence for Constantinople, having in this expedition don nothing that was exn peded at his hands.

Missouri after the death of Scanderbeg ceased not from time to time by one of his great captains or other to inuade Epirus, and the other parts of Albania; and to gaining fomtime one part, and sometime another, had subdued most part thereof. And about this time his army lay at the fiege of Croia: for reliefe wherof, the Venetians (in whose protection it was) sent Fran- croid befired essem Contarenus, a noble gentleman their lieutenant, with such forces as were sufficient for the by the Turkes raising of the siege. He finding the Turks in the plaine of Tyranna, gaue them battell; which agreat while stood doubtful: at length victory inclining to the Venetians, the Turks began to flie; afterwhom the Venetians made no great pursuit, but contented to have put them to flight, took their tents, with such forts as they had raised against the City. Thus whilest the E Venetians thinke themselves in sure possession of the victory, & out of seare of their enemies, theywere through their own too much security, by and by themselves overthrown: For whilst the common fouldiers having their minds more set vpon the spoyle, than vpon the pursuit of the enemy (the battell as yet scarce ended) scatter themselves, and the captaines were consulting, whether they should lodge that night (which began then to approch) in the enemies tents, or not in the midft of their consultation, the Turks having perceived their disorder, suddenly returned againe upon them, and without great reliffance ouerthrew them, and put them to flight. In which flight a thou fand of them fell, among it whom Contarenus the Generall, and Contarenus the diversorhers of good place and calling, were flain alfo. This overthrow the Venetians tooke Venetian General Residence a great deale better than that which shortly after followed in the confines of Italy, at the ri-F ver of Sontium.

Mahomet having conquered a great part of Albania, and dayly incroaching upon the Christians, made divers incursions into the countries of Dalmatia, Histria, and Carniola; yea, and somtimes went so far, that he and his Turks entred into the province of Friuli, called in antientime, Forum Iulii, a part of the Venetian seigniory, and so carried away with them many prisoners, with much spoyle. For remedy whereof, the Venetians with exceeding charge and G wonderful labour fortified along it the river of Sontium, from Goritia, to the fens of Aquilea the space of twelve intles, and there built two Forts, wherin they continually kept strong garrifons for the defence of the country. Wherby the country people thinking themselves now in fafety, began to fall into fecurity (the dangerous ficknes of all common weales) neglecting by their carefull watch to forefee a far off the enemies comming, as they had before yied. It fortuned at this time, that Afa-Beg (whom some call Marbecke) one of the Turks great Cantaines, upon the fudden when no fuch thing was feared, came and shewed himselfe in an euening you the further fide of the river Sontium, with 1000 horfmen: you the fight of whom an alarm was raifed in both forts, and every man put himfelfe in readines, as if he should even prefently have joyned battelibut it was fo nigh night, as that nothing could then be done; yet H the Venetian garrifons ioyning themselves together, watcht all that night in arms. There was at that time in both those forts, 3000 horsmen, and some few companies of footmen, all ynder the command of Hieronimus Nowel County of Verona:a famous Captaine of that time: who with the rest of the captains resolued if they could, to keep the Turks from passing the river. if not then to give their battell. Marbecke, Generall of the Turks army, taking good view of the place, in the night time fecretly conveyed a thousand of his best fouldiers over the river. fouremiles off, in such a place as the Venetians feared lest, deeming it impossible for any man, there to have passed over. These men he appointed to lie in amoush behind a great hill, in fight, not far from the other fide of the river, & vpon a figne given, prefently to discover themselves, and charge the enemy. The next morning very early, he sent certaine troups of his readiest horsemen ouer the river, which by offring to skirmish with the Venetians, might draw them into the field, and then as men indoubt whither to fight or to fly, to tole them on to the place where the ambuth lay. The Venetians had divided themselves into three battalions; whereof the Generall himselfe had the leading of the first, who seeing these disordred troups comming to skirmith with him, encountred them fiercely, & eafily put them to flight (being fodetermined before) and in that flight earnestly pursued them especially the Counties son, a valiant yong gentleman, who with others like himfelfe, thought by that days good feruice to gain vnto themselues great honour. When the Turks General saw that the Venetians following the chase, were gone a great way from the river, he forthwith passed ouer with the rest of his army, and followed the Venetians at the heels: which the Turk's which before fled, now be- K holding, turned again vpon their fierce enemies, and valiantly withstood them. At which very instant the other Turks upon signegiuen arising out of ambush, came down from the hill Licinis, with such violence and clamour, that the Venetians therewith discouraged, would have fled if they could have told which way but they were on every fide fo befet, that there was no way left for them to chape; but were there all flaine, except fome few which yeelded themsclues, and so were faued. The other two battalions of the Venetians, discouraged with the flaughter of the first, fled incontinently, and in flying were many of them slain. In this battell the County himiclie, with his fon, and many other notable gentlemen, and halfe the horimen the country of were lost. The Turks incouraged with this victory, the next day spoyled all the country of Friuli, betwixt the rivers of Sontium, (otherwise called Lisonzo) and Tiliauentum, and cru- L elly burnt all the country before them, fo that at once 100 country villages were to be seen on a light fire together, which flood so thick, that it seemed as if one continual fire had wholly couered all the face of the countrey. The barbarous Turks laden with the spoyle of that rich countrey, and drining before them great numbers of miserable captines, as if they had been flocks of theep, returned to Sontium. But when they had passed the river, and had travelled homeward one days journey, and all men thought they had now bin quite gon, they fuddenly returned back again, and pofting through the countrey they had before spoyled, came to the river of Tiliauentum, which they desperatly passed, and did no lesse harmeon that side theriuer, than they had before on the other: and fo carrying away with them what they pleafed, returned by the same way they came, having filled all that, part of Italy with terror and searc. M This ouerthrow of Sontium the Venetians account among the greatest losses which they receited from the Turks in all these their long wars.

The next yeare about haruest the Turks came againe with a far greater power: and passing the river of Sontium, came before the forts of Gradisca, where Carolin Fortebrachins lay with a frong garrison of the Venetians, offring him skirmish, so to have drawne him into the field. But the wary captain confidering the great friength of the enemy, and the loffe received the yeare before, would not be drawne out of his strength, but stood vpon his guard, expecting to takethe enemy at some more aduantage : which thing the Turks fearing, durst not disperse themselues abroad for the spoyle of the countrey, leaving so strong a garrison of the enemies behind them. And therfore when they had gone about forty miles into the countrey, they turned their course vp into the mountaines (which are part of the Alps) towards Germany, and there grieuously spoyled the mountainy people; strangely passing through those abrupt and high mountains with their horses, where men could hardly either go or stand on foot without fomething to flay vpon. And fo when they had done what harme they could, taking a great compasse about returned home another way.

first Emperour of the Turks.

Mahamet remembring the shamefull repulse he had about source yeres before received at 14.79 Scodra and having the name of that city dayly founding in his cares determined now once again to gage his whole forces upon the winning thereof, and fo to give peace to his ambitious Vid. Marinum defires. And because he would not again be dishonored with that he purposed to take in hand expus Scohe gaue out order into all parts of his dominions, both in Europe & Afia, for the affembling drong. of his best soldiers and men of war. Now when all things were in readines, and such an army affembled as he seldome or neuer had a stronger; first he sent forth Aly. Beg (Warden of the frontiers of his kingdome along it the river Danubius) with eighty thousand of the souldiers called Achanzij, towards Scodra. These Achanzij are horsmen, which for their good service. according to their deferts, have certain lands given them by the king to live vpon during their C liues for which they are of duty bound to serue upon their owne charge, as the forerunners of the Turke his army, when socuer he goeth to be siege any place : these be they which first enter into the enemies countrey, burning and spoyling what they can, untill they come to the place appointed: and have this priviledge, That fo foon as all the army is come vnto the place to be besieged, they may then at their pleasure either depart or stay.

The Gouernor of Scodra vnderstanding both by common fame and certaine intelligence, of the Turks designes, with al care & diligence fortified the town, labouring continually both night and day at the rampiers, as if the enemy had bin already present; and plentifully prouidedall things necessary for the induring of a long siege. The aged and unnecessary people he n fentout of the city into other places of more fafety farther off:in whose flead he took in great numbers of strong and able men which dwelt in the country round about among whom were many mariners taken out of the gallies, and other men of like quality, which got their liuing vpon the riuer and lake of Scodra, lufty bodies enured to hardnesse, who in the long siege following did great feruice.

While this preparation was making in Scodra, behold, the mountaines a far off North. The poore count ward from the city, began to thine with many great fires, and all the country was couered with for fiare of the thicke smoake, which every houre seemed to draw necrer and necrer; when within short time This. after, the poore country people (which as yet were not all fled) with fuch trash as they could wel carry came running for life all ouer the country to the strong cities upon the sea side, cry-E ing out that the Turks were come.

The next day, which was the fourteenth of May, Aly Beg with his eighty thousand Achanzij, came into the suburbs of the city, and there incamped; so that none could goe in or out of the gates: which was not the lest part of his charge. To him, by the commandment of Mahomet, had Scander. Beg gouernor of Bosna, and Malcotius with seuen thousand horsemen joined themselves upon the way. Of this Malcotius it is reported (as was of Augustus) that the maiesty of his countenance, with the resplendant beames issuing out of his eyes (as if it had bin the rayes of the Sun)were of fuch piercing brightnes, that no man was able with immooued and fixed eye long to behold the same. These horsmen (the forerunners, as I said, of Mahomets great army) the Christians much troubled, with often fallies and shor, out of the town, and slew many of them F with little or no loffe vnto themselues.

When Aly. Beg had thus lien before the city tendaies, came Taut Gaiola the great Bassa of Constantinople with five and twenty thousand souldiers, and about twelve thousand camels, for most part laden with metrall in masse, for to make great Ordnance of, and other necesfaries for the camp. The Baffaes great and stately Tent of purple colour, was pitched vpon

the top of an high tall called the Bassaces hill, because in that place Solyman Bassa had lienin G the former fiege about foure yeres before: the Baffa's army lay incamped betwixt the fame hil and the towne. This Taus Gaids was borne in Epirus of base parentage, and was from thence by the Turks carried away young to Constantinople; where for his sharpnesse of wit and rare activity be grew into fuch lauor, first with Mahomet, and afterward with Bajazet his sonne, that he was by them promoted to the greatest places of honour, next vnto themselues : wherein le b. came lo popular, & had so possessed of the hearts of the people, that it was suspected of some he would have afpired to the Turkish Empire himselfe. Presently after the comming of this great Baffa, workmen were fet a work about the casting of the great ordnance, and making readie of other things for the fiege. The Christians also were no lesse busie about their fortifications, the Gouernor appointing to enery man his charge, and which part of the wall to defend: H yet keeping continually in the market place certain companies (with the enfignes of S. Marke and S. Stephen) to fetue as freth fupplies, as need or occasion should require. Whilst the great ordnance was in cathing, the Baffa caufed a great bridge of timber to be made ouer the river. that so he might at his pleasure passe ouer his men, and command both sides of the river. The Christians in the mean time with vigilant eleso attending the Turks, that none of them could flir within thot, but he was forthwith fet off and flaine.

The thirteenth of lune, Mustapha the Beglerbeg or Viceroy of Asia (commonly called the great Baffa of Natolia) came also in great pompe to the siege with thirty thousand souldiers brought out of Afia: personable men, but not counted so good soldiers as they of Europe; for is a common faying among the Turks, That the men of Europe, and the horses of Asia do I best service. This great Bassa was honorably met and welcommed by the other great Bassa of Constantinople, and was quartered upon another side of the city, where his rich paullion (all of Green) was pitcht in a vineyard about a mile from the town, Mustapha to proue the courage o: his fouldiers, propounded a reward to which focuer of them, as durst adventure but to goe and touch the wals of the city:vpon which occasion, two of his foldiers passing well mounted. attempted to have performed that enterprise. But making what hast they could possibly, they were both flain from the wall, and one of their bodies recoursed by certaine valiant fouldiers which fallyed out of the towne, and his head being cut off, was voon a launce fet voon the wals for the Turks to behold.

The fifteenth of Iune, 5600 Ianizaries came into the camp, with four white enfignes: at K whose comming all the souldiers of both the Bassa's camps gaue a wonderfull shout, and welcomed them with greatioy. These are the great Turks guard and best souldiers, in whom the greatest through of his kingdom consisteth, and are called the sons of the great Sultan. After whose comming, Mahomer himselfe was daily expected. Three dayes after, came two other great men, attended upon with a number of followers, who by their countenance, and the great reuerence done vnto them by the rest of the Turks, seemed to be men of great place and authority: these in a desired, that they might with safety speake with the Gouernour of the City, and the rest of the Captaines, to deliver vnto them such a message, as they had for their good (as they faid) brought vnto them from Mahomet. Which their request being granted, the elder of them, after he had with many glorious words fet forth the power of his Mafter, and L what he had done to other great Cities, with their Princes; and further shewed into what danger they were like to fall, if they should long stand vpon their desence : he began to persuade them to yeeld up the City, affuring them of all kind vlage, with many rich rewards from the great Emperor; whereas otherwife, they were to expect nothing but extreme mifery and most hameful death. Wherunto answer was in the name of them all given by the mouth of Petrus Pagnanus, a grave and worthy citisen, That they were not afraid of the greatnesse of Mahomet, or of any thing he had done or could doe; and that he thould find it hard to inforce them, but impossible to persuade them to deliuer their city; and therefore that he might at his pleasure vie his forces against men fully resolued rather to yeeld vnto nature her last due, than to hearken to any composition : and in conclusion told them, that if they should at any time after M make any fuch motion, they should not expect any other answer than from the mouth of the Canon With which thort answer these great men departed, not a little discontented.

At this tame time the strong city of Croia (which the worthy Sanderbeg had living so honorably detended, and dying had left it with his kingdome, in the protection and possession of the Venetians) having holden out a yeres fiege, after that all the kingdome of Epirus & most nart of Albania was loft, for lack of victuals was yeelded up unto the Turke, upon condition. That the hungerstarued defendants (who then seemed rather ghosts than men) might at their pleasure in safety depart: which agreement the faithlesse Turke brake, and without mercy put them all to the fword. This heavy news was delivered to them of Scodra, by certain Christians in the Turks camp: wherewith they were much gricued, but nothing at all discouraged.

Whiles the Turks thus lay at the fiege, the watermen, of whom a great number lived vnon the great lake of Scodra (being in circuit about an hundred miles) came many times downe the river by night, and did much harme in the Turks campifor remedy whereof, they were inforced to build certain small gallies to keep them in, who for all that, many times stole secretly vpon them, and much troubled them.

The two and twentieth of Iune, the Turks mounted two great peeces of ordnance vpon the ton of the hill wheron the Basia lay, whereof the one carried a buller, made of an hard kind of round flone of three hundred pound weight, & the other a bullet of foure hundred, wher with they began to batter the towne foure daies: after that, they placed a third peece of Artillery at the foot of the fame hil, which delivered a bullet of foure hundred pound weight; and the next day they planted a fourth peece greater than the rest about the middle of the same hill which caried a fhot of fix hundred and fifty pound weight. In this while, eight thousand of the Turks foldiers, called Afapi (which are known from the Ianizaries by their red caps, whereas the Ianizaries weare white) came into the camp. And shortly after came Mahomet himselfe with all c his army to the river of Drimon, whither the two great Bassacs of Asia and Constantinople went with great pomp and triumph to meet him.

The fecond of July, Mahomet with all his army before the rifing of the Sunne came to the mahomet is campebefore Scodra: whereafter he had well viewed the scituation thereof the is reported to print simple have faid, O what a faire and stately place hath the Eagle chosen out for her selfeto build her neast, and the segret so. to batch her young ones in. Divers rich paullions were fet up for Mahomet himselfe, but one far the greater than the rest, distant from them about a slight shot, which was the place wherein he Majorital held his councell; the other were for his owne privat vic. Round about thefe his tents, lay the sampe. lanizaries incamped, a good distance off-yet so close one to another, as if it had bin a perpetuall rampire or firong trench, whereinto was but one entrance, continually garded with a most n firong guard. Round about the Ianizaries lay all the rest of the army encamped: so that all the countrey as farre as a man could fee was courred, and white with tents, much like as when the ground in Winter is couered over with a deepe fnow: and still more people reforted to the campedayly; so that it was deemed by men of great experience, that Mahomet had then in his army of all forts of people, about 350000 men, all gaping to denoure that poor city: a fight of it selse sufficient to have danted the courage of right valiant men but what can be terrible to them that feare not to die? Against this terror of the enemy, the defendants were notably encouraged by the comfortable persuasions and exhortations of one Bartholomeus, a Preacher, (sometimes one of the worthy Scanderbegs souldiers) who afterwards giving himselfe to the fludy of divinity, became a zealous Preacher, and in this fiege did notably comfort the Chri-E stian defendants against the terror of so great an army of miscreants. Althis while the battery was still maintained; and the fifth of July the Turks mounted two other great peeces, wherof the one was like vnto the former before mounted, but the other placed upon the middle of the Bassa's mount, was of an incredible greatnes, discharging a shot of twelve hundred pound weight, and was called the Princes peece, in whose name it was with much cunning and induftry madewith which huge peece, the Turks even from the beginning of the fiege had threatned the belieged, willing them to expect the comming of the Princes peece. The next day they planted upon the same mount a seuenth peece, which carried a shot of fine hundred and fifty pound weight : from which time they battered the city with the aforesaid senen great pecces, and ceased not oftentimes by night out of their great mortar peeces, to cast great bals of wild fire into the city, so to have set it on fire: wherby divers of the citizens were inforced to vacouer their houses couered with shingle, and by men appointed for that purpose, to watch the fall of fuch fire-workes, and fo to quench the fame : which they fo carefully looked to, as that the deuise of the enemy took no effect at all. At the same time also the Turks out of their hore mortar peeces, cast huge great stones of incredible weight, which falling from hie,d'd

most terribly crush in peeces what socuer thing they light upon, wherewith the defendants G were wonderfully troubled. In few dayes after, the enemy mounted three other great peeces. whereof one was greater than that was called the Princes, and carried a bullet of thirteen bundred weight : from which time they dayly battered the city with ten such peeces, as the like hath (eldome times bin heard of and the arrows fell to thick into the city, as if it had bin continuall showres of haile, so that no man could well goe or stir in the streets without hurt. Yet in the middest of all these dangers the Christians valiantly desended the city, and with their deadly that from the wals and mounts exceedingly anoyed the enemy. The eleventh of July the Turks mounted another great peece like vnto the former, vpon the Baffa's mount, and the same day battered the wals with a hundred seventy eight shot of this huge artillery.

Muhomet having by the fury of his great ordnance, beaten down a great part of the wall, and H that now nothing stood in his way but such simple repaires as the defendants had made of timber & planks, with earth cast in betwixt, was in good hope in short time to becom master of the townerand therefore sent certain companies of his Ianizaries and other foldiers (which he with continual supplies of fresh men stil relieued) to assault the breaches, so if it were posfible to enter the towne, or at least wife to burn such fortifications of timber as the defendants had made. But that which seemed vnto him at first so easie, he found in execution full of difficulty and danger: for the Turks approaching the breach, found there resolute men, a surer defence than any wall:whose valiant courage served in stead of a strong bulwarke. So whilst the Turks desperatly striue in the sace of the breach either to enter or to set fire you the new fortifications made for most part of timber, and the defendants with no lesse resolution downat I they may to the etmost to repulse them, many were on both sides slaine, but especially of the affailants, Which Mahomet well perceiving, and that by that manner of affault he gained nothing but notable losse and spoyle of his best men, caused a retreat to be sounded, and his bat. tery to be againe forthwith renewed, every day shaking the wall with 160 or 180 most terririble great shot, and one day with 194, the greatest battery that he made in one day during that

After this great battell, the tyrant caused a fresh assault to be given, but with little or rather wor fe successe than before: for though divers of the defendants, and among them, some of good place, as Franciscus Patauinus, Franciscus Scorbaro, two Italian captains, and some other of the better fort of the citizens were there flain with the great shot, wherof the enemy that day K discharged into the breaches 193, yet were they with greater losse insorced agains to retire, and with shame to give over the assault.

Notwithstanding this repulse, Mahomet continuing his batterie with no lesse fury than before, still fought by force of his artillery to open a way into the city: and the third day after the former affault, gaue a more furious and desperar attempt vnto the city than before, infomuch that the Turkes were in the breaches come to handy strokes with the Christians, and there made a most cruell and deadly fight; wherein many fell on both sides, but of the Turks moft; yet were there many of the Christians also slaine, especially with the Turks great ordnance. It was a right ruthfull fight to have feen the rampiers at the great gate of the city beaten down flat to the ground, and to lie ful of the rent bodies of the Christians sat which place L the enemy so preuailed, that he was even now ready to have entred; for the Turks so furiously assailed the defendants, and the murthering shot from the Bassa's mount fell so thicke and so terribly into the breach, beside the infinit number of arrows, that there was scarce any of the Christians which desended that place, but they were either slain or grieuously wounded. But when all feemed now most desperat and forlorn, and the greedy enemy even ready to devoure his prey, a new supply of lusty fouldiers well armed, came couragiously to the breach, and as Lyons encountring the enemy, draue him down again, and fo inforced him with great loffe to retire. Mahomet gricued with this repulfe, in his fury caused 173 great shot to be discharged into the city, and afterwards fending for his great Baffa's, and other his principall men of war, declared vnto them his mind, as followeth: pelag toginea

> I thinke none of you are ignorant (right worthy foldiers) that now it is the third month fince this city hath by us bin most fireitly belieged, and with all manner of Artillery and engines of war impugned, affaulted, and on every fide affailed, the wals thereof viterly subnerted, and the bulwarkes layd flat with

A the ground, and (as you see) us good as rased besides that, so oft as we have set fire upon their fortresses. Coften we have provoked them of Scodra to fight, and have also much vexed them with affaults. Last of all de you know, we have left nothing unproued, nothing unattempted, which could be desifed, the easilier to outscome them, being wearted, worne out, and their strength (pent. Wherefore (in mine opinion) the matter unot longer to be put off or delayed, but even to morrow before the enemy can recover his Arenoth or repaire his breaches, let us inclose the city round, and give them a general and terrible assault and therfore every one of you make your selves ready, and exhort your souldiers in the camp, that they every one of them to morrow with the dawning of the day come forth armed and well appointed for the winning of the city. Now will I proue and know them that are worthy of my pay. Thou the Baffa of Constantinople, with the lauadrons and certain companies of the Ianizaries our faithfull guard give charge unto the breach: B in the mean time, let the Baffa of Afia with his power affault the other parts of the city: let enery man make ready and bring with bim what fo is needfull for this generall effault; my mind queth mee, that to marrow before this time we shall win the city: for who is there can relist vs? The town (as you (ce) is bared both of wall and all other defence: the bulwarkes and ditches are laid euch; and an case way for ws to come unto it the conzens themselves weary with so many fights and assaults, faint and want strength: whereas we are fill fresh and lusty: they in number few, we almost innumerable: besides that, we farre passe them in theforce of our artillery, wherewith many of them shall perish in the defending of the breaches. Who then cangainsay, but that they of Scodra are already our prisoners ? Where, upon such as remaine aline, I will at my pleasure wee the law of armes and captimity. On therefore couragious hearts without further delay. Is not the very name of Scodra hatefull vnto vs ? For which of you doth not with great disdaine call to r remembrance the death of your parents or brethren, or friends, or companions, cruelly flaine under these wals? Can you diffelt your hatred against them of Scodra? And so many slaughters of your friends by them made? But to forget elder times, and the harms received from them long lince, let vs but look voon our late flang hters and wounds as it were yet bleeding : it is not yet full four eyeres fince that we made war with the semen of Scodra, wherein so many thousands of our people fell, that their slaughterr is yet almost obietts to our eyes, and their bloud crawing revenge. This very hill whereon we ftand, and the stones yes lume besprinckled and pollute a with their bloud. Wherefore haste you as men of courage: Take up armes valiantly mount the hill, affault the town, and revenge your old injuries. Glut your sclues to the full in the effusion of the Christian bloud, whereunts our lawes do so much exhort us, and doe what you may with forceand (word that not one of them of Scodra be left aline : which you may eafily bring to passe, having D all things therunto needfull for there is nothing to with frand you, nothing wanting for the gaining of the villory. All things are prepared, all things are ready: an easie matter it is for a strong manto ouercome the weake and feeble, that wanteth strength, as do they.

This speech of the barbarous tyrant, was received with great applause and good liking of the hearers: and now was Scodra to be with all might and main affailted, and not a man there left aline. Herupon proclamation was made throughout the camp, That curry man vpon pain of death should be ready against the appointed time: and the great captains and commanders of the army departing from Mahomei, went up to the top of the hill whereon the Bassa lay, and from thence taking view of the city, & laying their heads together, consulted how they might best give the assault. The defendants on the other side alwaies expecting their enemies houeringouer their heads; left nothing vadone that they could possibly deuise, for the defence of themselues and the city. Now vpon the top of the Bassaes mount, was a royall paulion ereeted, richly couered with purple, from whence the proud tyrant might plainly behold all the affault, who with the dawning of the day (being the 22 of July) entring the fame, the Turks who in the couert of the night had conucied themselves as neere unto the wals as they could, vpon the signall of battell given by a tire of ordnance discharged from the Bassaes mount, Thecity of See fuddenly ran to the breaches as thicke as Bees, in hope by their fudden approch to have taken dra affaulted the Chifdian to the breaches as thicke as Bees, in hope by their fudden approch to have taken dra affaulted the Christians at some advantage, wherin they were much deceived. For they alwaies doub- the family time ting such a matter, and carefully observing the least motion of the enemy, were alwaies in rea-F dires to meet with their attempts: fo that the Turks desperatly striuing to gain the breaches, and the Christians valiantly defending the same, there was in divers places begun a most cruell and mortall fight: but especially neere vnto the great gate, where the fury of the cannon had made the wals most faultable. There the enemy was come to fight hand to hand, and pre-nathing vpon the defendants, had let vp one of the Turks enfignes vpon the top of the rampi. G creawhich Mulomes beholding, reioyced exceedingly, thinking the city now as good as taken But the Christians seeing the danger, speedily repaired thither with new supplies, & by plain force draue the enemy out againe, and beat him from the rampiers. Vpon them also that were comming vp, they call downe peeces of timber, great stones, wildfire, pots of lime, and such o. ther things as might most annoy them: as for shot, none fell invaine by reason of the wonderfull multitude of the Turks, who food fo thicke, that a man could hardly have cast downer grain of mustard seed from the wal but it must needs have light upon some of them:by which means the Turks were notably repulsed, their ensigne pluckt down, and they inforced to retire from the wals. Which fudden alteration Mahomet perceiving, fell into a great rage, and forthwith commanded his great ordnance, with greater fury than ever, to be discharged into the H breach : and with great words commanded the two chiefe Bassaes which stood by him voon the mount, to go presently downe and inforce the souldiers which were already retired, to returne again to the affault. These great commanders seeing the tyrant in such a fret, forthwish descended from the hil, and where persuasion would not serue, with their drawn swords inforced the foldiers to returne back again to the affault. The Turks knowing that they were now in the eye of their King, and in the presence of their greatest commanders, striue with might and main to win the rampiers : for in that place, the wals of the city were beaten downe to the ground. thaken before this affault with 2539 that of the cannon or other peeces of no leffe force. The Christians likewise in desence of themselves and their city, with inuincible courage opposed themselues against the Turks: so that a more desperat fight than there was hard- I ly euer to be seen, desperat men with desperat hand assailing one another; and the more to increase the terrour of theday, the thundring shot, with the clamour of men, and noise of the instrumens of war, was so great, as if heaven and earth should have presently fallen together, and arrowes falling into the city as if it had bin showres of raine, oftentimes darkned the light of the day. In this dreadfull fight many of the defendants were flain; but of the Turks, twenty to one. Neer unto that gate, where this terrible affault was given, were certain loupes hewne out of the maine rocke, which flanked the ditch all along ft that fide of the city, out of which the Christians with their murdering shot made lanes among st their enemies, and slew them without number. For all that, the mighty Bassace and great captains, one while by persuasion, another while by threatning, still forced them forward, & if any turned back, prefently slew him: K so that the Turks seeing no lesse danger in retiring than in fighting against the enemy, like desperat men thrust forward by heaps, and were slain without number. Yet still pressing on so long as life lasted, and others stepping forward in stead of them that were slaine, they began againe to preuaile vpon the defendants (who in that place were for most part either slaine or hurt) and againe recoursed the top of the rampiers, and there admanced the Turks enfignes. Then began the tyrant to lift up his head, making fure account that the city was now his own. But as the common faying is, he that reckoneth without his holt, must reckon twife, so chanced it to Mahomet. For the companies, from the beginning of the slege left in the market place ready for all cuents, and oftentimes withing for fome occasion wherein to thew themselves being now in good time aductifed of the imminent danger, came with speed to the place of L the assault before the Turks had taken good footing; and there valiantly encountring them, flew a great number of them, and forced the rest from the rampiers; and plucking downe their enfignes before fet up, in stead of them placed their own. With which repulse the Turkswere fo difmaied, that they quite for fooke the affault, and in despight of their imperious commanders, not expecting any figne of retrait, in hast retired to the campe. Mahomet fallen from so great an hope, and grieued about measure with this shamefull repulse, returned into his pauillion fretting and furning as a man halfe mad, where two dayes he tormented himfelfewith his own passions, not admitting any man to his presence. The Christians afterwards took the spoyle of the dead Turks, and cutting off divers of their heads, set them vp vpon poles round about the city, to the terror of their fellows. In this affault were 12000 of the Turks flain, and M many mo wounded. Of the Christians were lost 400 and of them that came to the breach, efcaped none, but he was wounded more or leffe.

After that Mihomet had two daies difgested the last repulse, the shame wherof grieued him more than the losse it selfe; he sent for both the great Bassacs of Constantinople and Asia, and other two of his chiefe Counsellors, with whom he resolved to give another affault, and thereon to gige his whiche forces fonthey were all of opinion with him, That the defendants were foweikned & walled with the former alfault, that they could not possibly hold out another Wheteupon firaight commandment was gluen through the camp that every man withon exception flould be ready to go to the affault whenfoeuer they were called upon; and the more to incourage the foldlers, great rewards and preferments were promifed to them which intime of the affault flighted performe any speciall peece of service. The first appearance of The Turk shi the new Moone (which the Turks worthip with great denotion) was the time that Mahomet perfittionfly rehad appointed for this general affault in the mean time he spared not to poure out his fury a. new Monie. painft the wals and rampiers of the towne, by the mouth of the cannon. The Christian defen-& dants on the other fide, first by hearty prayer commended themselves and their City to the Meredion of the Almighey, and afterwards with reflecte labour and no small perill, speedily maired and new fortified whatfoeuer the fury of the Artillery had ouerthrowne or fliaken: Whiteling nothing that could be done or deuised for the desence of themselves and their city. Newas food as the new Moone began to thew her felfe, the Mahometan Priests going about thearmy, gaue the foldiers knowledge thereof (as their maner is) by finging of a fong in manintof a procession; whethinto the whole army answered with a short responde, but with such a terible noise as was wonderfull to heare; and at the same time bowing themselves to the ground, failured the Moon with great superstition. All their fond ceremonies performed, they began to draw nigh the city fo thicke, and in number fo many, that all the ground for the space C of amile round about Scodra, was thick couered with men. The Christians expecting every house to be assailed, were ready upon the wals and rampiers of the City, to repulse the enemie: but effecially at the great gate where most danger was feared, for that the Turks with their great ordinance had made that place of all others most saultable. Here Iacobus Monsta a hoble captain, with his brother Mondinus a valiant gentleman, tooke upon them to receive the fift affault, which is commonly of all others most terrible: for the Turks vie in their affaults togice three attempts, whereof the first is most furious and dangerous, as performed by their bell fouldiers: the other two are of leffe force; but if they faile in all three, they for fake the enterprise as men discouraged. Whilest both the affailants and defendants stood thus in readines, the one as it were facing the other a great part of the night, Mahomet before day went D wto the top of the Baffa's mount, from whence he had before beholden the former affault : at wholecomming there were presently 11 canons discharged, and 12 smaller pieces (the signall scodes, against appointed for the affault.) The Turks upon this figne given, with exceeding tumult and most affaulted by hideous outcry (as their manner is) began to affaile the City round, and with fuch wonderfull the Turker agility of body and courage mounted the rampiers at the great gate, that they had there as it were in a trice fet up one of their enlignes, which was forthwith pluckt up by Moneta, and the Turks with great flaughter driven down, where many of them were flain with stones, timber, fire, and such other things cast down vpon them; beside a great number slain or wounded with shot, arrows, and darts, whereof none fell to the ground in vain, by reason that the Turks stood to thicke, that they violently preffed one another forward, in such fort, that the formost could E by no meanes shun any danger, were it never so great or terrible. In this fort the assault was with great flaughter of the Turks continued untill it was day, they striving to win the breach, and the Christians most valiantly defending the same. Moneta himselfe in this fight received divers wounds, and was twice beaten down to the ground, yet still recovering himselfe, incou. taged his foldiers, and worthily repulsed the enemy. Mahomet seeing his soldiers beaten from the breach, caused a tyre of his great Ordnance to be discharged upon the Christians which flood therein thick for the defence therof, by force whereof many of them were rent in pieces, and the rest fore dismayed which the Turks quickly perceiving, and the rewith incouraged came on againe with a fresh charge, forcing themselves to the vemost to have entred. But the valiant captain nothing discouraged either with the losse of them that were slain, or the danger of himselfe, valiantly with stood the furious enemy, and maintained the place till new suppliescame to relieue him, & departed nor thence, nor suffred any man to depart, til the assault was ended. Many were flain on both fides; yet nothing troubled the defendants fo much as the greatordnance, which being discharged from the Bassa's mount, into the breach, when as the Turks were driven back, flew many of the Christians, leaving the breach almost cleere: fo gi-

uing occasion for the Turks to have entred, had not other couragious foldiers stept vp in stead G of them that were flain, who manfully repulfed the enemy. The tyrant from the mount feeing the inuincible courage of the defendants, was therewith exceedingly troubled; but fully refolued now or neuer to haue it commanded all his forces to be drawne from all other parts of the city, to the great gate, there to renew the affault, freitly charging his captains, neuer to return thence vntill they had taken the city. Hereupon the greatest part of that huge army was forthwith in the fight of himselfe brought to the appointed place, and there gaue a sharpand cruel affault at the breach, with such desperat sury, that in short time they had slain most of the detendants there prefent, and advanced divers of their enfignes upon the top of the rampiers. Which Mahamet beholding from the Mount, rejoiced exceedingly, making fure account, that the city was now his own: but by that time he had well conceived this hope, new supplies of H fresh and couragious men(of purpose reserved for all events) came to the place of danger and with great resolution encountring the wearied Turks, draue them backe, cleared the breach and ouerthrew the enfignes. Which fo fudden an alteration in the breach, wrought no leffe alteration in the proud tyrants mind, his hope was turned into despaire, and his joy into cho-The Author . ler : infomuch that in his fury he commanded all the great artillery to be at once discharged into the breach, whereby many of his forward and couragious fouldiers were flaine together with the defendants. At the same time the great commanders & captains knowing themselves to be in the eie of their imperious lord and master, with their drawne swords forced the poore foldiers again forward to the breach; and the more to encourage them, aduentured themselves also among them : whereby the fight became more fierce and terrible than before. Many of I the Turks were there flaine; yet fuch was the force and multitude of them which still steps up in their place, and bullets and arrowes flew so thicke, that the defendants oppressed with multitude, and ouerwhelmed with thor, were hardly able longer to maintain the place, being for most part either slain or wounded. Wherupon a great cry ran vpon the sudden thorow the city, that every man without exception flould forthwith repaire to the breach. Which was with such cheerfulnes done, that in lesse time than was to have bin thought, a wonderfull multitude of all forts of people was there met together, encouraging one another against the prefent danger; who all as men resolued to lay downe their lives in desence of their country, valiantly encountred the Turks vpon the top of the rampiers, and so hardly laid vnto them, that notwithstanding their great number, they began now again to waver and shrinke back. Which K thing the tyrant perceiving from the mount, in great rage commanded his canoniers, as fast as they could to discharge the great ordnance into the breach, without regard of his owne men, so that together with them he might also kil some of the Christians: and withall imperiously commanded his captaines, with all their force and power to maintaine the affault, threatning them with most horrible death, if they returned without victory. Hereupon the affault was againe renewed, enery man (in shew at least) fet downe thereto doe his last deuoite. But the great ordnance still playing upon the breach, slew many of the Turks as well as of the Christians. Thrice the great fhot fell among ft the Turks themselves, and rent in sunder a great number of them which was formost, to the great discouragement of the rest : whereof the tyrant had imall regard, so that together with them he might also diminish the number of the desen- L clants. Neuerthelesse, such was the desperat sury of the enemy, that the city was in no small danger to have been presently taken, had not fresh supplies come from other parts of the city which they were appointed vnto; who with great courage refifted the enemy. Yet the Turks far exceeding in number (and fresh men continually stepping up in stead of them which lay by heaps under their feet, and serued them in stead of steps to get up to the rampiers) maintained a long and terrible fight: at which time the great ordnance also fore annoyed the defendants, for that with one shor (whereby the greatnesse of the harmes done at other times may be gathered) eighteene of the Christian desendants were slaine. As for arrowes, they slew as thicke as haile into the city, to that they obscured the light of the day, and lay in most places of the fircet a spanthicke : so that sor the space of a moneth after, the inhabitants vsed no other fu- M. ell to burne, but Turkish arrowes. It was a ruthfull sight, to have seene the bodies of the valiant Christians tent in funder with the great shot, and pieces of them cleaning upon euery wall thereabout, enery fireet was stained with their bloud, the great ordnance continually thundred, Churches and houses came ratling downe, yea, the heavy countenance of the air it self seemed to bewail the misery of the poor Christians: besides, the noise of trumpets, drums, and other instruments of War, with the horrible cry of the hellish Turks was so great and hideous, that it feemed as if heaven and earth should have gon together: nothing was to be heard but the very terrour of the car, nothing to be feen but death, and the inftruments of death. And in this extremity a great cry ran through the City, That without present help all would be lost at the great gate: wherupon not only they which were whole (which were the fewest in number) but they also which lay wounded or sick in their beds, chering themselves vp, with weapons in their hands ran with speed to the place where the danger was chusing rather there to die, than to be slain in their beds. Thus whilst the Christians of all sorts, and from all parts of the city ran desperatly to the gate, the Turks were on every side hardly pres-R fed, and in great number flain: yet fresh men fil comming vp, as if they had sprung out of the earth, the deadly fight was by them stil maintained; for the Turks on the one side for sear of thervrant, laboured with might and main to win the City : and the Christians on the other. knowing no hope left for them if they should be ouercome, with no lefferesolution defended the same. In this obstinacy of minds many fel on both sides ; somtime the Turks seemed to Adoubles haue the better, and were fraitway by the Christians put to the worse. Which maner of mor. fight. tal fight with doubtful event was continued most part of that day; until that at length many being on both parts slain, and the rest for the most part fore wounded and hurt, the fury of the affault began to asswage: for the Turks now weary of that long and deadly fight, and fainting with their wounds, had no great stomack to mount up the rampiers, where they faw no hope C to prenail, but all things threatning prefent death, Mahomet beholding the wonderful flaughterof his men, and that having don what was possible, they now fought as men discouraged; and in dispair of victory himself, caused a retreit to be sounded : which the Turks no sooner heard, but that they left the affault, and without order ran to their Tents as men half feared out of their wits.

Of this victory the Christians (as they had good reason) rejoiced greatly; yet was this joy mingled with much forow and heavines, for the loffe of fuch worthy men as were flain in that affault, many of whose bodies they were glad to gather up by piece-meale, some here; some there, some cleaning on this wal, and some on that, which they as the time would give leave, honorably buried with the rest of the slain. At which time also they with all diligence & exn pedition repaired their breaches, and put all things in such readinesse as if they should have

presently received a fresh assault. Mahomet wonderfully gricued with the shameful dishonor and great losse he had received at the last affault, repented himself that ever he had taken the matter in hand, wishing that he had neuer heard of the name of Scodmand in his choler and frantick rage most horribly blafphemed against God; most wickedly saying, That it were enough for him to have care of heavenly things, and not to croffe him in his earthly, actions which fury hee defeended from the mount, and got him into his Tent, where he again tonmented himfelf with his melancholy passions by the space of two daies, wherin he would neither be spoke withall, or admit any man to his presence. Vpon the third day be called a general Councel of his commanders and best souldiers, and therupon openly before them all said, That hee was determined togive the enemy a fresh assault, for that being weakned with so many assaults, hee could not polibly beable to hold out another; and therefore he hoped for an eafie victory. But he had no fooner fo fayd, but all they that heard him, cried out with one voice to the contrary, faying that it was not by any means to bee attempted, for a fmuch as his best fouldiers were already fain, and the greater part of them that were left, either fore wounded, or brought vnto that Weaknes, that they were not able to do any more feruice : and that therefore it were better for them to kilone another, or els himself to kill them one by one, than to expose them to bee framefully butchered by the Christians. In this diversities of opinions, Achmetes Bassa the great Champion of the Turks (a man reucrend and of great authority, for his birth, yeares, and rare experience in martiall affaires, and one by whom Mahomet had done great matters flanding vp, with pleafing speech calmed his surious mind, and with substantial reasons perfeeded him to defift from that his intended purpose, and take another surer course, in manner

A notable speech of the great Bassa Achmetes.

G

Your erest valor andworthy praises invincible Emperor (said he) who is able to expresse the orest. nes wherof the mind of man cannot conceive, and my dul first but wonder at :my tongue faltreth to fleak of them neither would this time ferue fo much as to recount them. It is of all men deemed a thing of great honor (most dread Soucraign) when a Prince bath received a king dom from his Aunce stors to be able in (afety to keep and defend the same : greater than this is it, honourably to increase and augment it so left : but of a small thing, by worthy promesset to bring it to the highest type of worldly honour, is of all other earthly things the greatest. Which most rare excellencie all men worthily ascribe to your perfection and felicitie: and I, of all others, can therof bring the most assured testimong, who have often heard it of myne H Ancestors (which followed the Othoman Princes out of Asia into Europ) that your worthy predecessors at their first comming into Europ (without offence be it [aid) possessed but a corner therof. To whom you afterward by divine appointment succeeding, have added so many provinces, king doms, and empires, as were tediom to rehearfethem. For who can worthily expresse, how you have in Europe subdued Constanting. ple, she Imperial city of the East empire, with all Thracia, Achaia, Grecia, Peloponesm, Bautia, Thebes, and the noble city of Athens, the mother and nurse of all good learning. The empire of Trapezond with the Emperor therofic by you ouerthrown : The king doms of Servia and Bosna, with the princes of Peloponefur are by you glorioufly vanquished. You have at your command twelve Kingdoms in Asia the leffer. Pontus, Bythinia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria, Lydia, Phrygia, Nicomedia, and Nicea with the samous city of Prusa. Beside these, lonia, Doris, Smyrna, Colophon, Ephesus, Miletum, Halicarnaffun, Pergamun, with the country of Taurica are under your subjection. The great countrey of Armenia hath tels your force : the Islands of Lesbos, Chios, and Eubara are parts of your empire. What should I beak of infinit people and nations by you most victorionsly vanquished? This may suffice for all, That you have gained from the Christians twenty provinces, and two hundred great cities. For it were too long to rehearse the Mahometan Kings and princes by you also vanquished . In all your expeditions all things have yet given place to your foreune. The antient monuments may now cease to extell the praises of Cafar, Scipio, Pyrrhus, Hannibal, and other Chieftains of Rome and forrein nations: for why, they are all inferior to you both for victories and countries subdued. The Othoman Family is undoubtedly fatall for sourraigning; all the world shall in short time come under your government, and all Nations shall serve you. As for this town of Scodra list it hot formuch grieve you worldly chings (you know) do oftentimes deceive our expectation; in them fortune beareth great fiving. Yet for this matter quiet your felf-for I dare K gage my faith unto your Imperial Maiesty, that I will in short time find meanes that this City shall stand at your denotion. Did not lof late bring into your subjection the impregnable city of Croia, which you So much defired ? But wher as you would now agath for shwith attempt to win it by affault, I therin craue your pardon, in that I cannot be of your opinion, but must needs think far otherwise : for, to attempt War, and to be ouerthrown, is an casie matter for enery one to do ; but to vanquish the enemy, and to carry away the victory that right few men know. He that consuleth of such great and weighty matters ought to be free both from fury and defire, both evill Counsellors. The Christians of Scodra are not in my opinion to be again affaulted, for in so doing you shall but lose your labor. For if you could not subdue them, your Army being then fresh and strong how shall you now overcome them with much fewer and they wounded weake, and feeble? I have viewed the whole camp, and fearched every tent, and found no place, no sent, yea (carfly L any cabin without groaning, fighing weeping, or wailing in all places was heavines, forow, mourning, and death it felf: for in the last affault you lost aboue 30000 of your best fouldiers: many mo are grienously wounded and mained none but he carieth about him some liene that he was there few or none there bee that dare again mount the hill to give a fresh assault, they are all so afraid and discouraged. Whom when I demanded how so creat a fear was come upon them, and what was the cause they had so lost their wonted courage? They answered me, That it was the look, even the very look of them of Scodra, whose eies feemed unto them to burn and farkle with fire : their stern and terrible countenances (faid they) have strock this terror imo vs. Wherfore I think it not good to give a fresh asfault with men fo dismaied but rather to vse police and delay against such resolute enemies. This city of Scodra is the eie and head of all this pronince, which the Venetians have notably fortified and planted with fore of ordnance and all things els necessary M for a functiber of; but effectably with most valiant soldiers, of purpose chosen out of many of their garrifor the defence of this City. You have not now to do with the weak and effeminat people of Afra, but with the hard and rough people of Epirus . And you know (most mighty emperor) the strength & courage

A of this Nation: it is now thirty years that you have made war against this people, and have not yet also cether lubdued them; and how dangerous and chargeable this war hath bin winto you, who knoweth not. It is now fix moneths fince we came first before this city ; we have intrenched our selnes round about it, wee have day and night land hard siege to it, we have battered it of long with 11 canons: I seak not of other Small pixets or engine of war, with other kinds of shot and fire-workes, and what soener cle wee could denise. We have many times to our cost assaulted it; what could be don by force, strength, or mulitude of valiant men is already doninthe former affaults; Nothing bath bin left unattempted no policy no direction hath manied in your leaders meicher courage in your foldiers . What should I count the innumerable great shot . or beak of our arrows and darts, delivered into the city as shoures of hail? Did all this, or any thing clie we could do any thing servisie these defendants? Were they not , nay are they not fell ready with great at B Grance and courage at all affays to incounter vs ? You take a wrong courfe, by force to confir in them, the hour taken apon them the defence of this place, and are not thence to be removed; there hall you bee fure fill to find them either aline or dead; and what account they make of their lines, you fee, they wil fel them unto us dear for their country, and prefer an honorable death before a seruile life. Wher fore an ainst men To fet down, policie is to howfed; and them whom we cannot by force fubdue, let us by delay and time oner. come. If you will win Scadna block it up build strong forts in places convenient round about it of furnish them with good soldiers, make abridge over Boliana, with a strong castle on either side to sopthe passage: which don believe the other weaker cities of the Venetians, which are as it were the timbes of Scodra, and Subducthe country round about which will be no hard matter for you to do being mafter of the field. So mult Scodra at length of necessity yeald water you as of late did Crota, inforced therunto by famin. Thus C may you in lafety without lang heer of your people, come to the full of your defires.

first Emperour of the Turks.

The wholfom counsel of the Bassa so well pleased Mahomet himself and the rest there prefent that the affault was layd a fide, and prefently order taken for the speedy execution of that which was fowel by him plotted. Whereupon the Bassa of Constantinople with his sorces was fent to Zabiache, a city in the borders of Dalmatla, standing upon the lake of Scutari, not far from Ascriuium, which in few days was yeelded unto him. The Bassa possessed of the city, thrust out all the inhabitants, and leaving therin a garrison of the Turks, returned againe to the campat Scodra. At the same time the great Bassa of Asia was also sent by Mahomet against Drivasto, a city also of the Venetians; which having besieged and fore battered by the D space of sixteen daies, the great tytant came thither in person himself, and the next day after his comming took the city without any great relistance. Such as he found upon the walls he put to the fword; of the rest hee tooke three hundred away with him to the camp at Scodra, and there in the face of the city caused them all to be cruelly slain, of purpose so to terrify the defendants. The next day after, he fent the great Bassa of Constantinople to Lyssa, called also Alessa, acity of the Venetians, scituated upon the river Drinus, about thirty miles from Scodta. The Bassa comming thither found the city desolate (for the citisens hearing of his com- Lyssa taken by ming, were for fear before fled, for which cause he set the city on fire. Here the Turks digged the Turks and vp the bones of the worthy prince Scanderbeg, for the superstitious opinion they had of the ver- Scanderbeg like of the opinion they had of the ver- bones dig d up tue of them; and happy was hee that could get any little part therof to fet in gold or other by them, or had jewell, as a thing of great price, as is before declared. All these things thus done, Mahomet in great renecommitted the direction of all things concerning the siege vnto the discretion of Achmetes; bywhose persuasion he left a great power for continuing of the siege, departing thence himfelf, with forty thousand soldiers, for Constantinople; cursing and banning by the way all the country of Epirus, with all the inhabitants therin, and every part therof, their Corn, their cattel, and what focuer els was fruitfull: but aboue all other things, the City of Scodra, with all that therin was, for that he had neuer received greater dishonour and losse than he had don thousand soldiers to continue the siege, and returned themselves, the one to Constantinople,

After his departure, which was about the seuenth of September, the two great Bassa's of Constantinople and Afia, according to order before taken, built a great bridge ouer the river Bolana, and on either fide a ftrong Castle, to the intent that no relief should that way bee brought into the city. Which work when they had brought to perfection, and furnished both cassies with garrisons, ordnance, and all things necessary, they lest Achmetes Bassa with forty the other into Afia. The wary and politique Baffa mindfull of the charge be had taken upon G ham, took fuch order, that no relief could possibly be brought vnto the city either by land or water; and to lying still before it a long time, hee brought it into such a distres and want of all things, that the poor Christians were fain to eat all manet of vinclean and lothfom things; Lorfes were dainty meatiyea, they were glad to eat dogs, cats, rats, and the skins of beafts fod. Ir excellethall ciedit, to tell at what exceeding price a little moufe was fould, or puddings made of dogs guts. All these bare shifts and extremities the poor Christians were content to endure even to the last galp, rather than to yeeld themselves into the hands of their merci-

Whilft Scodra thus lay in the fuds, the Venetians weary of the long and chargeable War they had to their great loffe now maintained against fo mighty an enemy by the space of fix. H teen years, and having no means to relieve their diffressed subjects in Scodra, thought it best to proue if they could procure a peace from the tyrant. Por which purpose they fent Benedia das Transfanne, a grave Senator, and a man of great experience, to Constantinople, who so wel yied the matter, that after long debating to and fro, at length a peace was concluded whereof the chief capitulations were, That the Venetians should deliver to Mahomer the city of Scodra, the Island of Lemnos, and the strong castle of Tenarus in Peloponesus, and pay him year-Is eight thousand ducats; that they might freely after their wonted maner traffique into the Fuxing by the streits of Hellespontus and Bosphorus Thracius, and other parts of his dominions. Concerning the citifens of Scodra, it was comprised in the same peace, That it should be at their own choile, either to live there stil vnder the government of the Turkish emperor, I or els at their pleasure to depart in safety with their goods whither they would. Trivisanus hauing in this maner concluded a peace, in his return homeward, the fourth, of April found the Venetian Admiral riding at anchor in the mouth of Boljana, From whence they both by letters certified the gouternor and citifens of Scodra, in what manner the peace, was concluded with the Turk, and what prouision was therin made for them. Vpon receir of which Letters, the Gonernor calling the Citisens together, declared vnto them how the case flood, & there Aband there with them entred into consultation upon this hard question, Whether they would remaine there still in their native country, under the Turkish tyrany, or forfaking the same, live among other Christians in perpetual exile? But after that the matter had bin throughly debated, and many reasons on both parts alledged; at length it was by general consent concluded, that they K thould all for take the city & the house of bondage, as dangerous both to foul and bodie, and line as it should please God, amongst other Christians, So the Turks giving pleages for the fafe departure of them of Scodra, they all at an appointed day with bag and baggage came out of the city, and were by the Venetians carefully transported into other parts of their tertitory in Italy, where they lived in peace. The Turks (who had now befieged the City the space of a whole year) after the departure of the Christians entered the City with great joy and triumph; which place with many others therabout, hath euer fince, to the great ruth of all Christendom, remained in the possession of the faithles infidels. Thus was the strong city of Scodra loft, and the long wars ended betwint Mahomet and the Venetians; which hapned in

Catalomet now at peace with the Venetians, sent the same Achmetes Bassa (by whom hee had but a little before taken in Scoolta) with his fleet of Gallies against one Leonard, who was Prince of Neritus, Zacynthus, and Cephalenia, Islands neer vnto Peloponesus. Where the Baffa arriting, eafily took the same Islands; the poor Prince for safegard of his life beeing glad to fly into Italy with his Wise and treasure, to King Ferdinand, whose nigh kinswoman

About the same time, Alis Beg syrnamed Michael Ogli, Isa Beg the son of Cassanes, and Balin For syrnamed Malcocock (men of great account among fi the Turks, and most honorably defcended)entred into Transylvania with a great army of an hundred thousand men, & brought fuch a generall tear vpon the Countrey, that Stephanus Batore the Vayuod was glad with all M speed to fly ento Matthias King of Hungary, to declare ento him the danger of his Country, and to crute his aid. Mathias at the fame time lay fick of the gout : neuertheleffe hee tooke such order by his Captaines, Stephanus Cherepetru: and Paulus Kinisius County of Temeswate,

A that the Turks were incountred not far from Alba Iulia, and there in a great and bloudy batteldefeated: wherin Isa one of their chief captains were flain, with 30000 Turks mo. Nettherwas this victory gained by the Christians without losse, Buter the Vayuod himselfe beeing fore wounded, and eight shouland men flain.

Mahamet in his ambitious humor had long time defired to have in his fubjection the Island Mahamet Local of the Rhodes. For why, it grieved him that to finall an Island should lie so neer his great do. grieve the minions in Alia, holden by a few Christians, to the great trouble of his merchants trading in the Meditetranian belide many other harms daily from thence received, and to have no feeling of his greatnes. But for a fmuch as the winning of that place was thought to be a matter of great difficulty, and in formentions vn fortunatly attempted by fome of the Mahome-B ran princes the phrposed now with good advice to take this matter in hand. Wherfore calling together his grave counsellors and most expert men of war, after hee had declared vnto them the manifold injuries received from them of the Rhodes, he required their opinion, whether itwere best to attempt the winning of that Island or no? Some forward men persuaded him to revenge those injuries don by those Christians, and to subdue that Island, which for the neernes to Caria, might of right be accounted as part of his dominion; and not to forbeat that enterprise for fear of repulse, for a fmuch as he was able to bring more men to affail it, than were stones in the wal about it. Others better adulfed declared the strength of the Island, with the valor of the defendants, men alwaics brought vp in arms, and as it were chosen out of all parts of Christendom; to that it was (as they laid) like to proue a matter of more difficultie C thanwas by fome supposed, whereof some of the Mahometan princes had to their no small difinonoral ready made sufficient trial; alledging further, That that I fland which (carfly appeared in the fea, was not of that worth, as that he should theren gage his honour, with the lives of formany good men and most valiant sold fers as might ferue to conquer a kingdome. For all that, Mahamet pricke folward with the spurs of ambigion, and continual solicitation of Anthonius Meligalus a fugitive Knight of the Rhodes, resolved to follow the counsell of them who perfuaded the war. This Meligalus was a Knight offene Order, who when he had prodigally confunded his substance (which was great) with two others, Demetrius and Sophonius, menof his own qualitie and disposition, fled voto the Turkish Emperor, presenting voto him aperfect plot of the City, with all the thrength both of it and the Isle wherein it stood, and D which way he might with most ease win it. In which service they trankly offer to spend their lives; but hoping indeed by fuch four treachery to repair their broken estate. All things being now in readine sie, Mahomet appointed Mesithes Ralaologs from of his chief Bassa's (the neer kiniman of Constantinus Palaologus the last Emperor of Constantinople) General in that expedition; committing to his charge the whole managing of that so great an action. Messiles imbarking his army, in number eighty thousand, and throughly furnithed with all things neceffary for the fiege, fet forward from Constantinople, and with a pleasant gale of wind sailed along it the coast of Asia the lesse, towards the Rhodes : where by the way he called vnto him Demurius (one of the fugitive Knights) to learne of him the best meanes for the sale landing of his army. As for the arch traitor Meligalus, and chief author of this War, he was fallen E sick vpon the way; and in the extremity of his sicknes growing both troublesom and lothsom unto the Turkes that were with him in the same Galley, was by the mariners thrown couer- Advantage to boord aliue, crying out in vain for help, no man vouchfasting to have any compassion vpon him and thus facilities.

him; and thus swallowed up of the sea, hee received in the midst of the waves the guerdon of his trechery.

At this time Peter Damboys a Frenchman, an Avergnois, a man of fingular government, was Great Master of the Rhodes; whose vigilancie was such, that commonly once in eight daies he had certain intelligence what great matters passed in the Turks Court : and therewith of such deep judgment, that he was seldom or neuer ouertaken or deceived with false a duertisements. This carefull Grand Master was not ignorant of all these great preparations, nor of the comming of the Baffa; and therfore had before strongly fortified the City, and so stored the same with all things needful, as might wel haue served for many years siege; but especiallywith such shot and pouler, that it was deemed (as indeed it was) an especial means whereby the city was afterwards preserved. At the same time, many valiant and noble Gentlemen hearing hearing of the Turks defignes, repaired thither out of Italy, France, Spain, Germany & other G places of Christendom, cheerfully to aduenture their lines both in defence of the place & of the Christian religion, against the common enemy of Christianity. The great Master taking a generall view of all the forces he had, to oppose against so puissant an enemy, found that he had in the city fixteen thousand able men; in which number were reckoned many Iewes and other men of feruile condition; who in the fiege following did right good feruice. The great Baffa conducted by the false traitor Demetrine, lafely landed both his Army and Artellery in the Island the 22 day of Iune, not far from the city. At which time the Great Master considering that the fafety of the City confisted more in the linely valour of the defendants, than in the strength of the dead walls or other warlike prouision; thought it requisit as a part of his duty, by cheerefull persuasions to incourage them, valiantly to withstand the force of their H enemies. And therfore calling them all together, spake vnto them as followeth:

At length (valiant foldiers and Fellowes in Arms) we fee the Turks our mortall enemies (as wet were before aductifed, as well by Letters from our friends, as by common Fame) breathing after our deto the of firection in readinesse to destroy our Churches, our Oratories, our Altars, our Religion, and what sever cls we account facred or religious ; feeking the ruin of this noble City, and the cruell death of vis all ; patransfer with fing at once, to denour our lines, our wealth, our hope, with all our former honour. And truly at I canhandle . . ik, not deny, but that the chance of War is doubtfull, and the event therof uncertain: So when I confider your valiant courage and cheerfulneffe of mind, I prefently conceive a most affured hope of vittory. They bane entred into Arms against vs, not so much for any defert of ours, or upon any other quarrell; as for the un'attable defire of rule and the great despight they bear abainst us and the Christian Religion. But so withfland their fury, and so frustrat their delignes, we want neither weapons nor artillery nor proutson for many years. We have amost strong garrifon of French-men, Spaniards, Germaines, English, and others, the very chiualry of all Christendom: and that which more it, Christ lefus our Captain and Generall, by whose power we shall (no doubt) easily repulse the vain force of our most gracelesse and wicked Income. The care we have for the defence of the Christian faith, wher unto we are by speciall profession bound, will animate and incourage us against them, which feek for nothing more, than to extend their wicked and groffe superstition, to the great dissonor of Gods' and of hu son Christ lesus. Besides that we are warlike Frenchmen, Italians, Germans, and other worthy Christians: they are of Caria, Lydia, Capadoing and the other delicat countries of Asia seffeminat persons brought up to pleasure. I say it not to K di an you into any manifest or inevitable danger, neither to feed you with vain hope, or to fill your eares with windy words : but this I promife and affure you of, that if this fiege shall continue long, hither will come fuch flrong aid out of France, staly, and Spain, as will ferne not only to raife the fiege, but to reconer again the Empires of Conflantinople and Trapezond. Then shall our Enemies see no good end of their counsells, but all their denifes fo confounded as that they shall hardly be able by speedy flight to fauethemschues. But suppose the hardest should happen, which I fear not; would not any man account his life most happily and honourably frent in defence of a good conscience, and the quarrell of Christ losus? Truly my great years and course of life, now almost spent in defence of the Christian Religion (as I ever desired) doth call me forth, as one fo affured of that good layd up for me in heaven by Christ lefts, (whose battell we are to fight) that I no whit fear my enemies force or future chance; which for all that, I have as far as L I could, and to the attermost of my power so provided for, as that we shall not (I hope) beether with overwhelmed. Be you therfore of good cheer and comfort (as I know you are) and shew your selves valiant and couragion, which resteth wholly in your selues : and as for all the rest, time and our discretion shall well pronist I doubt not.

> The valiant men and worthy foldiers, resting vpon the assurance of their aged gouernor, departed enery man to his charge, full of hope and courage. Now had the Baffa landed his great army, and fent Demetrius the traiterous knight, Meligalus his companion, with certain troupes of horfmen, and fome foot, to view the ground, where he might best incampe with his Army. Demetring in great pride riding about the City, was knowne by Anthony Damboyse the Great M Mafters brother; by whose leave he sallied out with a troup of gallant horsmen, and skirmithed with them. But the Turks being far moe in number, cast about to haue inclosed them: which Anthony perceiving, turned upon them that were comming behind him, and that with

A such force, that he slew or wounded most part of them. In this hot skirmish, Demetrius having his horleflain vnder him, and himfelf ouerthrown, was there trodden to death vnder the horfes feet; an end too good for fo false a traitor. Muratim a French Knight, vnaduisedly despoyling his dead body, was by the Turks slain, and his head presented vnto the Bassa in stead of Demetriss.

The Bassa approching the city, at his first comming took a great orchard, which the Great Master had strongly intrenched, and therin placed certain companies of souldiers, with some small pieces of ordnance : which place if it could have bin kept, might fitly have served the defendants to haue at their pleasure sallied out vpon the enemy. But they which were appoinred to the keeping therof, either terrified with the fight of fo great an Army, or els doubting n to be able to hold it against so great a power, abandoned it by night, and retired into the city. leauing the great ordnance behind them for hast. In this place the Bassa, by the counsell of George Frapain (a Christian fugitive of the Rhodes, and now Master of his Ordnance) began molant his battery, and from thence to batter the tower called Nicolea, or S. Nicolas Tower. diffant from the city 300 paces: but against this place Damboy/e had so aptly mounted two great Basilisks, that he made him glad quickly to for sake the same yet finding no other place more convenient for his purpose, shortly after neer to the same place he planted his batteric again of far greater force than before; wherin, befide the ordnance of greatest charge hee had three hundred smaller pieces for battery : wherwith at the first he did smal harm, for that this George Frapain repenting himself (as was thought) of his foul treason, bestowed the shot to c small purpose; for which cause the Bassa began to have him in distrust : which Frapain percoiuing fled by night again vnto the Rhodes, and discoucred vnto the great Master al the secrets of the Turks camp. The Turks continuing the battery, had fore shaken the aforesaid Tower called S. Nichlas, and beaten down some part therof; which the Christians with great industry speedily repaired in best fort they could, for all that the Turks gaue therunto a fierce asfault by the space of fix hours, forcing themselves to they tmost to have taken it : but perceluing that it prevailed them nothing, they retyred, having loft eight hundred of their men, zight bundred with many others drowned in the sea, of whom the number was not knowne, and a thousand Twite stain, others fore wounded.

Mestithes disappointed of his former purpose, bent his artillery against the walls of the city, ny and with continual battery had made a fair breach : but Damboyse foreseeing the danger, had with great labor cast vp such rampiers, with a countermure before the breach, that the Bassa durst not in any case adventure to enter the breach he had made. For performance of this so necessary awork, the captains themselves refused not to put to their helping hands: by whose example all the rest of the people who were able to do any thing, being moved, willingly imploied their labor until the work was fully finished.

. Whilst these things were in doing, Caly Bassa the yonger (a great Courtier) was sent from Mahomet, to fee with what fucces the fiege went forward. Vpon whose ariuall it was given out throughall the Turks camp, That Mahomet was in person himself comming to the siege with 100000 men, and 150 pieces of great ordnance. These news (of purpose deuised to the terror of the defendants) being blown out of the camp into the city, firuck an exceeding great fear into theminds of some of the defendants, and so discouraged the Spaniards, with their night neighbors that came from Navar, that they began openly to reason in their conventicles, that it was not possible for the city to be defended against such a power; and therfore after an infolent maner defired leaue to be gon, to the great discouragement of the rest. The Great Mastervnderstanding of their doings, sent for these mutinous Spaniards, and after he had sharply reproued them both of disorder and cowardise; promised to ship them away forthwith out of the Isle, saying, That hee doubted not, right wel to defend the City against the greatest power of the Turks, without the help of such base minded cowards. In the mean time he commanded them to surcease from their mutinous talk, threatening otherwise to make them examples, what it was so much to forget themselves. But these Spaniards shortly after, better considering of the matter, and what a dishonor it would be both to themselves and their Nation, if they fhould so dishonourably be sent away; repenting themselves of that they had don, came and craued pardon of the Great Master and to redeem their fault, in all sallies and femices during that fiege, shewed themselves most valiant and forward men. Nevertheles

the Great Master would neuer asterwards trust them in any service alone. The Bassattemp- G ting much, and prevailing little, thought it would much further his defignes, if hee could by any means take the Great Mafter out of the way, by whose carefull policie he saw all his denifes were full countermanded. Wherfore to bring this his purpose to passe, he practifed by the means of one Janus a Dalmatian to poison him. This Janus having conceived this treason from the Bassa, was received into the city of the Rhodes, as a Christian fugitive sled from the Turks; where he acquainted himselfe with one Pythius an Epirot, of great familiarity with Maring Philelphus, of late Secretary vnto Damboys, but as then out of fauour and in difference. for that he was partaker with the Spaniards in the late mutiny. I answ by the meanes of this Pythius, whom he had now throughly corrupted, fought after Philelphus, who then as he right wel knew, liued discontented, as a fit instrument whereby to worke this wicked treason; for H that he was well acquainted with the cooks and butlers, and other feruitors in the great Maflers house, and himself yet there very conversant also. Pythim presuming voon his old acquaintance and familiarity with Philelphus, and waiting upon his melancholy humour, began to perfuade him to reuenge the difgrace he lived in, and withall to thew him the means how to doit, by poyloning of the Great Master; which might (as he said) fall out to his greater of the good than he was yet aware of. Philelphus making femblant as if he had not difliked the mo-1 (0 0 514 tion, was defirous to know of him what further benefit might thereby arife to him more than and her and revenue. To whom Pythius forthwith shewed the Baffa's letters to Ianus, wherby hee affured ton carried. him, That what societ he thould promife vinto any man for the furtherance of the practife. he would to the full perform the fame. Philelphin having got full viderstanding of the trea. I fon, prefently discouered the same vnto Damboys: by whose commandment I answ and Pythius were straightwayes apprehended, and being examined, confessed the whole treason. For the which Janus loft his head; and Pythins (as he had well deferued) was thamefully hanged. Phislelphus for his fidelitie was pardoned his former error, and again received into the Great Maflers fauor.

The Baffa understanding that the treason was discourred, and the traitors executed, was much gricued therat. Neuertheles he ceased not with his continual battery to stake the city. but especially the castle of S. Nicolas, for the affailing whereof hee made wonderfull preparation. Among other things he had framed a great bridge, staied with strong topes and cables, ouer a fret of the fea, betwixt the place of his battery & the same tower, wheron & men might w march abreft; in which deuice he reposed great hope. But as the Turks were making fast this bridge, and had, as they thought, brought the worke to a good persection; German Rogers an Englishman, of great courage, and very skilfull in sea matters, found meanes by night to cut and break in funder all the ropes and cables wherwith the bridge was staid : which flow loofs, was by the violence of the fea quickly caried away, and the Turkes disappointed of their parpose. For which good service he was by the Great Master honorably rewarded, and of him in publique audience highly commended.

Yet was the furious battery of the Baffa still maintained, and a new bridge framed vponfinall boats and lighters, fast moored with cables and anchors, and diners pieces of great ordnance placed in fulls and gallies. So that the tower was at one time battered both by fea and L land, the defendants affailed with small shot and arrows innumerable, and the Tower at the fame instant desperatly assailed. But Damboyse had so placed his great Ordnance, that with the force therof the bridge was broken in funder, four great fufts funke, with great flore both of men and ordnance: the defendants also in the Tower, with shot, timber, stones, and other fuch like things prouided for that purpose, grieuously ouerwhelmed the Turks that were sealing the wals, & beat them down with great flaughter. This hot affault was desperatly maintained by the Turks, from three a clock in the morning till tenswhen the Bassa seeing no hope to preuail, gaue ouer the affault, having lost therin aboue 2500 men; whose dead bodies shorely after driven on shore, were spoiled by the Christians. The same night two mercinary solar diers of Crete, going about to have fled vnto the enemy, were apprehended and put to death; M and George Frapain, who in the beginning of the fiege fled from the Turks, now againe vehemently suspected of treason, was executed also.

Thus neither force nor treason prevailing, the Bassa because he would leave nothing suprotied that might better his cause, sent certain messengers to the Great Master, offering to him A in the name of the Turkish Emperour, great rewards, with many honorable preferments, if he would veeld vp the city, which he could not (as they would have perfuaded him) long hold against so mighty an every : wishing him now in his declining estate not to refuse such honorable and princely offers, for feare he were afterwards constrained to accept of far worse, or elathrough his desperatwilfulnesse plunge himselfe and his people into such extreme perill. as should be impossible for him or them to find any way out of. Wherunto the Great Master inbriefe answered, That be would not willingly in his fure effate vie the counsell of his enemy : neither The refolute in bis greatest destrefferefuse cheerefully to yeeld his life unto Almighty God to whom he did owe it; and answer of the that with far better will than to yeeld up the city upon any conditions, beare they never fo faire a shew of hener or profit. The messengers perceiving his constant resolution, rather to die than to yeeld B his city, began (according to inftructions before given them by the Baffa) to temper with him another way, and to perfuade him to yeeld vnto the mighty Emperour fome finall yearely tribute or other homage, as an acknowledgement of his greatnesse, and so to line as his friend in peace. But the Great Master knowing by the wofull examples of others, that in that finall request lay included the beginning of the Turkish thraldome and slauery; veterly refused to pay him the least tribute, or to do him the least homage that could be deuised. With which anfwer the mossengers returned having obtained nothing of that they were fent for.

The resolute answer of the Great Master, reported by the aforesaid messengers vnto the Bassa troubled him exceedingly; for though he had small hope by force to win the city, yet he was alwaies in hope vntill now, at his pleasure, to for sake the siege with some such reasona-C ble compositions as might stand with his honor. But sith nothing remained now, but by plain force to constraine his enemies, he resolved for the safegard of his honor, in that extremity to vie that extreme remedy: wherefore beside the great pieces of battery he had already planted against the wals, he mounted divers smaller pieces much higher, thereby the more to annoy the defendants, by beating downe their churches and high built houses. His ordnance thus placed, he battered the city day and night for the space of soure daies together without intermission:during which time, the Christians out of the city spared not, liberally to bestow their shot among the enemies also: so that the aire seemed to grow thicke, and the light of theday to be darkned with smoake of the great ordnance; and the great shot came so thicke into the city, that the fearefull women and children were glad to shroud themselves from the D danger thereof, in cellars and caues under ground. So long continued this great battery, that at length the strength of the wall gaue place to the fury of the cannon, & a faire breach was laid spen for the enemy to enter: which was no sooner made, but that with the first shew thereof A faire breach the Turks gaue thereunto a desperat affault; and prevailing by reason of their multitude, had made by force younthe student recovered the root of the Turks vpon the sudden recoursed the top of the wals, and there set vp some of their ensignes: but the battery. Christians speedily comming in on every side to the desence of the breach, they were againe quickly repulsed & beaten down into the ditches, out of which most of them never rise more. At which time the Turks in another place with their scaling ladders had gained the top of the wals, and there advanced their enfigues also, and were now five hundred of them entred the city and come into the street called the Iew-street: where they were encountered by the Great Master and his followers, and all slain that were already entered, and their ensignes that stood upon the wals thrown down. The rest yet scaling the wals, and ignorant of the fortune of their fellowes, were likewise beaten from the wals, and with wonderfull slaughter rejected. So that the Bassa not able longer to endure the slaughter of his men, being in both places repulsed, caused a retreat to be sounded, and left the assault; wherein he had lost of his most forward men about fine thousand, with sinal losse of the Christians. In this assault, the Great Masterhimselse received five wounds, whereof one under his right pap was thought to have been deadly which yet afterward was very well cured with the reft.

After that the Bassa had by the space of three months to smal purpose spent all his forces and deuices vpon the city, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to raise his siege, and depart, or to tarry & expect fome better fortune, which in al his former actions had feemed almost to haue waited wpon him; to for fake the fiege, was dishonorable; and to continue it without hope, presented no lesse danger. Besides that, in the former assaults he had already lost nine thousand of his best fouldiers, and all the rest of his army were filled with heavinesse and despaire, to heare the wofull sighing and groaning of their fellows, of whom fifteen thousand lay dispersed in the campe, fore wounded, and ready many, of them to give wp the ghosts and also G but even a little before, two great thips fent from Ferdinand king of Maples wier then and more meion, were in despight of all the Turks gallies fafely arrived at the Rhodes, to the great ion and incouragement of the belieged, &no leffe discontentment of the Turks: Whill she Balla was thus deliberating what courie to take, a rumor was failed in the camp, That the Obtillion Princes were comming with great power to relieue the townswith which news the Wholear. my was exceedingly troubled, whereupon he raised his siege, Some others far that Mabries bearing of the cuill successe of his army in the Island of the Rhodes, with the difficulty of the tiege, and now ready to go in person himselse against the Sultan of Ægypt, sent for the Bassa. and that to the flege was raifed. Howfoeuer it was, the Baffa before his departure caused all the vines and trees growing in that part of the Island, to be cut down and spoyled and so after H he had poured forth his fury vpon the fenceles creatures, which he could not according to his define exercite your the people, again imbarked his army, and with shame departed, the scuenteenth of August.

At the fame time that the Rhodes was thus befieged; Mahomet fent his old and most expert C) tain Achinetes Balla, with a great fleet and a strong army to make an entrance litto lealy (for 10 kg gdome was to firong which the ambitious tyrant in the pride of his heartthought not he mild, new command) and having long before conquered Confiantinople, otherwise called new Rome, was still dreaming (I wot not what) of the conquest of old Rome also. The mifchicuous Baffa according to his Great mafters defignes, imbarked his army at Vallona (otherwife called Aulona) a fea town in the borders of Macedonia; and from thence paffing di I rectly ouer that narrow fea, which is in bredth about 60 miles, landed his menun that rich and fertile part of Italy, called in antent time Apulia (now Puglia) neer to the old and famous city of Hydruntum, at this called Otranto: whereas foon as this warlike Baffa had landed his forces, he forraged all that rich country along the fea coast, and took fuch infinitespoyle as might well have tatisfied the greedy defire both of himfelfe and of his hungry fouldiers : all which rich booty he cauted to be conveyed into his gallies. Sowhen he had at his pleasure ranged vp and down the country by the space of sourteen daies; and saw that none made head against him, he layd fiege to Otranto, the chiefe city of that country, and as it were the key of that part of Italy; and having with such ordnance as he took out of his gallies, made a breach, easily entred the fame, and fowithout any great loffe took the city. A thing not greatly to be maruel- K led at, for a fmuch as it was but weakly manned, and more weakly defended, by men altogether lining in fecurity in the midft of their wealth and pleasure. The Archbishop, with Zurlo the Gouernour, and the chiefe men of the city, for fafeguard of their lives fled into the great Cathedrall Church, as into a Sanctuary, where they were all together most miserably slain. The rest or the citisens, whose hard fortune it was to escape the sword (as people reserved to moe milery) were afterward (hipt ouer into Græcia, and there fold for flaues. The landing of the Turks in Apulia, with the taking of Otranto, brought a general feare upon all Italy, infomuch that Sextus Quartus, then the great Bishop of Rome, forgetting all things saue himselfe, was about to haue forfaken the city for feare. Now after the Turks had at their pleasure ransackt Ottanto, Achmetes caused the same to be strongly fortified (as the sure footing of the Turks in L Italy) and victualled for eighteen months, and there leaving eight thousand of his best soldidiers in garrifon, returned himfelfe with the rest to Vallona, and so by land to Constantinople to know his great Masters surther pleasure: but purposing with himselfe, with the first of the next foring to have returned with greater forces again to Italy, for the profecuting of his former victory. Which if he had don, it was greatly to have bin feared, that all that goodly country, fortime mistresse of the World, but then and yet also rent in sunder by the discord and ambition of the Christian Princes, had in short time become a prey vnto the barbarous Turk

But whilft the great Baffa (in his life time the great scourge of Christendome) thus proud-Iv plotteth the tuine and destruction of faire Italy: God, in whose hands the hearts of Kings M are put an hork in the great tyrants nofe, and led him quite another ways For arthe same time the Caramanian King, aided by the Persian and the Sultan of Ægypt; hadina great battelloucithiowne Baiacet (Mahometseldeft fonne then living) and flain this part of his army in reucinge whereof, enfahonet with great expedition raifed a great and pulffantarmy, and taking

A Achmetes with him as his chiefe man of war, rejecting the wars of Italy unto a more conucnient time, passed ouer into Asia: where vpon the way, about a daies journy short of Nicomediaacity of Bithynia, at a place called Geinifin he fell ficke, and there for the space of three daies grieuously tormented with an extreme paine in his belly (which some supposed to be the colicke) died; but being indeed as most men thought poysoned; when he had lived about Mahomet dieth 2 yeares, and thereof reigned 31, in the yeare of our Lord 1481. His body was afterwards at Geinisia in 32 yeares, and thereof reigned 31, in the yeare of our Lord 1401. This body was afterwards Bytchinia, nor magnificently buried in a chappell necrevato the great Mahometan temple, which he him-without (a.b.i. selle first built at Constantinople.

The death of this mighty man (who living troubled a great part of the World) was not 1481 much more lamented by those that were neerest vnto him, (who cuer living in scare of his He is busied as R cruelty hated him deadly) than of his enemies, who ever indoubt of his greatnesse, were glad contaminable. to heare of his end. He was of stature but low, and nothing answerable to the height of his of Mahometic mind, square set, and strong limmed, not inferior in strength (when he was young) vnto any in his fathers Court, but to Scanderbeg only: his complexion was Tartar-like, fallow and melancholy, as were most of his ancestors the Othoman kings; his looke and countenance sterne, with his eies piercing, hollow, and a little funke as it were into his head, and his nose so high and crooked, that it almost touched his vpper lip. To be briefe, his countenance was altogether fuch as if Nature had with most cunning hand therein depainted and most curiously set forth to view the inward disposition and qualities of his mind, which were on both parts notable. He was of a very sharpe and apprehensive wit, learned, as among st that nation, especi-Cally in Astronomy, and could speake the Greeke, Latine, Arabicke, Chaldee, and Persian Tongues. He delighted much in regarding of Histories, and the lines of worthy men, especially the lives of Alexander the Great, and of Inline Cafar, whom he proposed to himselfe as examples to follow. He was of an exceeding courage, and thereto very fortunate; a feuere punisher of injustice, in them especially to whom he had committed the administration of juffice. Men that excelled in any quality, he greatly fauoured and honourably entertained : as hedid Gentill Bellin a Painter of Venice, whom he purposely caused to come from thence, to Confiantinople, to draw the lively counterfeit of himselfe, for which he most honourably rewarded him. He so severely punished these, as that in his time all the waies were safe, and a theefe foarcely to be heard of. But the fe good parts were in him obscured with most horri-D ble and notorious vices: for why, he was altogether irreligious, and of all others most perfidious, ambitious aboue measure, and in nothing more delighted, than in bloud: in so much that it is probably gathred, that he was in his time the death of eight hundred thousand men s craft, conctous field, and diffimulation, were in him accounted for tollerable faults, in comparison of his greater vices. In his loue was no assurance, and his least displeasure was death : so that he lived feared of all men, and died lamented of none. He had iffue three fonnes, Must a The finnes of from Matthias Coruinus out of Hungary, whose forces the Turks most feared) he began to cutthem short, and streitly besieged the city both by sea and land: vntill at length the besieged Turks hearing of the death of the great Emperour, and now hardly pressed with the dangers of a streit siege, no longer expecting the returne of Achmetes their Generall, (then rea-

LIFE OF BAIAZET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND SECOND EMPEROR OF THE TVRKES.

Pon the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, great troubles began to Diffentiflamone arife about the succession in the Turkish empire; some of the Bassa's the Turkes A and great captaines feeking to place Bajazet, the eldeft fon of Maho- firm. mer, in the Empire; and others with no lesse denotion labouring to preferre Zemes, or Gemes, otherwise called Zizimus, Bajazet his younger brother. By occasion whereof there arose two great and mighty factions, which in few daies grew to fuch heat, that many great tumults and not skirmithes were made in the imperial city, betwixt the favourity of both factions, and great flaughter committed. In thelebroiles the proud Ianizaries for an old grudge flew Mahomethes one of the foure great Bassa's, a man by whose grave counsell most of the weighty affaires of the Turkish empire had been managed during the reigne of the late Emperour; and proceeding further in their accustomed infolency, spoiled all the Christians and Lewes which dwelt amongst them, of all their wealth and substance; at which time the rich merchants and citisens of Constantinople D which were naturall Turks themselues, escaped not their rauenous hands, but became vinto them a prey and spoyle also. The other three Bassa's of the court, Isaac, Mesithes, and Achmetes, (lately returned from the winning of Hydruntum in Italy) although they fecretly maligned and enuied one at the greatnesse of another, yet to appeale these so dangerous troubles, and to affire their owne estates, joyned hands together, and by their great authority, and multitude of followers and fauourits, found meanes that Corentus (one of the younger fonnes of Bajazet, a young Prince of eighteene yeres old) was as it were by the generall consent of the Nobility and fouldiers saluted Emperour, and with great triumph and solemnity placed in the Imperiallfeat. In whose name, the aforesaid Bassa's at their pleasure disposed of all things, little or nothing regarding either Bajazet or Zemes, then both abfent, the one at Amasia, and the other E at Iconium in Lycaonia. For the jealous Turki Kings neuer suffer their sonnes to live in court neere vnto them, after they be growne to yeres of discretion; but send them to gouerne their provinces far off: where they are also under the command of the Emperors lieutenants generall in Asia or Europe, and may not depart from their charge without great danger, not so much as to visit their father, without expresse leave and commandement. So jealous are those Tyrants, yea, euen of their owne fonnes.

Bajazet and Zemes hearing of the death of their father, and of the troubles in the imperial city, hasted thitherward with all speed, where Bajazet being the neerer, first arrived : but finding Bajazet com. the Empire already possessed by Corentus his younger son, and himselfe excluded, he in griefe meth to conof his heart poured forth most gricuous complaints before God and man, calling heaven and Fearth to witnesse of the great wrong and injury done vnto him by the proud Bassa's. And what by tears and humble obtestations, what by great gifts and greater promifes, but most of all by the earnest labor and solicitation of Cher seegles Viceroy of Grecia, and the Aga or captaine of the Ianizaries, both his fons in law, prevailed fo much with the great Bassa's & soldiers of the court, that Corcutus being of a mild and courteous difposition, ouercome by their intrea-

to and the reuer nee of his father, refigned vnto him the imperiall gouernment, which he pre- C fently tooke vpon him with the generall good liking of the people, and made Corettes Gouernor of L. cia, Caria, and Ionia, with the pleasant and rich countries thereabouts; allowing him a great yearly pension for the better maintenance of his estate, with promise also of the empire after his decease; and so fent him away to his charge, where he most pleasantly lived during the reigne of his father Bajazet, giving himselfe wholly to the study of Philosophy, which made that he was afterwards leffe fauoured of the Ianizaries and other men of war.

Zemes thus preuented by his elder brother, and understanding by his friends how all things flood at Constantinople, and that Bajazet was already possessed of the empire; returning with reat speed, aised a puissant army in the countries which were under his command, and marching through the heart of Asia the lesse, by the way as he went, tooke into his possession such H cities and firong places as he thought best; and so entring into Bithynia, tooke the great city of Profa, the antient feat of the Othoman Kings, Purpofing in himfelfe, that as Bajazet had thut i mout of Europe, so he would also in requitall thereof exclude him out of that part of the Tarkul, empite which is beyond Hellespontus in Asia,& to make himself lord therof. Wherin fortune at the first seemed vnto him most fauourable, all the people wheresoeuer he came yeelded vinto him obedience as vinto their Prince and Soueraigne: so that in short time he seemed both vnto himselse and to others, in strong possession of that part of the Empire.

Of these his proceedings Bajazet having intelligence, and perceining the greater part of his compire now in danger to be loft, and doubting further, that Zemes his ambitious mind would bardly reft therewith long contented; for remedy of fo great a mischiese levied a strong and I purstant army, wherewith he passed ouer into Asia, and come to Neapolis a City of Anatolia, neere where unto Zemes lay with his army strongly incamped. As Bajazet was vpon the way against his brother, Achmetes the great Baffa (in the confession of all men the best man of war and most expert Captaine amongst the Turks, and of all others most entirely beloued of the Ianizaries) came, and vnarmed presented himselse vpon his knees before BajaZes, his sword hanging at his faddle bow: to the admiration of many, who could not but wonder to see so worthy a Chiefetaine of fo great place in time of service, without any apparant cause, in such humble manner to appeare before his Soueraigne, as if he had had nothing to do with armes. It chanced many yeares before, in the mortall warres betwirt Mahomes the late and great Emperour of the Turks, and Affymbeius V fun Caffanes the King of Persia, that Bajazes bauing the K leading of the right wing of his fathers Army, had not martialled it in fo good order as was to Atakomet his good liking : for which cause he commanded this Achmetes to goe and set that part of the battell in better order. Which his Soueraignes command whiles he most skilfully performed, Rajazer taking it in cuill part, as tending to his owne difgrace, in great choler threatened the Bassa, to finde a time when he would be reuenged vpon him. But hee being a man of great spirit, and one that durst both do and say much, perceiving his meaning. bad him doe what pleated him; and laying his hand vpon his fword, folemnly vowed, That whenfocuer he came to command as Emperour, he would neuer weare fword in field: the remembrance whereof was the cause that he then came in manner aforesaid, ready to serue if he were there to commanded, or otherwifoto endure what so his Princes pleasure was. Baja- L pete, juing that the vikindenesses so long before conceited, was not yet disgested, in token of grace firetched out to him his feepter, and taking him vp, commanded him to girt his fword vnto his fide, and not to remember that which he had long before both forgiuen and admin more longotten. And knowing right well that he was a most valiant and expert captaine, made him Generall of his army, to the great contentment of the lanizaries and the rest of the army, who foone as they faw him, caue out divers great shouts for joy, as if victory had most assured ttended vpon him. Achinetes taking vpon him the charge, came and incamped fo neere as he could to Zemes, and follay by the space of ten daies: during which time, many sharpe skirmithes were made with divers fortune; fometime the one fide prevailing, and fometime the other. At length the matter was brought to a generall battell; wherein after a long and M cruell fight, and great flaughter on both fides, the fortune of Bajazet, conducted by the polievot Admitto, premailed against Zemes. Who seeing his Army ouerthrowne, betooke himfelfe to flight, and came to Iconium: in which flight many of Zemes his followers were taken prisoners; whom Bajazet would have pardoned and enlarged, but that by the persuaA fion of Achmetes he changed his mind, and to the terrour of others fuffered them all to be put to the fword.

Zemes doubting after this overthrow to fall into his brothers hands, and finding no means 2 medical into to make head againe swhen he had staied three daies at Iconium, caused his treasure, plate. 10 spide. iewels, and other things of great value and light carriage to be truffed vp, and taking with him his mother and his two yong children, a fonne and a daughter, accompanied with a small retinue.fled into Syria; then part of the dominion of Caytheius, commonly called the great Sultan of Ægypt and Syria, It was not long after the departure of Zemes from Iconium, but that Baid. zet came thither with his army, to have surprifed him; but vnderstanding of his slight, hee tooke order for the peaceable government of that part of his Empire. And to having suppresfed that dangerous rebellion, and againe reduced that troubled part of his Empire to his obeifance, returned with victory to Constantinople.

The distressed Prince Zemes travelling through Syria, came at length to Icrusalem: where 1482 he flayed a good space, deuoutly visiting the monuments of that most antient and famous citv. From thence he trauelled into Ægypt; where at his first entrance into the country, he was met by divers of the greatest nobility of that kingdome, sent from the great Sultan, by whom hewas honourably conducted to Caire, and there prefented to Caytheins, of whom he was graciously welcommed: vnto whom after due reuerence done, he declared the cause of his comming, as followeth:

If it were not to me certainely knowne (most victorious) that you are not ignorant either who I am, or zemes his from whence descended, or with what injury enforted, after long and painefull travell I am here arrived; beech to Caye. it would much concerne me to wfe another manner of beginning of my freech, and with greater protesta deptition of words to feeke your gracious favour. But for a much as all thefe things are unto your most royall Majesty sufficiently knowne, as I do well perceive in this, that your infinite clemency hath entertained me with farre greater kindenesse, than I in such my adverse fortune durst wish for, much lesse request: Now nothing remaineth for me to fay, more than justly to complaine unto your inuincible Majesty, of the wrong and iniury done unto me by Bajazet, whom I may more justly tearme my cruell enemy than kinde brother. For he not contented to have taken wnto himselfe my fathers Empire by great tumult and staughter, hath with all hostility and force of armes persecuted me his brother, excluded out of the Impe-D riall City and then living in Bythinia, troublesome neither to him, nor any of his people, and neuer reflect untill he had chased me out of the bounds of my fathers Empire. Neither hath the jealous de five of Soacraignty (whereof my father whilest he lived, had him alwaies in distrust) so much moved him unto this fo cruell fact, as a certaine unnaturall cruelty towards all his kindied in generall, and mortall hatred against me his brother in particular: for he which is already possessed of the Empire, and doth with all hostility persecute a prinate person, subject and exposed to businjury, that manthirstein not after Soucraignty, but after bloud; neither defireth he to conquer, but to kill. And whereas after my fathers death great troubles arose in Constantinople, and many bloudy skirmishes were fought beswixt the fauourites of both of vs,it cannot with any truth be laied to my charge, as done by mine aduise or counsell, I being at the same time so farre from thence. Neither am [justly to be blamed, if that after my fathers de-E parture I put my selfe vpomthe way towards Constantinople, specially being sent for thither by many my good friends, men of great marke and quality : but his fortune prenaiting, I gave place, and left my com ming to the Imperiall City might have beene the oscasion of new troubles, I returned aside into Bythini. and so to Prusa, with purpose there to have rested in quiet, if my brother would have given one leave. But so farrewas be from that, to fuffer me there to rest, as that I was by him most cruelly affailed as an open enemy : and had I not by feedy flight withdrawne my felfe from the imminent danger, and departed quite out of my fathers king dome, I must have geelded my felfe, my blond, and life, as a facrifice into his cruell hands. Neither is he to me so mortall an enemy or thir feeth after my life so much for feare, as for very hatred and malice: for what is there in me to feare? Verily nothing: Constantinople is his, the fauour of the great Chiefetaines and men of warre is his, the treasure and regall riches are all his; wherefore he hateth his brother, but feareth him not. He will sway all things alone, he will have all that belongeth to the Ochoman family alone, and he, yea, none but he, must line alone. Xerxes wis a mighty King, and yet in that great and large Kingdome he not onely preserved his brethren in safety, but had them alfoin great honour and estimation. What did Alexander the Great? Who not onely tooke pleasure in

h. brother but had him alfo to a companion of his most glorious expedition : and many other famous G Kingset forcine Nations, and of our owne family, have ruled both more fafely, and better strengthened with the comfell and aid of their most louing brethren, rather than with others. But Bajazet is of a taircother minde reputing violence and hautineffe of heart to be his greatest and furest defence . herein his fercenature delighteth, more than in the lawfull course of nature, justice, and equity; he had rather how his bio ber his enemy than his friend, and to drive him into exile, than to make him partaker of by complets. But I befeech thee most pulfant Monarch, the faithfull keeper and maintainer of our I. m and Religion by the facred reliques of our great Prophet Mahomet, which thou haft at Ierulalem and Accha, suffer me nut, a Kings sonne, to live in banishment and exile, poore and miserable. a porne of his brothers cruelty, fare from home, farre from his country and King dome; but regarding the Law of the great Prophet, lift white affected and oppressed, and by the great authority which you H have bride dom flicall wrong or if that will not take place, revenge it with thy foord, and fuffer not our Lappre, with fo great tranell founded, by the cruelty or folly of one wilfull man to be ourthrowne ; which hould be no more gricuous and lamentable to vs. than dangerous to your most high estate, and all other Kings and Princes of our Religion. For you of your felfe understand right well, what deadly Chemics the Christian Princes are wnto the Turks : and do you thinke that if any great warre (which I mish act should arise of this our discord, obat they would long rest in quiet, and as idle beholders stand looking on antill it were of it selfe appealed? Or rather having such an opportunity presented, would not with might and maine fuddenly invade our Kingdome, before shaken with civile warres, and seeke the the rune and de finition of the same? Which their desire if that hatefull people could bring to passe (which thing Mahomet turne upon themselves) my minde abhorreth to thinke how farre that milchace would runne: For the Othoman family once rooted out, there is none of our Religion, (your Maifly onely excepted) which is able to withfland their power: wherefore you must then stand for your off and all the reft, you alone must withstand the force of the Christians, you must maintaine that warrewith much loffe, and greater charge, and most uncertaine successe. Wherefore, inuincible Monarch, I mil humbly beforeh thee, that pittying our effate, whiles the matter is yet whole, and remedy is yetto ! had, to deale with Bajazet by your Embaffadours, That though he will not receive me his brother as pariner of the Empire, yet at least to admit me into some small part of my fathers King dome : Let home more and rule, let all things be at his command; let it be lawfull for me poore man but to live in rest and quiet tomewhere, possifing but so much as may suffice me honestly to leade a private life. Which then if he shall refuse to grant, although he neither feare the Lawes of God or man, yet as I have at Icrutalen, fow. Il I alfo hortly at Mecha (if by your leave I may) complaine unto the great Prophet, of the ingaries done vinto me by my cruell and unnaturall brother; and afterwards make proofe of your compaffron towards me, all which I hope shall much anaile. But if (which I would not) I shall proue all thise then san vaine, fith desperation enforceth mento all extremities, I will goe with fire, found, and flanghter by foret and open force by right and wrong and hated, will vex my hatefull brother by all manner of mifeliefe by all manner of renenge. Neither will I make an end of confounding of all, until I be either received into part of the Empire, or effectogether with my life leave those desperate and lost things for him alone to enjoy. For I deeme it much better, quickly to die, than with differace and infamy to protract almoring lost hed life.

The great Sultan in courteous manner comforted the distressed prince, willing him to be of good cheere and patiently to beare his present hap: foras much as it became a man borne in so high fortune, not to be discouraged with any mischance, or dismaid if things fell out otherwhich than he looked for commending him withall, for that he faw in him no leffe courage than might well have becomined his better estate, and willing him to live still in hope, promised to do what in him lay, to reconcile him to his brother, and to persuade him that he might be carting the received into some part of the kingdome; and to that purpose shortly after dispatched away an honorable embaffage to Bajazes. Zemes in the meane while, by the fame Sultans leaue, vpon a superstitious deuotion trauelled into Arabia, to visit the temple of Mahomet at Mecha, and his coulchre at Medina. Vpon his return to Caire, the Embassadors before sent, returned al- M to but not having obtained any thing they defired: for Bajazet would not give eare to any agreement, but teemed altogether to contemne and despise his brother. Wherfore Zemes more vpon florracke & defire of reuenge, than for any hope he had of the Empire, determined with himfelfe

A: himfelfe to make open war vpon him , reposing some good hope in his secret friends, and in the revolt of some of the great captaines, who discontented with the government of Bajazet fecretly wished for his returne.

Whilest he was thus plotting these weighty matters, a messenger with letters came fitly 1483 from the King of Caramania, offering with all the power he could make, to joyne with him, if The king of Cahe would take vp armes against his brother. This poore titular King then lived in Armenia, raminia solici. and being able by his friends to make some good force, was in hope by joyning with Zemes, to sake up a mes recourt fome part of the Caramanian Kingdome, from whence his father was not many yeres against Bajage before driven by the force of the late Turkish Emperour Mahomet the Great, Bajazet his father. It is hard to fay, whither of these distressed and exiled Princes gaue the greater encou-B ragement to the other, to take this desperate war in hand, being both together far vnable by 411 the friends they could make, to encounter with the great power of Bajazet. But what is fo dangerous or desperat, which aspiring minds will not attempt in hope of a Kingdome whose brightnesse so dazeleth their eies, that they can see nothing but it.

Hereupon Zemes having received great gifts of the Ægyptian Sultan, with promise of aid, departed from Caire (the Sultan earnestly persuading him to the contrary) and as it was before appointed, met with the Caramanian King vpon the borders of Afia the leffer: where they concluded to joyne together such forces as they had, and to inuade Bajazet. Which they accordingly did : for raising all the power they could, they entred into Cilicia, (now called Caramania) and joyning their armies together, incamped betweene Iconium and Larenda. C Neither did Bajazet in time of fo great a danger sit still; not so much fearing his brothers power, as the revolting of his captaines; buildiers, whom he knew either to love, or at least not to hate the young Prince his brother. Wherefore he raised a great army, and sent Achmous (the great wan of war) before with the one part thereof, himselfe following after with a far greater strength: for at that time he frad under his ensignes two hundred thousand men.

As he was marching with this great army, a rumor was raifed in the campe, That some of his chiefe captains had conspired to betray him into the hands of his brother, and that many of the fouldiers fecretly fauouring Zemes, would voon the joyning of the battell forfake him, and take part with his brother. Which report so troubled Bajazer, that he stood in doubt what to doe, or whom to trust: but knowing that nothing winnerh the heart of the common foldier D more, than the Generals bounty, he forthwith caused awonderfull masse of mony to be divided among it the captaines and foldiers, loding their minds with ample promifes of far greater rewards, for their fidelity and valour to be shewed in that present service. Having thus asfured himselfe of the wavering minds of his souldiers, he began to draw neere to Iconium, where his enemies lay incamped: and by glosing letters and flattering messengers made shew openly, as if he had beene very defirous to come to some good agreement with them, but secretly went about to stop all the streits and passages, in such manner as that it should not be possible for them againe to retyre backe into Syria: for he doubted nothing more, but least they being few in number, and in strength far vnequall vnto him, would not vpon so great disaduantage hazard the fortune of a battell, but retyre themselues into Syria, and so to his exceeding trouble and infinite charge protract that war. Zemes perceiuing his brothers subtill drift, and seeing no such revolt as he had hoped for, and as had before by letters to him bin promised; and weighing with reason his owne weake forces, retyred in good time vnto the streits of the mountain Amanus, which divideth Cilicia from Syria, Here, despairing of all good successe in the enterprise he had taken in hand, he perfuaded the Caramanian King his confederate to give place vnto the time, and to referue himfelfe vnto his better fortune: and so breaking vp his army, with a few of his followers came down to the sea coast of Cilicia; where he hired a tall ship to attend in readinesse, that if any fudden danger should arise, he might go aboord, and so saue himselfe by sea. In the mean time zemes should be said to said the sa he sent a messenger vnto Damboys Great Master of the Rhodes, certifying him, That for as " sea.

much as he had no place of fafety left amongst his owne people, wherein he might shroud himself from the sury of his brother, still seeking after his life, he would vpon his safe conduct tone to him into the Island of the Rhodes. Which his request the Great Master easily granted deeming the flight of fo great a Prince from the Turke, to be a thing much profitable to the Christian Commonweale: and thereupon he presently sent forth certaine gallies to serch him from the troublesom coast of Cilicia. But before these gallies were come, Zemes was in- G forced by the fudden acces of his enemies, for the auoiding of prefent danger, to go abourd on that this which hee had providently before prepared to be in readinesse for such purpose. And having put a little from the flore, that back again an arrow with letters made fast vnto it, directed vnto his brother Baiazet, containing as followeth:

Thou knowell (most ankind and croell brother) that I say not unto the Christians, the mortal Enemies of the Othoman family, for hatred of my religion and nation; but inforced therunto by thy injurious a aling, and dangerous practifes which thou incessantly attemptest against me, yea even in my extreame miforic. But this affared hope I carry with me, that the time will come when as thou the authour of fo great wrong or thy children, shall receive the tust guerdon of this thy present tyrannie against mee thy

It is reported. That when BaiaXet had read these letters, he was so troubled in mind, that for certaine dates he gaue himselfe wholly to mourning and heatines, and would in no wife be comforted : infomuch that he was brought into the campe by the Baffaes, as a man halfedi.

Zomes failing to the Rhodes, was there honorably received of the Great Master, and all the ftraught of his wits, thunning for a feafon all mens speech and company.

the houston rest of the knights of the Order to whom in their publick assembly three days after, he openly declared the causes of the discord betwirt his brother and him; alledging for colour of his rebellion, That although Bajazet were his elder brother, yet that he was born whilst his father yet lived in privat effate, vnder subjection and command, long before he possessed the Kingdome, and to no Kings fon whereas he himfelfe was the first born of his father, being an Emperour, and fo not heire of his fathers privat fortur [48 was Baigast) but of his greatest honor and empire; and yet not of fuch an haughty mind by that he could have bin content to have given place to his brother, to that he could have but conferred, likewife to have granted him tome fmall portion of the empire, wherin he might fafely have lived as a poor prince, and his brother : but that such was his pride, as that hee would not vouchsafe to suffer him to line so much as a poor privat life in any corner of folarge an empire, and was therefore by his vnnaturall and tyrannous dealing inforced to craue aid of the Christian princes; of whom for lomuch as he had alwaies heard much honor, he was in good hope to find fuccor and reliefe in that his distressed estate; protesting vnto God and the world. That if ever it should bee his good fortune by their means and help to obtain the empire, he would never be vinmindfull of K so great a benefit, but to make with them a perpetual and inviolable peace, and so to rest their fast friend for euer. The great Master on the other side comforting him with cheerfull speeches, promifed to keep him in fafety from the fury of his brother, and further to commend his cause to the other Kings and Princes of Christendom.

This exiled prince Zemes was about the age of 28 years when he came to the Rhodes; of flature tal, fomwhat corpulent and wel limb'd, gray eyed, but looking fomwhat afquint; hook noted, and in the middle riting, in such maner as the Persians commend in their Kings; of colour brown, spare of speech, and by nature cholcrick; a great feeder, so that he seemed rather to deuour his meat, than to eat it; much delighted in swimming, & to lie abroad in the night; penfine and melancholy, which men imputed to his great cares, neuer merry but in the company of the grand Master: a religious observer of the superstition from which he could never be withdrawn during the long time he lived in exile:learned as among the Turks, to that hee wrot the history of his fathers life. But leaving him in safe keeping with the grand Master of the Rhodes, let vs again return to the course of our history.

Barajet having now the second time chased away his brother, after he had well quieted that part of his troubled kingdom in A fia, returned againe to Constantinople, carefully attending when some new motion should be made by his brother to his further disquiet. But when hee under flood that he was with the Great Master of the Rhodes, he sent certain of his Bassa's (among it whom Achmetes the great fouldier is reported to have bin one), vnto the Great Mafler, requesting him to deliver vp Zemes, offering for him a wonderful sum of money. Which M difficuourable request when it could by no means be obtained, the faid Embassadours in the name of their mafter concluded a peace very commodious for the Rhodians; wherin among other things it was agreed, That the Great Master should keep Zemes in safe custody, so that hee should no more trouble the Turkish Empire: in consideration whereof, and for his hoA notable viage, Bajazet should yearely pay vnto the Great Masterthirty thousand duckats the fift of August, which was afterward accordingly paied.

It fortuned that whilest Achmetes the great Bassa (emploied in matters abroad) was absent 1484 from the court, BajaZet discoursing with the other Bassaes his grave counsellors, voon his late expedition into Asia against his brother, seemed to be highly offended with the votrustinesse and doubtfull faith of some of his greatest captains and foldiers, yet voon whom he might justly lay the blame, he well knew nor, although it seemed by his talke, he should somewhat distrust the great captaine Achmetes. Hereupon Isaac the most antient Bassa of the court, and of greatest authority next vnto Baja et himselse (whose daughter, a lady of exceeding beauty, Achimetes had long before married, but doubting that the had yeelded her honour to the wan-B ton luft of Mustapha the eldeft son of Mahamet the late Emperour, had put her from him, and wouldby no means be reconciled; for which cause there was a secret hatred euer after betwixt those two great Bassaes) perceiuing the Emperors discontented and suspitious humour, and desiring nothing more than the destruction of Achmetes, took hold vpon this opportunity, and bvall meanes he could deuise, encreased the suspition of the treason, which had already too much possessed the jealous Emperor: sometimes crastily imagining, intelligence to have passed betwixt Zemes and Achmetes; and forthwith amplifying his power and authority, which (ashe faid) was fo great with the Ianizaries and foldiers of the court, that they by reason of his often imployments, were wholly at his deuotion; fo that he might at his pleasure do more in Zemes his quarrell, than should stand for the safety of Bajazet; a matter well to be considered Achmeter bit

C of and also carefully preuented. For remedy of which dangers, it was thought necessary, that death contri-

Achmetes at his returne to court, should be taken away and flaine.

Achmetes fearing nothing leffe than that which was contriued against him, came after his wonted manner to the court; and was with the other great Bassaes invited to a solemne supper which Bajazet had commanded to be prepared, to solace himselfe after his travels (as it was given out) with his chiefe Bassaes. To this royall supper came Achmetes with the rest of the bidden guests, mistrusting nothing, and was there sumptuously feasted by Bajazes: who to make his guests the merrier, dranke wine plentifully himselse, causing them also to drinke in likemanner; forthat they were full of wine: a thing vtterly forbidden by their law, yet dayly more and more vied, especially by their great men in their feasts. Supper now ended, and the D night far spent, Bajazet in token that they were welcome, and stood in his good grace, caused certainerich robes of pleasing colours to be brought forth, and to be east vpon every of his guessone, giuing besides vnto euery one of them a faire guilt boule full of gold. But vpon Achmetes was cast a gowne of blacke veluet, which among the Turks may well be called the mantleof death, being so sure a token of the Emperors heavy indignation, as that it is death for any man once to open his mouth, or to intreat for him vpon whom it is by the Emperours commandement fo cast. Achmetes seeing himselse now under the shadow of death, and knowing it but vaine to intreat for mercy, as he was a man of great spirit, brake forth and said, oh cachpogly (which is as much as to fay, thou fonne of a whore) fith thou intended ft (o much cruelty against me, why didst thou not put it in execution before thou hadst inforced me to drink E this impure and forbidden wine? and so casting his eies upon the ground sat still. The other Baffa's having leave to depart, giving thanks to the Emperor, and craving pardon for their exeesse, kissed the ground at his feet and so departed: with whom Achmetes offered to have gone out also, but was forthwith commanded to sit still, for that the Emperour had to talke with him in secret. The Bassa's were no sooner departed, but the terrible executioners of Bajazet his with stept in, and laid hands upon Achmetes to have slaine him; when one of the Eunuchs in greatest fauor with the tyrant, standing by, aduised him not to be too hasty in executing of so great a man, so entirely beloued of his best souldiers and men of war, but rather to stay his execution for a while to fee how the matter would be difgested; and in the meane time by torture to wrest it out from him what might be got, to make it in some fort appeare, that he died F for his due desert. Hereupon Bajazet deferred his execution to a further time, and caused him there presently to be stript, and carried away to be tortured.

Among tother gallants of the court which attended the comming out of the great Baffaes Achmitte bis whom they followed, was one of Achmetis his fons, a gentleman of great hope, who miffing for flireth up his father among the desirence to the substitution of the subs his father among the reft, began presently to mistrust that all went not wel, & speedily running bulg his father.

from one of the Baffaes to another, with much ado learned the hard effate of his father; where, of he was also at the same instant advertised by a secret friend neere about BajaZet. Hereupon this yong gentleman began forthwith pitcouily to lament his fathers mishap, and to exclaim against the cruelty of Bajazet; called on the Ianizaries for aid, putting them in remembrance of his fathers great and manifold deferts towards them, together with his imminent danger; and so running up and downe the city in the dead time of the night, had in short time raised up all the languaries in armes; who understanding of the danger of their antient commander, who ticy generally loued and honored as their father, came running by heaps from all parts of the city vnto the court gate, there with terrible exclamations doubling and redoubling their Bre. Bre, (which barbarous word they commonly vie in expressing their greatest discontentment and fury) & did indeed to furioully beat at the court gate, that Bajazet fearing leaft they should H breake in by violence, caused the outer gate to be set open, and shewing himselfe from above out of a yron window demanded of them the cause of that tumult and vprore. To whom they infolently answered, That they would by and by teach him as a drunkard, a beaff, and a rascall. to vie his great place and calling with more fobriety and diferetion: and among many other opprobrious words wherewith they shamefully loded him, they called him oftentimes by the name of Benei, Benei (that is to fay, Batchelor or Scholler) which among it those marrial men contemners of all learning, is accounted a word of no small reproch and difgrace. And after they had in most despightfull manner thus reuiled him, they proudly commanded him forthwith to deliver Achmetes vnto them, or elfe to take that should ensue thereof. Bajazer terrified with this infolency of the Ianizaries, and fearing some sudden violence to be offred, commanded Achmetes to be without delay deliuered vnto them : which was done in such hast, that he was brought forth before them almost naked, bare legged, and bare headed, bearing in his body the manifest markes of his hard vsage. The lanizaries receiving him with great rejoyeing, supplied his want of apparell with such habiliments, as they for that purpose vpon the sudden tooke from Bajazets minions: and so taking him vpon their shoulders, with great joy carried him out of the court, still crying vnto him, How he did, and how he felt himselfe? And so guarded him home, ready no doubt to have flaine Bajazet and rifled the court, if he would have but faid the word. But he yet loyall, laboured with good words to appeale that tumult, and to pacifie the fury : excusing that which Bajazet had done against him, to have been done only to correct him, for that happily he had forgotten some part of obedience and duty. Neuerthe- K leffe, hereupon remained no finall heartburning betwirt Bajazet and the Ianizaries for a long time after : yet Bajazes for teare of them reconciled himselfe to Achmetes, and in open shew had him in greater honour than before, promoting him euen vnto the highest degrees of honor, howbeit he inwardly hated him to death. And the more by the continuall instigation of the old Bassa Isiac : by whose persuasion, when it was thought that all had been forgotten, he was by Bajazets commandement as he fat at supper in the court, thrust through the body and flaine. This was the miserable end of Achmetes, the great champion of the Turks, and one of the greatest enemies of Christendome that ever lived in the Turkish court: for by him, Mahomet subuerted the Empire of Trapezond, tooke the great city of Cassa (called in antienr time Theodofia) with all the countrey of Taurica Cherionefus, the impregnable city of Croia, L with all the kingdome of Epirus, the ftrong city of Scodra, and a great part of Dalmatia, and last o: all Otranto, to the terror of all Italy: by, him alfo, BajaZer vanquished and put to flight his brother Zemes, as is before declared. In reward of which good feruices, he was by the tyrant (upon a meere suspition) thus cruelly and shamefully murthered. About this time also, Caigubus (Zemes his fonne) then but a childe, was by the commandement of Bajazet his vncle, strangled, in the new tower of Constantinople.

Estazet now grieuoully offended with the pride and late infolency of the Ianizaries, caused secret inquiry to be made, of them which were the authors of those late stirs; & finding them to be the officers of their companies, and specially those which had before slain Mahamet Bassathe great polititian immediatly after the death of Mahamet the late Emperor, at which time M they had also raised great tumules, and done much harme in the city; he vinder color of preferent, fent away those authors of sedition into divers parts of his Empire, appointing vino them (as anto old soldiers and men of good desert) certaine lands and revenues for their maintenance and preferent. But as soone as they were departed, he by secret letters commanded a the governors and magistrats in those places whereinto they were sent, suddenly to apprehend them, and as traitors put them to death; which was accordingly done. The lanizaries of the court and about Constantinople, hearing what had hapned to their fellowes, became wonderfull discontented, and began to mutine in divers places of the city, vttering speeches against 1487 the Emperour full of despight and revenge. Which thing when Bajazet vnderstood, and had Bajazet purpo well considered the late danger he was in, together with the intollerable pride and insolencie stip to define of those his masterfull slaues; he secretly purposed in himselfe for curing of so dangerous a the lanigaries. difeafe, to vie a most desperat remedy : which was, suddenly to kill and destroy all the Ianizaries, especially those which were belonging to the court, or about Constantinople. This his purpose he imparted to divers of his greatest Bassaes, charging them vpon paine of his heavy R displeasure not to disclose it and for the execution therof, had sent for great numbers of those foldiers, which are called Acanzij, who are among the Turks reputed for the best fort of common fouldiers. Most of all the Bassa's to whom he had imparted this his cruell deuise much diffiked thereof, as too full of perill and danger: yet feeing him fully resoluted for the performance therof, would not, or durst not fay any thing to the contrary. Only Alis & Ishender Bassa (both differenced of the honorable family of Michael Ogli) diffuaded him from attempting any such thing: alledging first, that the Ianizaries were in number many, foldiers of great courage and experience, resolute men, and such as would fell their lives deare: Then, admitting that he should kill all them about the court and in Constantinople; yet forasmuch as all his strong towns and castles, especially in the frontiers and chiefe places of his dominions, were posses. o fed and holden by firong garrifons of other Ianizaties, fellows & friends of thefe (who would yndoubtedly take up arms in defence of themselves, and revenge of their dead friends) it were athing very like to endanger himselse, together with the whole state of his empire, beside the great dishonour which would grow vnto himselfe thereby for cuer.

This fodangerous an exploit, wherin the hands of fo many were to be vsed, was not kept so secret, but that the vigilant and wily Ianizaries had got an inckling therof; and therupon begandayly more & more to suspect the matter, both by the often and secret repaire of the great mento the court, more then they had before seen, & also by the vnwonted multitude of those Acanzi, which were dayly brought vnto the imperial city by great troups. Wherfore searing to be suddenly surprised, they banded themselues together, and openly stood vpon their gards: and by chance lighting vpon Alis Beg as he came from the court, (who was indeed their best friend) after their barbarous manner, with many opprobrious & contumelious words, demanded of him, if he were not one of them who had conspired their destruction; and without more adohad presently slain him, had he not (as a well spoken man) with great protestations & oths persuaded them, that he neuer consented to any such thing, or that they needed to seare any fuch thing from him: and so with much ado rid himselfe out of their hands.

Baja (et seeing his purpose discouered, and that he could not without great bloudshed, and danger both to his estate and person, worke his will vpon the Ianizaries; by the counsell and advice of them that faw further into the matter, to colour his former intention, commanded by open proclamation. That the Ianizaries and other his men of war (of whom he had a great E powernow affembled at Constantinople) to be in readinesse against a certain prefixed day, to gowith him into Moldauia, as if he had raifed that power for that purpose only. But when the time was come that he should set forward, the lanizaries put themselves in order of battel by themselues, and would in no wise ioyne themselues with the rest of the army, or receive the Emperor into the midst of their ranks, as they had alwaics before accustomed; but furiously thaking their weapons at him, told him plainly, that he had fought their destruction, and bid him therefore if he thought it fo good, to fet his executioners to worke vpon them, whom he should find both ready and able to defend themselves. To pacify their fury, Bajazet was glad to give them good words, and to vie al the means he could (by his great Baffa's and other captains which were able to do any thing with them) to perfuade them to be quiet; swearing vnto them by the holy foule of his father (a folemne oath amongst the Turks) that he would not harme or wrong the meanest of them. So with much ado they were at length appealed, and received Bajazet into the midft of them, as their wonted manner was.

This dangerous turnult so quieted, Bajazet set forward, and passing ouer Danubius, entred Bajazet suas Moldauia, where he first layd siege to a strong town standing upon the Euxine sea, called data delania,

Many great Princes defirous of Zemes, labored by their embaffadors to haue obtained him of the Great Master of the Rhodes: first BajaZet his brother, fearing lest he should at one time the Ribides for Or Other again break forth upon him, or els set up by the Christian Princes, trouble his estate. offied great fums of money to have had him delivered into his hands:and Charles the French king purpoling the conquelt of Naples, (which he in few yeres after performed) and after that to have invaded Grecia, thought Zemes a most sit instrument for the furtherance of those his high defigns, and was therfore wonderfull defirous to have had him. Matthias also K. of Hun-H gary (a fortunat Warriour against the Turke) persuaded that the having of him might be vn. to him a great furtherance in the course of his victories, sought by all the meanes he could to haue obtained him. At which time also Innocentists the eight of that name, B. of Rome, no leffe defirous than the rest, to have in his keeping so great a pledge of peace and war (the bridle of the Turks fury, together with the large pension he was fure to receive yearely from Bajazet for the fafe cuflody of him) fo wrought the matter by Lyonel Bishop of Concordia, his cunning Legat, that the Great Master, fearing on the one side to be constrained by the great power of Bajazer, to grant that he had so often refused, and now so earnestly solicited on the other side by the Bishop, caused Zemes to be deliuered to him at Rome in the yeare 1488: for which doing he was by the Bishop honoured with the honour and title of a Cardinall. So Zemes to the great profit of the Bishop (who received from Bajazet a yerely pension of forty thousand duckats) remained in fafe custody at Rome all the time of Innocentius, and also of Alexander the fixth his fuccessor: vntill that the French King Charles the eight, passing through the heart of Italy with a strong army against Alphonius king of Naples, in the yere 1495, and making his way through the city of Rome, so terrified the great Bishop (who altogether fauoured & furrhered the title of Alphowsus) that he was glad to yeeld to such articles and conditions as pleaied the king; and among the rest, to give in hostage vnto the king his gracelesse son Cafar Borgia Falentinus, and also to deliuer to him Zemes his honourable prisoner, as shall be afterwards in place conucnient at large declared.

In the beginning of Bajazet his reigne, whilest he was busied against his brother Zemes in K Afia, Iohn Caffriot the fon of Scanderbeg, aided by the Venetians, after he had fortunatly ouerthrowne the Turke in a battell necrevnto Croia, recouered a great part of Epirus out of their possession. Atwhichtime also Iohn Chernouich a Christian Prince of Albania, casting off the Turkish yoke imposed vpon him by the late Emperor Mahomet, suddenly took vp armes, and by the help of the Venetians valiantly repulsed the enemies out of that part of Albania; and fo troubled Bajanet, that he was glad to fuffer him peaceably to inioy all that he had by force recoucred, and further to content himselfe with a small tribute for the rest.

Bajazet highly offended with Abraham (whom some call Pgramet) the King of Caramania, for aiding his brother Zemes against him; in reuenge thereof raised a great army both in Europe and Asia, and marching alongst Asia the lesse, through the countries of Phrygia, My- L fia, Carla, Lydia, and Pamphilia, entered at length into Caramania. But the king of Caramania, hearing before of his comming, and knowing himself too weak too meet him in field, fortified the strong Cities and places of his Kingdome, and retyred with his army into the fireits of the mountain Taurus, where it parteth Cilicia from Syria, wherein he was in more fafety than in any of his strongest holds. BajaZet finding no way to come to him, spent most part of the Summer in spoyling of the open country but perceiving his enemies could not so be drawn into the field, he layd fiegevnto the famous city of Tarfus, being the chiefe City of the champaine part of Cilicia (the natiue place of S. Paul the Apostle) and in short time so battered the wals of his City with his great ordance, that he had made them faultable. The Citisens considering the danger they were in, offered to deliver vp their City, their liberty, M liues, and goods referued. Of which their offer Bajazet accepted, and most honourably performed his promise for their safety; not permitting any of his souldiers to enter the City, more than such as must needs for the guard of his person, and safe keeping of the City. And forasmuch as Winter began now to grow fast on, he dispersed his souldiers into the Coun-

A trey villages round about, not fuffering the countrey people to til or fow their land, or to do any thing els which might turne to their profit or good, whereby they were inforced to yeeld themselves wholly to his deuotion. The Caramanian King seeing his people dayly fall from him. & fearing to be at length forfaken of his foldiers alfo, in this his diffres obtained aid both of men and mony from Caytheim the great Sultan of Ægypt, and so with al the power he could make, tooke the field, with the first of the next Spring, fully resoluted to try the fortune of a hattel, although in strength and power he knew himself much inferior to his puissant enemy.

Bajazet glad to fee his enemy to forward, speedily assembled his army, and without delay offered him battellswhich the Caramanian King refused not. So between them was begun a Along and terficre and terrible fight; which by the skilfull conduct of the leaders, and exceeding courage thirt Bajazet of the fouldiers, was maintained the whole day with doubtfull victory and great flaughter on and the King both fides, new supplies still comming on in stead of them which were flaine. The day decli. of Caramania. ning the Caramanian King (whose fatall destiny had now appointed him vnto his last work) feeing his wearied foldiers rather ouerlaid with multitude, than vanquished by force, to begin to give ground to their enemies; couragiously thrust forward with his guard and other valiant foldiers about him, with fuch fury, that he brake into the midft of his enemies battaile, where being known, he was forthwith enuironed by the Turks, and so hardly charged on enery side. that having his horse slain under him, he was inforced to fight on soot, where after he had with hisowne hand flain divers of his enemies, he fell down dead in the midft of them. His foldiersdifcouraged with his death, turned their backs & fled, and in flying were for the most part either flain or taken prisoners. After this victory, Bajazet speedily ouerran all that large countrey, and without refistance in short time brought under his obeyfance all the countrey of

There was at that time in that part of Cilicia which is called Trachea, and lieth toward the sea fide, an antient Mahometan Prince who had under his command most part of that countrey with the famous and populous city of Scandeloro, the chiefe place of his refiance. This prince had of long time lived betwixt the Christian kings & the kings of Caramania, as neuter, still fearing the greater, but indeed louing neither; and had till then chiefly maintained his state by the allyance he and his ancestors continually held with the Kings of Cyprus and the grand mafters of the Rhodes. Against this poore prince, the only one now left in Asia D the leffe, not fubiect to the Turkish kings, began Bajazet now to turn his forces; purposing before he proceeded any further, to make a full conquest of the lefter Asia, and so to make all furebehind him. Of which his purpose the Prince having knowledge, and wifely weighing hrsown small power to withstand so puissant an enemy offred by his Embassadors to deline to Bajazet his chief city of Scandeloro, with all the rest of his territory in Cilcia, vpon condition, that Bajazet should give vnto him other possessions for it, in some other part of Asia the leffer, to the like value. Which his offer BajaZet accepted, and so became lord of all the sea coast, from the streits of Bosphorus, to the confines of Syria.

After he had thus conquered Cilicia, with a great part of the mountain Taurus, he descended into Armenia the leffe, and in short time brought under his subjection so much of that country, asalfo of Cappadocia, as was fomtime belonging to the Caramanian Kings. When Bajazer had thus flain the Caramanian King, and subdued that most antient kingdome of the Turks, which had long and many times mightily contended with the glory and power of the Othoman Kings, he left Mustapha, one of his great Bassaes, at Iconium, with his Asian army, to keep in obedience those new woon countries: and as a triumphane conquerous returned him-selfeto Constantinople, where he was of his subjects joy sully received.

After that Bajazet had thus inlarged his Empire with the kingdom of Caramania, and was now become an vinwelcome neighbour vinto the great Sultan of Ægypt and Syria; he began to swell in disdain against that mighty Prince, for that he had given aid against him, first vinto his brother Zemes, and after that to the Caramanian King in these late wars: of which wrong F purpofing to be reuenged, he shortly after appointed one Caragosa Bassa his lieutenant in Asia, with Ishender another of his great Captaines, with a strong army to inuade Syria, then part of the great Sultans Kingdome. These two great commandets well appointed for the purpose, when they were come nothe vetermost parts of Gilicia, the new bounds of Bajazets Empire, were then to passe by the confines of Aladenles his Kingdome, before they could passe the great mountaine Taurus to come into Syria. This Aladules commanded as king over the rude G and fierce people which dwelt along it that great and rough mountaine, and was then in league with the Sultan. He hearing of the approach of the Turks army, with a great number of his mountain people lay in ambush in the streits whereby the Turks must needs passe, of purpose to intercept them. Ishender marching in the vantguard with a great number of the voluntary fouldiers called Acanzij, as the manner of the Turks is, and fearing nothing leffe, than to be fer voon by the mountain King, before he was aware was come into the midit of his enemies. and was by them to fiercely charged on every fide for their places of advantage, that he there loft most part of his men, and forsaken of the rest, which sought by slight to saue themselves. he with his two fons and others were taken prisoners. Michael-Beg the eldest of the two, being fast bound, was slain by one of Aladules his followers, whose brother he had slain in that skir. H mish his head being cut off, was by the commandment of Aladules carried to his father Ishender, the more to grieue him : who disdainfully willed the messenger not to shew it vnto him. but to bid his master cat it if he would. With which answer Aladules was exceedingly mooued neuerthelesse pirtying the old mans misery, he shortly after set Iaxis-Beg the yonger brother at liberty : but Ishender himselfehe sent prisoner to Cairbeins the great Sultan at Caire. where he remained in prison five yeres after. Caragoses the Bassa discouraged with the losse of fo great a man, retyred with his army backe againe into Cilicia, and from thence aduertifed Bajazet what had hapned, by whom he was commanded to return to Constantinople, as a man unfit for fo great an enterprife.

The next Spring following, Baja (et constant in his former resolution for the inuasion of Si- I ria, fent Achmetes another of his Bassa's, with a far greater army than had Caragoses, against the at metris to include and sultanish to was no fooner come to the further part of Cilicia, but he was there at a place, cala cotton responsible Led of the Turks, Tzucur Oua, encountred by the Ægyptians & Arabians, and there in a great battell ouerthrowne; wherein he himselse fighting most valiantly, lost two of his fingers, and being taken prisoner was sent to Caire.

Bajazet with this ouerthrow rather insenced than discouraged, made great preparation the next yere against the Sultan both by sea and land, such as he had not before at any time made. And when all things were now in readines, fent Alis Baffa (of some called Calibeas) and Cherseagles his sonne in law, two notable captains, with a great and puissant army by land, against the Ægyptian Sultan : at which time he requested of the Venetians, with whom he was then in K league, That he might by their good leaue, as occasion required, refresh his fleet (then ready to put to sea for the inuation of Syria, as he said) in their Island of Cyprus. Which his request was by the generall consent of the Senat denied, as a thing tending to the great danger of their State: yet wifely doubting left Bajazet taking that deniall in euill part, should seeke to haue that by force, which he could not obtain by request, they presently sent Francisco Priuolo their Admirall, to sea with thirty gallies for the defence of that Island. He hearing that one fleet of the Turks gallies, lately come out of Hellespontus, lay houring at the Island of Sciros, expecting a far greater from the coast of Ionia; and carefully considering how secret and sudden the Turkish designements were, although it was given out that althis great preparation was made against the Sultan: yet to prouide that they should not suddenly surprise the Isle L he speedily sent sundry companies of soldiers, especially archers, out of Creta into Cyprus, for the better defence thereof; but stayed himselfe with his fleet at the Island of Naxos, that fo at hand he might be the readier to with stand what socuer the Turks intended. But when he understood that all their fleet was met, and now set forward, the hoysed sayle, & held his course directly for Cyprus. In the meane time the Turkish fleet sayling along it the coast of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, kept on their course vntil they came vpon the coast of Syria: by which time Calibem and Cherstogles were come with a mighty army into Cilicia, neer to the mountaine Taurus.

Cartherm the Ægyptian Sultan having before had certain intelligence of the great preparation that Bajazet had made against him, had before sent Vibeg a most valiant and politick captaine, with a firong army of his Mamalukes and other his most expert souldiers into Syria, to be ready at all times to withstand the Turks. This worthy Chieftaine understanding of the comming of the Turks army, thought it greater policy, to carry the calamities which alwayes wait vpon great armies, into the enemies country, than to receive it into his own bosom. And therfore although he knew himselse for number to be far inferior to his enemies, yet supplying that want with the valor, courage, and affured confidence he had reposed in the approued and invincible force of his Mamalukes, he expected not the comming of the enemy into Syriabut passing ouer the mountain Amanas, and so descending into Cilicia, met him not far from Tarlus, in the fame $1260 (as it was thought) where Alexander the great had long before in a great battel vanqui (fied Daries . 319 19 bothe Turks) retyred to their camps, where they rested that night.

filburthe Bayptians comming to their camp, found all their Cariages with their provision of victuals and other necessaries quite taken away and gon. Which thing (as some write) the bordering people of the country (for most part living upon robery) had don in time of the bat-C telegoples to the Turks: of as fome others report, they which had the charge therof, terrified wish the greatnes of the Turks army, and doubtfulnes of the battel, fled away, & taking their way along it the fea fide, fled into the hands of the Turkes which were put on shore out of the gallies and so were of them spoiled. How soe uer it was (for in so great vncertainty I dare not assum) certain it is, that the Egyptians were fore troubled with the loffe of their prouision, fearing that if they should now stay longer in the Country, they should forthwith be driven to great extremities for want of necessaries. Wherfore when they had euil rested that night, the next day early in the morning they presented themselves in order of battel before their eremies, braying them into the field, and daring them battel. The Turks disdaining to see any prouder in field than themselves, after they had in good order ranged their battels, set forward D with enfignes displaid against their proud enemies. There began a most terrible bloudy batordic in the place where they stood. A man would have said that the former daies fury had binbut a play in comparison of this: many valiant fouldiers with their dead bodies coursed

the same ground wheron they living stood, when they received the first incounter of their Enemies. Of both those great armies nonewere feen to give ground, or once look backe; the Purks Ianizaries & the Egiptians Mamalukes (the vindoubted fireigth of the greatest Mahometan Monarchs, foldiers for their valor much feared, & through the world renowned) there buckled together, and standing footto foot, spent the vttermost of their forces one vpon another; as if they would in that battel haue made it known unto the world, which of them were E to be accounted the best soldiers. Whilst victory stood thus doubtfull, and the day was now farspent, vsbeg the Egyptian General, with fisteen thousand valiant horsmen (whom hee had referred for that purpose) gaue a fresh assault vpon the Turks squadrons, with such force, that they had much ado to keep their order, and began now to give ground: which was by and by made good again by other fresh men speedily brought on by the Bassa's. Then became the battel more fierce than before, every man striving to the vtmost of his power to sel his life to his enemies as dear as he could. In which maner of fight all the rest of the day was spent, vntill that after the going down of the Sun, the darknes of the night comming fast on, they were glad for lacke of light to breake off the battell, and to retyre themselues into their camps, not knowing as yet who had got the better. The Turks Bassa's taking view of the army, and finding that of an hundred thousand fighting men, which they brought into the field, there was scarce a third part left, and most of them also maimed or hurt; & doubting to be set vpon again the next morning by their resolute enemies, fled away fecretly the fame night, leaving behind them for hast their tents well stored The Turks flie with victuals and all other things needfull. The Agyptians also having lost one half of their away by night, army (which was at the first seventy thousand) and wanting their necessary provisions, were G retyred also the same night into the mountaine Taurus, not knowing any thing of the flight of the Turks. And some of the souldiers passing quite ouer the mountaine without stay, into Syria, raifed a report all ouer the countrey as they went, That the Sultans army was ouerthrown, and that the Turks had got the victory : fo vincertaine was the true knowledge of the euent of that battel, euen to them that were present therein. The Ægyptians lying that night vpon the fide of the mountaine, had speedy intelligence from Aladales, of the flight of the Turks: which being also confirmed by his espials to be true, he presently came downe from the mountaine, and entred into the Turks campe, where he found planty of victuals and of all other things needfull for the refreshing of his army.

Aladules the mountain king, with the people called Varfacide, by whose confines the Turks H must needs in their returne passe, robbed and slew many of them in their disordred flight; and had so stopped the passages, that they were in flying ouertaken by the Mamalukes, and slaine with so great a slaughter, that of all that great army of the Turks sew remained aliue to carry news home. Calibeins and Cherftogles the Bessacs, were in that flight both taken prisoners, and afterwards presented to Caytheim the Sultan, at Caire, with eighteen ensignes of the Turks Sanzacks, which are great men amongst them, having every one of them the regiment and command of fome one prouince or other, and are in degree next wato the

Neither was the fortune of Bajazet his nauie at fea, better than that of his army at landsfor as it lay at rode vpon the coast of Syria at the mouth of the river Orontes, which runneth by 1 the famous city of Antioch, his gallies were by tempest and rage of the sea put from their agchors, and in the fight of their enemies swallowed up of the sea, or else driven upon the maine, and there with the furges of the sea beaten in pieces. Bajazet not a little troubled with these loffes both by fea and land, at length with much ado, by his Embassadors concluded a peace with the Sultan, vnto whom he restored all such places as he had before taken from him: for which the Sultan delivered vnto him Calibeins, Cherfeogles, Achmetes, and Ishender, with all the rest of the Turks prisoners, which he had in great number in his keeping.

Shortly after this peace was concluded betwixt these two great and mighty Princes, Capt. beim the Sultan died: who of a Circaffian flaue, by many degrees of honour, and by the fauor of the Mamalukes his fellowes, obtained the rich Kingdome of Ægypt, which heright wor- K thily gouerned to his immortall praise by the space of two and twenty yeares, commanding at one time the great and rich countrey of Ægypt, with all Affricke, as farre as Cyrene, Westward, and Iudea, with a great part of Arabia, and all Syria, vnto the great and famous river Euphrates, Eastward. In the latter end of his reigne he (ouercome with the importunitie of his wife Dultibe, an Arabian borne, a woman of a haughty spirit) ioyned his sonne Mahomether, a yong man of about foure and twenty yeares old, with him in the fellowship of his king dome; that so possessed of it his father yet living, he might the better inioy it after his death. Contrary to the custome of the Mamulukes, who of long time had not vsed to have their king by succession, but by their free election. Who grudging to be thus defrauded of their wonted choice, immediatly after the death of Cayebeiss flew Mahomethes his fon ; and in a few months L after, foure moe, who one after another without their good liking had aspired vnto the Kingdome; neither could they be contented, vntill such time as that they had according to their wonted custome set vp a Sultan of their owne choice.

About the same time that the aforesaid peace was concluded betwixt the two great Mahometane Princes, BajaZet and Caytheim, Charles the French King was making great preparation against Alphoniu king of Naples, giving it out, That after he had recovered that kingdom, he would forthwith from thence inuade the Turks dominions in Grecia. Which great attempt the haughty King was induced to take in hand, by the persuasion of diners of his Nobilitie, but especially by the solicitation of Lodonicus Sfortia Duke of Millan: wherby the whole state of Italy was in short time after sore shaken, and Sfortia himselfe, Author of these troubles, at M last carried away by the French, miserably ended his dayes as a prisoner in France. Alphonfor the Neapolitan King doubting the greatnesse of the French King his enemy, entered into a confederation with certaine of the States of Italy, against the French, but especially with Alexander the fixt then Bishop of Rome: for the better assurance whereof, hee gaue

A his basedaughter in marriage to Godfrey Borgia, the Bishops son, and made him Prince of Carinula: his other son Francis he entertained also in great pay to scrue him in his wars. And by his Embassadour Pandonius Camillus, lately returned out of France, gaue Bajazes to understand. what the French King had purposed against them both, requesting him to aid him with fix thousand horsemen and as many foot against their common enemy, promising to give them honourable entertainment during those wars. And to further the matter, Alexander the great Alphonssu king Bishop sent George Bucciarde, a Ligurian, skilfull in the Turkish language, Embassador to Baja-Alexander Bizet, to declare vnto him with what great preparation, both by sea and land, the young French shop of Rome zet, to declare vinto min with what great preparation, both by the and mind, the young French of King (defirons of honour and the enlargement of his kingdome) was about to inuade Naples, Enjagragains and then, with what great power (after he had dispatched his warres in Italy) he purposed to charles the paffe over into Gracia; and that he had to that end carneftly travelled with him to have Zemes French King. his brother deliuered into his hands, whom he defired to vie as a most fit instrument for the troubling of his state and Empire, by reason of his many friends : yet that his Holinesse hauing the French in diftrust as a proud and ambitious people, as also carefull for the danger of the city of Rome, and of the state of Italy in generall) had entered into a confederation with Abbonfus King of Naples, with their vnited forces to withfland that proud nation, both by fea and land, wanting nothing more for the accomplishment therof, than mony: by which means only, Bajazet might (as he faid) prouide for the fafety of his kingdome in Gracia, if he would put to his helping hand, to furnish them with mony for the entertainment of souldiers; forasmuch as the city of Rome, and the kingdome of Naples, were the surest wals of that side of C the Otheras Empire; if he not altogether refufing the charge, would not spare for a little cost to maintaine the war rather in that forreine country, than to receive it, brought home to his owne doore: concluding, That it were much more commodious and easie with his treasures to represe his enemy in a strange country a far off, than by dint of sword and plaine battell in hisowne. A thing by experience well knowne, That they which have neglected and fet at nought remote dangers for sparing of charge, have afterwards bin inforced with greater danger to receive the fame into their own bosomes, when as they were become desperat and past remedy. Bajazet, who both by his espials and often letters and Embassadors from Alphonsus, knew all this to be true, gaue great thanks to the Bishop by his Embassador, for that he sitting in so high place, did so friendly and in so good time admonish him, both a stranger and of a D contrary religion, of things of fo great consequence: yet for answer, he willed him to returne again unto his master with one Dancius his Embassador, who should carry with him both mony and other his fecret resolutions concerning those matters. Among other things given him incharge, was an Epistle written in Greek, wherin the barbarous king with great cumping persuaded the Bishop to poison Zemes his brother, as a man of a religion altogether contrary to his: for indeed of him alone for his great vertues Bajazet stood in searc and doubt, least hee should by some chance escape out of prison to the troubling of his state. For the performance Baiargusendeth of this his request, he promised faithfully to pay vnto the Bishop, two hundred thousand due. Dautius bis kats, and neuer after so long as he lived to take vp armes against the Christians. Otherwise Alexander Bishop, two hundred thousands bishop, the hundred thousands bishop, two hundred thousands bishop, two hundred thousands bishop, the hundred thousands bishop,

E vnto the name of Christians, neuer ceased by continuall wars to worke their woe. But George the Bishops embassador, and Dantins, travelling towards Italy, and having now 10. That the Bishop did owe him a great sum of mony, due vnto him for his good fervicedone in the time of Imocentius his predecessor, for which he now paied himselfe. Neither could the Bishop, much troubled with that injury, euer after recouer one part thereof, although he threatned vengeance with fire and fword, and also sought for recompence of the Venetians, whom it concerned to faue the Turks harmelesse in those seas i for why, Rone-

Dantim himselfe, Bajazets Embassadour being set on shore, was glad to goe on foot to Ancona; and fo from thencepassing up the river Padus, came to Franciscus Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, of whom (for the antient friendship betwirt him and Bajazet) he was courteously enreptained

When Bajazet vnderstood by Danting, the cuill successe he had in his late journy, he forth. with fent Muflapha one of the Baffaes of the court, vnto the great Bifhop Alexander, with like instructions as he had before given to Dautim: who with better hap arrived in Italy, and came to Rome in falety, where he forgot no part of that was given him in charge by his great Ma. fler. Amongst other things, he was enforced to give vnto the king his graceleffe fon Cafar Borgia Valontinus (then one of the Cardinals) in hostage, for the performance of the other of his promifes. Which diffrace the crafty old Bishop sought to couer, by gracing his son with the title of the Legat : and with him he was also inforced to deliver Zemes the Turke, Bajazers brother, his honourable prisoner; who to the great profit of the bishop and his predecesfor, had remained in fafe custody at Rome about the space of seuen yeares. But Zimes within 1 porponed by a three daies after he was deliuered to the French, died at Caieta, being before his deliuerance lexander Bi. poisoned (as it was thought) with a pouder of wonderfull whitenesse and pleasant tall; whose Inop of Kome, power was not presently to kill, but by little and little dispercing the force therof, did in short time bring most assured death : which pleasant poyson, Alexander the Bishop, skilfull in that practife (corrupted by Bajazets gold, and ennying fo great a good vinto the French) had caused tobe cunningly mingled with the Sugar wherewith Zemes vied to temper the water which he commonly dranke. His dead body was not long after fent to Bajazet, by Mustapha his Embaffador, who to the great contentment of his master, had thus contriued his death with the Bishop. Not long after this dead body so far brought, was by the appointment of Bajazet, honorably interred among his ancestors at Prusa. Casar Borgia also the Bishops son, a little before K giuen in hostage vnto the French King, deceiuing his keepers at Velitras, returned againe to receiving of Rome before the French King was come to Naples. This wicked impe come of an cuill strain, not worth the remembrance but by way of detestation (the very monster of nature, if a man should well consider the course of his whole life) shortly after his escape, enuying at the honor of Candianus his brother, who then was Generall ouer the Bishop his fathers forces, which were at that time great : when he had one time merily supped with his faid brother, with their mother Vannotia, traiterously caused him to be vnawares murdred in the streets as he was going home, and his dead body to be cast into the river of Tiber. Then casting off his priestly habit with his Cardinals robes, he took upon him the leading of his fathers army in his brothers flead, and gaue himselse wholly to martiall affaires, a vocation best fitting his fierce & bloudy L disposition : and with exceeding prodigality, wherewith he exhausted his fathers coffers and the treasures of the church, bound fast vnto him desperat ruffians and foldiers (especially Spamards, his fathers country men) such as he knew fittest to serue for the execution of his most horrible deuises. Which manner of his proceedings, although they were such as all good men deteffed, yet did the old hipocrit his father wink therat, fearing (as it was thought) to be murdered of the viper, himselse, when it should serue for his purpose. Now when he had thus itrengthned himself, and that he was become a terror to all the nobility of Rome and the seigniones thereabout, he by the deutee and help of his father (who defired nothing more than to make him great) first draue the most honourable family of the Columnii out of the city, and afterwards out of Latium: and by most execrable trechery, poysoned or killed the honorable M perionages of the great houses of the Vrsini & Cajetani, taking to himself their lands & posses-

fions. With like cruelty he ftrangled at one time four noblemen of the Camartes: & draue Guido Felirius out of Vrbin. He took the city of Pifarum from Io. Sfortia, who with much difficulty of caped his bloudy hands and draue the Malateffaes out of Ariminum. The great lady Gathe-

A rine Sfortia he thrust out of Forum Liuij and Forum Cornelij, and shamefully led her in triumoh through Rome. And neuer fatisfied with bloud, which he without measure shed, he took the city of Fauentia from After Manfredus, a young gentleman of rare perfection: whom after the beaftly tyrant had most horribly abused against nature, he caused to be cruelly strangled and his dead body to be cast into Tiber. Having thus filled the measure of his iniquity. and as a fretting canker, having either devoured or driven into exile most part of the Roman nobility, and purposing by the supportation of his father, to make himselse Lord and Soueraignboth of the City, and of all Latium, in the pride of his thoughts he was by the hand of the most Highest attached and cast down, and that by such means as he least feared: for being with his father at a solemne supper in the Vaticane, of purpose prepared for the destruction of certain rich Cardinals and some other honorable citisens, they were both poysoned by the farall error of one of the waiters, who mistaking of a slaggon, gaue the poisoned wine to the accurfed Bishop and his son, which was prepared for the guests; whereof the old Bishop in few daves after died. But his sonne who had drunk the same more delaid with water, although he died not of long time after, yet presently fell into such an extreme sicknesse, that he was not able to help himselfe, or to command his desperat followers, wherof he had great store: but lying ficke, in short time saw himselfe of them forsaken, and two of his enemies, Pius the third, and Iulius the second, one after another sitting in his fathers place. Of which two, Pius enjoyed that pontificall dignity but fixteen dayes : and Iulius succeeding him, caused this Cafar Borgid (whoof right had deferued a thousand deaths) to be shut up in the castle called Moles Adric ani from whence he fet him at liberty vpon the deliuery of certaine strong holds which were yetholden by his garrifons. After he had thus rid himselfe out of Iulius the Bishops hands, he fled to Oftia, and fo by fea to Naples: where he was by the commandment of Ferdinand king of Spain, apprehended by Gonsaluus the Great, and transported into Spaine, for seare least he, being of a most troublesome nature, and much resorted vnto by his old fauorits, should raise some new stirs in Italy. He was no sooner arrived in Spain, but he was cast into prison in the castle of Medina, where after he had lien three yeres he deceived his keepers, and with a rope which he had gotten, let himselse down from an high tower of the castle and so escaping, sled to the king of Nauarre, whom he afterwards served in his wars, and was in an hot skirmish a- The death of gainst the kings enemies (wherin he had obtained the victory) sain with a small shot. But to return again from whence we have fomthing too long with this troublesome body gone astray. The French King having thus lost both his great hostages, Zemes the Turke by The French death, and the Cardinall Borgia by escape, held on his journey towards Naples, and with won- King invadesh derfull successe premailed as he went, all places yeelding to him without any great resistance. Alphonfus feeing himselfe destitute of such aid as he had invalue requested both of the Turkish Emperour and of the Venetians, and now almost beset with his mighty enemy, to whom fo many strong places had in shorter time bindeliuered than any man had before imagined; and with all confidering with himselfe, how that he had lost the hearts of his subjects (the strongest defence of Princes) for that most of the Nobility, and especially the Neapolitanes, hated him for his too much seuerity in punishing the offenders in the late rebellion, wherein the Princes of Sarne and Salerne were chiefe; and the common people were no leffe offended with the grieuous and heavy exactions, required of them for the maintenance of these wars, infomuch that their murmuring speeches came oftentimes to his own hearing; as oftentimes it fals out, That the hatred of the subjects against their Princes, which hath for feare of long time bin diffembled during their prosperity, more franckly and fiercely breaketh out in their declining effate: for these causes, Aphonsus fearing to be forsaken of his people as a man in despaire, with abundance of tears openly in the fight of all the Neapolitans, refigned his kingdome of Naples to his fon Ferdinand, when as he had as yet scarcely reigned one whole yeare after the death of Ferdinand his father and with four gallies passed ouer to Mazerea, a city of Cilicia. His fon Ferdinanda Prince of rare perfection and fingularly graced with all the vertues of true nobility, and thereto dearly beloued of all the people, was to the wonderfull contentment of the Neapolitans with great toy & acclamations faluted Kings and so having performed all the ceremonies belonging to his coronation, returned prefently to his army. By G this time the French King with all his forces was entred farre into the kingdome of Naples and having taken by affault certaine cities which trufted too much to their owne ftrength. firucke fuch a generall terror into the minds of the Neapolitanes, that they thought no place now firong ynough to abide his batteries, or power sufficient to encounter his forces. Ferdimand the young king with his army had taken the streits of the forrest of S. Germane, thereby to impeach the further passage of the French King. But whilst he was there busied, he was suddenly aduertifed, that Fabritim Columna with a great power of Frenchmen had by the Appenines broken into Campania, and so was marching towards him: wherefore doubting tobe that up betwixt two strong atmies of the enemies, he retired speedily to Capua, a strong city feituat vpon the river Vulturnus; purposing thereby meanes of that deepe river, to stay the H French from passing farther. But whilst he lay there news was brought to him, that all the city of Naples was in an vprore, and that the citifens were all vp in armes, as men in doubt which way to turn themselves. Ferdinand not a little troubled with these bad news, commended the charge of his army and the defence of the City of Capua to his chiefe Captains, and rid him-

Capua to parify felfe in post back agains to Naples.

It is a strange thing to tell, what a sudden alteration ensued vpon his arrivall there: for suddenly all the tumult was appealed, every man laid down his arms, and welcommed him with a generall gratulation: for he was a man of a great and inuincible courage, and of so comely a personage, as might easily win the hearts of his subjects; insomuch, that when he earnessly requested them, that they would not traiterously betray him to his barbarous & cruellenemies, being their naturall King, or rather their brother borne and brought vp among it them: they all with one consent answered, That they would spend their lines and goods in his quarrell, so long as he should keep his army whole, & defend the city of Capua: but if it should so chance that the Aragonians should be ouerthrown, or els for seare abandon that city, and the French King, as victor, to approch the city of Naples, he should do both against reason and equity, if by exacting fidelity and allegiance of his fubicas, apprehended with fo iust a feare, he should fo expose that noble city with the fruitfull countrey thereabout, to be spoyled and destroyed by a mercilesse and cruell energy. Whilst Ferdinand was thus bussed in appealing and confirming his wavering subjects at Naples, the French king had taken divers cities, and was come before Capua. The citisens of Capua, although they were alwaies well affected to the Ato-K gonian kings, yet feeing the French King as a most violent tempest to beare downe all before him, began now to consult among st themselves of yeelding vp the city, whereunto they were the more prickt forward, by the fuelden revolt of the great captaine Trivaltiss with his followers; as also by the departure of Virginius and Petilianus, two great and famous commanders, who feeing themselues forsaken of Triunlius, fled with their companies unto the city of Nola. In this discomfiture of King Ferdinands army, the Frenchmen had entred into the suburbs of the city: which thing Gothfredus and Gaspar (two valiant Germane captaines) beholding, sallied with their companies out of the city, of purpose to abate the pride of the French, and to confirme the doubtfull citifens. These worthy Captains, when they had with exceeding valour repulfed the French, and thought to have againe returned into the city, could not be fuf- L fered to enter, but were by the citifens shut out of the gate, in danger to have had their throats cut by the enemy. In which perplexity they were glad vpon their knees to intreat the cowardly citisens standing upon the wals, not in such traiterous manner to betray their friends ready in their defence to bestow their lives : and with much intreating, at length obtained of those heartlesse men that they might by ten and ten in a company be received in at one gate of the city, and fo put out at another, farthest from the danger of the enemy: in which fort when they had paffed through the City, they took the way towards Naples: and vpon the way met with the King at Aueria, vnto whom they declared all that had happened in his absence at Capua; who although he saw his army dispersed, and all things now desperat, yet went he on forward, and came to the very gates of Capua, and there called vpon divers of the chiefe men of the M City, requiring to be let in. But when he saw there was none to give him answer, and an enfigne of the French King displayed vpon the wall, in token that the city was become French; he returned to Naples: where he found the gates now thut against him, and all the citifens vp againe in armes, and not willing to receive any of the fouldiers which came from Capita;

more than the King himselfe; for flying fame preventing his return, had filled every corner of the city with report, That all the chiefe captains of his army were either gone ouer to the encmy, or els for safegard of their lives fled: That the whole army was broken vp; and Capua veelded to the French. Wherefore the Neapolitans framing their fancies according to the condition of the time, began now also to fawne vpon the good fortune of the French, and to have King Ferdinand in contempt: which he well perceiving, and fetching a compasse farther off from the city, came to the castle, wherinto he was received with his followers by his faithfull captains therein before left. But providently forefeeing that he could not there long stay, but that he should be be fieged by his enemies both by sea and land, he commended the keeping of that peece to Alphonfus D'analus, a most valiant captaine, and departed himselfe with twenty gallies wel appointed vnto Ænaria, an Island not far from Naples, having in it a commodious harbor and a strong castle: where fortune, neuer firme but in misery, seemed again to deride the noore remainder of his honor: for comming thither, the Captain of the castle, vnworthily named lustus, forgetting his duty towards his fourraigne, of whom he had before received many extraordinary fauors, most traiterously now in his so hard distresse shut the gates of the castle against him at his landing, and unkindly refused to receive him. With which vnexpected ingratitude the poore King was wonderfully perplexed and almost abashed: yet with carnest inreaty and ample commemoration of the benefits and preferments which both his father and himselse had in times past bestowed upon him, he prevailed so much with this unthankfull man, that he was content to receive him into the castle, so that he would come but himselse a lone: of which his offer, when no more could be got, the king seemed to accept. So the captain having opned a port to receive him in, was in the very entrance thereof suddenly stabd to the heart with a dagger by king Ferdinand and flain in the midft of his armed foldiers : which was Amost resolved don with fuch accountenance & maiesty, that the warders with the weapons in their hands, dif. maid with his look, forthwith at his commandment opned the gate, and received him in with all his followers. Whereby it appeareth. That in the countenance of Princes resteth a certain " divine Majesty, in al fortunes aboue the common course of nature: which is of power to daunt u the hearts of most disloyall traytors in the performance of their vnnaturall treasons. The next day after the departure of king Ferdinand from the castle of Naples, Charles the French King was received into the city, with such pomp, triumph, and acclamation of the Neapolitans, as Charles the French King n if they had even then by the benefit of that forraine King, bin restored to perfect liberty, and received into deliuered out of some long and hard bondage. Shortly after, the castle of Naples, with all the Naples. strong places thereabout were yeelded to the French, and Embassadors sent from all the princes and people of that Kingdome, yeelding themselves into the power of the French King. Then Ferdinand seeing all lost and gone, departed from Enaria, where he lay expecting the euent of his hard fortune, and failed into Sicilia. Thus the house of Arragon in lesse than fine moneths, lost the Kingdome of Naples, about 63 yeares after that it was first taken from the French by Alphonfus the elder, this Ferdinand his great grandfather.

The report of the great preparation made by the French for this war, had long before filled the cares of them which dwelt in any part of the Turks dominions in Europe; but when they saw the French ensignes displayed upon the wals of the Castles and strong townes along the coast of Calabria and Salerne, such a sudden seare fell upon the Turks garrisons along it the coast of Epirus and Macedonia on the other side of the Adriatick, ouer against that part of Italy, that many of them for fook their charge: the Christians in those places, as also in Grecia and Peloponesus, beginning then to lift up their heads in hope of their deliuerance, & to make the best preparation they could to ioyne with the French against the Turks: but especially the rough and wild people inhabiting the high mountaines called Acrocheraunij in the borders of Epirus, who prefently took vp armes, refusing to be any longer tributary vnto the Turkish

This prosperous and speedy successe of the French King in the conquest of Naples, filled theminds of most of the Christian Princes, as also of the Turkish Emperor, with a doubtfull expectation, whither his greatnes would grow: many being of opinion, that he couertly affeded the empire of Rome, and to make himselfe the sole monarch of Italy. Which conceit no little troubled both the great Bishop Alexander, and Maximilian then Emperour. Bajazet alsofeared much, least hee should voon the sudden turne his forces into Epirus or Grecia, to his no small disquiet. And Ferdinand, the adusted King of Spaine, was no lesse carefull for the G fasety of Sicilia. Lodonicus Sfortia also (shortly after created Duke of Millan, the chiefe occafion of the French Kings comming into Italy, and a great aider of him in those warres) began now to confider better of the matter, and to stand in doubt of the King, whom he well perceis ued to make small reckoning of his word or promise, so that he might thereby inlarge his dominions. And the Venetians, who in all these wars had stood looking on as neuters (in hope that when the Aragonians and French had with long wars, which they vainly imagined, well weakened one another, that they might then at their pleasure share out something for them. felues) were now in doubt with the rest of the states of Italy to lose some part of their owne territory: for now there was no Prince or state in Italy able to oppose themselves against the French, but stood all as it were at his denotion.

Wherefore the a orefaid Princes, namely Maximilan the Emperour, Ferdinand K. of Spain. Childen Pro- Alexander Bishop of Rome, the state of Venice, and Lodonicus Sfortia, Duke of Millan, for the ce against the more affurance of their cftates, by their Embassadors speedily sent from one to another, concluded a strong league among themselves; whereof the chiefe capitulation was, That if any of these consederats should vpon their own accord make war vpon any other prince, they should do it voon their owne charges: but if any of them should chance to be inuaded, by any other. that then every one of these consederates should of their owne charge send source thousand horse and ten thousand foot in aid of their confederat so inuaded, vntill the wars were ended: which league was to endure for twenty yeares. The fame of this league was welcome to many other Princes, but especially to Bajazet, who now seared nothing more, than the forces of the I French, and had therefore offred to the Venetians, to aid them both by fea & land against the French, if their affaires should so require. This league so much pleased not other Princes but it troubled the French king more, as of purpose made against him, although it was by the confederates pretended to be made only for their own fafety. Wherefore he with all expedition placed his best Captaines with strong garrisons in all the cities and strong holds of the Kingdome of Naples, and left Mompenfer his viceroy in the city of Naples, and with the rest of his army returned into France; purpoling by the way as he went to terrify the diffembling bishop. fo if it were possible to draw him from the league; and afterwards to deale with Sfortia & the rest as he might. But when he was come neer vnto Rome, the Bishop for feare fled out of the city to Perufium, intending from thence to have fled to Venice, if the French King should K haue further pursued him. Charles deceived of his purpose, in peaceable maner entred the city, and there stayd three dayes, and so departed; vsing violence against none, but against such as were well known to be of the Aragonian faction. From Rome he marched to Pifa; and so with much paine passing the Appenines, was at the river of Tarrus, not far from Parma, set vpon by Franciscus Gonzago Duke of Mantua, Generall of a great army which the Venetians and Sforthe had raifed vpon the fudden to have stopped his passage: in which battel he was in great danger to haue bin taken or flaine, and there loft his Tents, with all the rich spoyle gotten in the rich kingdom of Naples: yet having at length with great flaughter valiantly repulfed his enemies, he afterwards returned in safety home.

About the same time that this battell was fought at Tarrus, the yong king Fardinand, lately L driven out of his Kingdome by the French King, returned againe out of Sicilia to Naples: where he was joyfully received of the Neapolitans, and by the help of his friends (but especially of the great Gonfaluss, fent in his aid by Ferdinand King of Spaine) in leffe than a yeres space recoucred the Kingdome of Naples againe from the French: and then dying without issue, left the same vnto his vncle Fredericus. Wherein the vncertainty of worldly honours, the chiefe felicity of ambitious minds, is well to be noted; when as in that one kingdom the chief gouernment was fix times changed in leffe than the space of three yeares: for first, Ferdinand the elder dying, left that kingdome vnto his sonne Alphonsus, at such time as the French King was making preparation for those wars: Alphonsis despairing of his owne forces, resigned the Kingdome to his fon Ferdinand, when he had scarcely reigned fully a yeare: Ferdinand in lesse M than three moneths was driven quite out of Italy by Charles the French King: Charles possesfed of the kingdome, in short time after was againe dispossessed by the same Ferdinand: Ferdisand having with much trouble thrust out the French, died within lesse than a yere: After whom succeeded Fredericus his vnele, no lesse vnsortunat than the rest : and Charles the French

But to return again to the course of our history, from whence the great occurrents of that 1497. rime (not altogether impertinent to our purpose) have a little too far led vs. Bajazet deliue- The Turker is. red of two great fears, first by the death of his brother Zemes, and afterward by the casting out unding radatid of the French out of Naples; began now to turn his forces vpon the Christians, and by his and Kassis, are Lieutenant Bali-Beg Sanzack of Siliftra, inuaded the countries of Podolia and Raffia, beeing for most pare natt of the Polonian kingdom, where the Turks did great harm, and carried away many pri-6 foners. But comming again the fecond time, and making such like spoil as before, they stayd follong, that the cold of Winter (which in those Countries is very extream) was now come on and in their return, as they were about to have passed through Moldavia, they were by stephanus Prince of that Countrey, denied both passage and victuals, and forced to take the way along it the fea coaft: where many of them stragling from their Army, were by the way entoff and flain by the Moldavians; and the rest, what by the extremitie of the cold, what for want of food, and foulnesse of the way perished: so that of that great Army, very few retursed home. The Turks Histories report, That in this Expedition were lost forty thousand

Of the Christians that were fost, many were drowned in Morava, chusing rather fo to end their daies, than to fall into the hands of their bloudy Enemies. This ouerthrow was imputed to the General, who would needs give the Turks battel implain field, although he was earneftly intreated by County Io, Torquatus, to have kept the fireits of that country, wherby he might have had great advantage of the enemy. Torquatus himself having lost all his horsmen in that battel, and his horse killed under him, sought valiantly on foot, vittl he was by the multitude of his enemies oppressed and slain. The Bassa to D give Bajazet a fure testimony of the victory, caused all the notes of the slain Christians to be emoff and put upon firings, and fo by Waggon fent them as a barbarous Prefent to Constantinople.

After the death of Charles the French King, Lewis the twelfth having obtained that Kingcom, wrothimselfe also Duke of Millan, as descended of one of the daughters of 10. Galeatus first Duke of Millan: in which his supposed right he was fully resolved to make warre vpon Sfortia then Dake of Millan. And for his better succes in those wars, sought by all means he could to draw some other of the Princes and States of Italy into the fellow ship of that intended war, but about all others the Venetians, as most commodious for his purpose; with whom he madea firm league, and for the aid they were to give him, covenanted, That they should E have for their share the city of Cremona, with all the pleasant country about Abdua, then a part of Sfortia's dominions. Which was afterwards accordingly performed.

Sfortia understanding of this compact made against him, & knowing himself far too weak of himself to stand against so puissant enemies; attempted first to set Maximilian the Empefor, with the States of Germany, vpon the French King. But that not forting to his defire, he fought to agree with the King, by offering to hold his Dukedome of him, by paying him a yearly tribute. After he had thus in vain proued all the meanes he could deuife, to have appeafed the French King, and prouided for his own fafety; he by his Embassadors sent of purpole, certified BajaZet of the confederation betwist the French King and the Venetians, and that their purpose was after they had oppressed him and some other of the States of Italy, then with their united forces to inuade his dominions: and that therfore it were good for him intime to looke vnto it, and to give aid against those who would in short time become his most dangerous enemies. By this meanes the Duke was in good hope, so to busic the Veneriant, by bringing in the Turk vpon them, as that they (hould fland the French in small stead. Atwhich time also the Embassadors of Florence did what they could to pricke forward the Turk to make wars upon the Venetians, for the malice they bare against them for protecting G them of Pila against the oppression of the Florentines.

Bajazet perfuaded by the Embaffadours, and calling to remembrance the injuries before don him by the Venetians; first by aiding John Castrios the son of Scanderbeg, and John Cherne. another prince of Epirus, (wherby he loft a great part of that countrey, and was also fur. ther inforced to yeeld to fuch conditions as altogether stood not with his honor) and again. by denying to give his fleet leave to put into their habors of Cyprus, in the time of his wars against the Sultan of Egypt : all which he was glad then to endure, for fear lest that his brother Zemes (then living) should by their means bee serve against him; promised now to doe what the Embassadors had requested; glad in his mind, that the discord of the Christian princes had presented vnto him so fit an opportunitie of reuenge.

Fraul part of services for Herupon he made great preparation both by fea and land against the Venetians, and you the fudden cauted Scander Bassa his Lieutenant in Illyria, with twelve thousand horsmen to break into the country of Friuli, part of the Venetian territory upon the borders of Italy, The Bassas he had in charge, passing ouer divers great rivers, at length entred the countrey, burning and destroying all before him as far as Liquentia, carying away with him all the poore country people prisoners. But when he was come to the banks of Tiliaventum, & understood that he came too late to pleasure the duke of Millan (for why, the French with the Venetians had before without refistance driven him quite out of Italy & Germany) he there with more than barbarous cruelty put 4000 poor prisoners to the sword; and so having filled the country with mourning and with bloud, returned from whence hee came, loded with the spoyle of I that rich country.

At the same time also, Bajazet put to sea such a fleet, as none of his predecessors had before fet forth; and with a great army in person himself marched along it the sea coast of Morea, in fuch fort, as that his army by land, and his fleet at fea, as neer as they could kept even pace the one within fight of the other. Neither were the Venetians unmindfull of themselves, but set forth a strong fleet under the charge of Anthony Grimani their Admiral; in number far insenor to the Turks, but for equipage, strength, skilful mariners, and al other maner of warlike prouision much superior. For which cause the Turkes, although defied and braued by the Venetians, yet durst not at the first join with them in battel, but still kept alongst the coast of Morea, not daring to put farther off into the sea, In this their course the Venetians troubled them K exceedingly, formetimes making thew as if they would have conftrained them to fight, and otherwhiles giving them chase, never departing far from them, wisely accounting it right good seruice, if they could but keepe that huge fleet from landing in Italy or other place of the Venetian tetritory. Most men were in good hope, that if those great fleets should haute joined in battel, the Venetians should have had a notable victory, for that the enemy as afraid kept fo dangerous a courte, and fo neer the main. The longer they thus failed, the more was the State of Venice offended with their Admiral, that he contrary to all expectation delayed to fight, ful fuffering the dangerous enemy to approach necret and necret their territories and there were none which had not rather hee should have set all vpon the hazard of one battell, than to protract by delay a long and doubtful war. Whilft all men were thus in expectation L of some great exploit to be don vpon the enemy, newes came to the city, That the Turks fleet had put into the hauen Sapientia in the Island Sphraga, towater, and was there embayed by the Venetians. This report was of all men joyfully received, as if the victory had bin already affured and to much the more, for that it was vainly supposed that it would be gained without any great losse. But others which better knew the place, deemed of the matter far otherwise, faying, That the place wherin the enemy lay was such, as that he might safely at his pleasure depart thence. Yet forsomuch as the Turkes fleet was more subject vnto danger in putting out of the Harbor, than in the wide sea, there was no man bur was of opinion, That the Venetian Admiral would fet vpon them as they should come forth again. Whilst men were thus dinining to and fro, and the Venetians attending the comming forth of the Enemies fleet, it M fortuned that Andreas Lauredanus and Albanus Armerius (two valiant gentlemen) but a little before come from Corcyra of purpose to be present at the battell, were the first that began the fight; and with their two nimble (hips (after they had exchanged a few bullets) boordel a tall Ship of the Turks, being of fuch beauty and burthen, that the feemed rather a CaA file than a ship, wherof one Baruch of Smyrna (a notable pirat) was Captain: who after a long and cruel fight, perceiuing that he must either yeeld, or by force be taken, desperatly fired his own (hip, by the rage wherof both she and the Venetian ships fast grapled vnto her, were all three together burnt downe to the water. Many of the men, to shun the violence of the fire, leapt ouer boord into the fea, where fome of them were taken vp by other thips, and fome perifled. Some few other of the Venetian fleet couragiously affailed the Turkes at their comming out, and doing great harm, put the Turks whole fleet in no small fear. But most part of the Venetian gallies lay looking on a far off; vnto whom the other, before in fight with the Turks, after they had don what they could, retyred also. But by that they had don it appeared plainly that the Venetian Admiral that day let flip out of his hands a most notable victorie.

After this fight the Turks held on their course, stil keeping Morea on the right hand, whom the Venetians stil followed: at length the Turks fleet was come to the entrance of the gulf of Patras, where the Venetians again faintly fetting vpon them, fuffered them to recour the gulf, with no leffe dishonor than they had before let them escape at the port Sapientia: for the Venetians having the advantage of the place and better appointed for fight at fea might cafilv(as it was supposed) have gained the victory, if the commanders (but especially the admirallhad bin fo forward in that feruice as became men of their spirit. But many of them afraid to fight, lay aloof; fo that Dauthes the Turks Admiral, who perceiving himselfe too weake, had purposed to run his gallies on shore, and so to have fled to the army at land, if he had felt C himselfouercharged by the Venetian fleet; had now contrary to his expectation, recoursed thegulf he defired, though not without loffe of some of his gallies. Within this gulf stands theantient city of Naupactum (now called Lepanto) then fubic to the Venetians, whither Bajazet was now come by land with his Army: and now by the comming of his fleet into the gulf, laid hard fiege to the city both by fea and land. They in the city feeing themselves on ded to the every fide befet with their enemies, without any great refiftance fel to composition with Ba- Turke. jazet, and so yeelded unto him the city, which the Turks hold at this day.

Grimanus the Venetian Admirall returning to Venice, was for all his euil feruice (or rather for that he, according to his mild nature, had not vied feueritie against those Captaines that refused to fight) cast in prison; and although he was a man mightily be friended, yet was hee D by a publique decree banished into one of the Absytides, Islands upon the coast of Liburnia. From the first foundation of the city of Venice, was neuer man impugned with more spight, ordefended by greater friends; but Common hatred preuailing hee was neuertheles exiled. Thus Bajazet having made a rode into the Venetian territory by Scander-Baffa, and taken from them the City of Naupa ctum, with the Countrey thereabout, returned with victory to Con-

The next year following, being the year 1500, Baja (et put to sea a greater and stronger fleet 1500 than he had the year before; and himself in person with a puissant army of 150000 men ente- hiethone bessered by the streit of Corinth into Peloponesus, and marching thorow the Country, came and ged both by sea incamped before the strong City of Methone (now called Modon) then under the gouern- Enjaget. ment of the Venetians; at which time his great fleet met him there also by sea, as he had before appointed. When he had thus befet the city both by fea and land, and with long and continual battery made three great and fair breaches in the walls, he gaue vnto the same two terrible affaults, and that with such desperat sury, that many of them which went first vnto the breach, ouerthrown by the presse of them that followed, were troden to death. Yet neuertheles the city was both times valiantly defended by the citisens and garrison soldiers. So that when he had don what he could, he was glad to retyre from the walls, having filled the Town ditches with the bodies of his slain Turks. The Venetian Admirall Trivifanus lying then at the Isle of Zacynthus, (but far too weak to fight with the Enemie) in the beginning of the siege sent Valerius Marcellus and Baptista Polanus, with two Gallies sull of men and munition in F relief of the besieged; and now doubting their further wants, sent Io. Maripeirm, Alex. Cothis of Corcyra, and Cachuris of Hydruntum, with three other great Gallies, with men, munition, and such other things as he thought needfull for defence of the City. These three resolute Captains comming with a full winde, and packing on all their failes brake thorow the Turks great fleet lying in their way, and ran themselues aground under the Walls of the

Town: for they of the Towne had so barred the hauen for fear of the enemy, that they could G not possibly get in that way. The Cititens and Soldiers joyfull of the comming of this fresh fupply, and withall fearing left the Gallies should be fet off again from them by the Enemy, came running by heaps from all parts of the City, towards the sea, to receive this new come aid. Which was don with such a confused disorder, that divers places of the city toward the land were lest without defendants, as if there had been no Enemie neer. Which the Ianiza-Michonersion ries quickly perceiving, presently entred by those for saken places, with very little or no resistance. Then the Citisens all too late began to make head; for the Ianizaries already entred, madeway for the rest of the Army; which swarming into the City, slew without pitty every one that came in the way, as well Grecians as Venetians, with all the fouldiers but then newly landed out of the three Gallies. In this flaughter, Anthonius Fabrius and Bardella (both H Gouernours of the Town) with Andreas Falco Bishop of Methone, in his Pontificalibus, and his Mytre on his head, were flaine. None escaped their fury, but such as were for their ftrength reserved for service labor, or for beauty, to the Victors suft. And of these, a thousand bound tast together in long ropes, were brought to Bajazets Pauilion, and there in his fight, by his commandement cruelly murthered. The Cities of Corone and Pylus (now called Navarrinum) fometimes the dwelling place of old Neftor, terrified with the taking of Methone, yeelded themselves by Composition to BajaZet. The City of Chrisseum, now known by the name of Caput S. Galli, was taken also by Cherseogles, Bajazet his son in law. Al these were Cities belonging to the Venetians. Nauplium also was besieged by Haly Bassabut yet fill defended by the Venetians. Bajazet having new tortified the city of Methone, and stored I it with new inhabitants, left in it a strong garrison, and so with victory returned to Constantmople.

About this time Trivifanus the Venetian Admirall died, of griefe of mind, as some suppor fed. In whose place the Senat sent one Benedictus Pisaurius a noble & valiant Gentleman, who with the Venetian fleet followed the enemy, then departing from the fiege of Nauplium, purfuing them cuen vnto the fireits of Hellespontus, fil cutting off such as firagled or taried behind the rest of the sleet. By which means he took aboue twenty of their Gallies, and in his return took from the Turks the Island of Ægina; and landing in divers places of the Turkes Dominions, left vnto them the wofull remembrance of his being there. Afterward meeting with Gonfalvus, fyrnamed the Great (sent by Ferdinand King of Spain, to aid him against the K Turks) at Zacynthus, hee inuaded Cephalenia (which Trivifanus his predeceffor had in vain attempted the year before) and layd hard fiege vnto the City; which for a space was valiantrelation to ly defended by the Turks, but yet at length by the good conduct of Gonfalvus it was by force taken; when as Gifdure the Gouernor therof, with his garrison of Turks, had before fought it out even to the last man. The City being taken, all the whole Island yeelded forthwith to the

Pifaurius having taken Cephalenia, repaired the city, and leaving a strong garrison for the defence of the Isle, departed for Coreyra; where he was aduertised that the Turkes were rigging forth a great fleet against the next Spring, wherof some part lay in the Bay of Ambracia not far from Corcyra, some at Eante, and the rest within the streits of Hellespontus. Where- L fore purposing to do some exploit vpon those gallies which lay in the Bay of Ambracia; to auert the mind of the enemie from perceiuing of that which he had fecretly with himfelf intended, he fent the greatest part of his sleet vnto the Island of Neritos, who suddenly landing should put the inhabitants in sear. The Captains sent about the businesse, cheerfully put in execution what the Admirall had commanded, and by their fudden landing raifed fuch a tumult, that all the Countries therabout were filled with the expectation of that which should ensue therof. The Bay of Ambracia is so streitned on either side with the mountains of Epirus, that the entrance therof is but half a mile ouer: but by and by opening it felf into a great widenesse, and running vp into the land, maketh a most pleasant and safe harbor for ships and Gallies to ride in. Pifarrins with a fair wind comming thither with eight Gallies well ap- M pointed, when the Turks thought him to have bin at Neritos, and entring the streit, rowing farther into the Bay, burnt one of the Turks great gallies, to the terror of all them that dwelt round about the Bay; and carried away with him eleuen more, laded with munition and Vi-Aual, through the fireit; the Turkes in vain fretting therear, and doing what they could with

A their great ordnance from shore, to have sunk him in going out of the Bay. But having done what he came for, he returned with his prey again to Corcyra. Not long after he also reco. Pylos taken fra uered the castle of Pylos in Morea: which as it was suddenly gotten, so was it as suddenly the Turks, and loft. For Camalia a notable Turkish pyrat, who had bin abroad seeking after purchase, putting unsation. in that harbor by chance, took 3 gallies there left by the admiral for defence of the place, and forerrified the faint hearted captain, that he fel to composition with the pyrat to yeeld him thecastle, so that he and his soldiers might in safety depart. Which the pyrat granting, had the castle deliuered vnto him, which he could not with far greater strength haue possibly won. Sowas Pylos for fear twice in one yeare yeelded up vnto the Turkes, and was both times the death of the cowardly captains that gaue it vp, being both beheaded by commandement of B the Admiral. About the same time Pisaurius attempted to have burnt other of the Turks gallies lying in the river Eante, ypon the coast of Macedonia, but not with so good success as before, for the Turks made more carefull by the losse they had but a little before received at Ambracia, did now more vigilantly look unto their gallies. So that when Pifaurius had in cerrain small vessels made of purpose for that service, imbarked two hundred resolute souldiers, tohaue gonvo the river to have fired the gallies, they were by the way, after they had a good way entred into the river, incountred by the Turks and inforced to return. But before they could get out of the river, the wind rose so contrary, with such a stif gale in the mouth of the river, that the mariners overmastred with the violence of the weather, when they had done what they could, and spent al their strength, were driven on shore, some on the one side of the C river, some on the other, and so fel into the hands of their enemies, of whom it booted not to

About this time Bajazet took also the antient and famous city of Dyrrachium, now called Dyrrachium

Durazo, from the Venetians; before ruinous, and almost quite abandoned by the inhabitants, taken by the as a place of danger, and not to be kept now that the Turk had got all the Country round about it. The Venetians fore pressed with these wars so long maintained against the Turkes, had many times craued aid of other Christian princes, and were wel holpen by the Spaniard inthetaking of Cephalenia. And now Lewis the French King, vpon a good devotion to that war, sent the Lord Rauestein with seuen tall ships and sisteen gallies wel appointed, out of Prouince and Genoa, to aid the Venetians his friends. This fleet departing from Naples, where D they had by the way put in, and passing about Italy, and so through the Ionian sea, came vnto Melos one of the Cyclads at which Island Pifaurius with his fleet in short time arrived also. From whence they by mutual confent departed together to inuade the Island of Lesbos; and being there fafely ariued, landed their forces, and laid fiege vnto the strong City of Mytilene, Myllenebe. where by the fury of their artillery they in short time had made a fair breach in the wall. In seged. the time of this battery, whilst the breach was in making, Pifaurius with part of his fleet failed to Tenedos: for it was reported, that certaine of the Turkes Gallies were then comming for that place out of Hellespontus. Which report, as some write, was of purpose given out by the French, therby to draw the Venetian Admirall from the fiege; that so in the mean time they being in good hope to take the town in his absence, might themselves carry away the honour therof, together with the rich spoile. Others fauouting the French, blame the Venetian Admirall, as if he had of purpose departed, enuying at the honor of the French. Which is hardly to be beleeued in so honourable a personage, and in an action so much concerning the good of his Commonwealth. Howfoeuer it was, the breach being made, in his absence was by the French presently assaulted; although that Paulus Valatesius the Venetian Vice admitalearnestly requested the French Admiral to deferre the affault for a while, and to expect the comming of Pifarrius. Which his counsell the French Admirall gaue him the hearing of but yet went forward with the affault. The Frenchmen after their maner furiously affailing the breach, were valiantly repulsed by the Turks; fo that in the breach was made a deadly and horrible fight, many falling on both fides. Yet for all that, the City was manfully defen-F ded by the Turks, and the Frenchmen were inforced to retyre. The French Admiral having taken this repulse, commanded all things to be caried aboord, purposing to have for saken the fiege, and fo to have departed. When in the mean while the Venetian Admirall returned, and with much ado persuaded the French to stay. Wherupon the battery was again begun with greater tury than before; and now the leaders were confulting of a fresh assault to be given , G when fuddenly news was brought, That the Turks fleet was comming to relieue the city; and therupon the assault was for a time deferred, and the battery continued. But those Turks that came being in number but few, were for most part by them in the gallies taken and cast overboord, some few that got to land, saued themselves in the woods & desart places of the Isle By this time the city was again made faultable, and the Venetians with great courage affai. led the breach, and had twice gained the top of the Rampiers, from whence they were againe both times beaten down by the Turks, the French al the while looking on. Many valiant men were there flain and hurt; and in the end the Venetians were glad with loffe to retyre, as had the French don before. Whilst this was in doing, a pinnace came to the fleetwith news, That the Great Master of the Rhodes was comming with his gallies to the siege: wherupon thead- H mirals determined to maintain the fiege vntill his comming. But the next day after, the French Admiral changing his purpose, shipped his men; and hoising fail departed to Chios. and failing thence toward Italy, was ouertaken with a terrible tempest, wherin the Admirall gally with two others were lost, with 800 good foldiers; the Admiral himself with aboue forty others were by chance contrary to all hope faued, and with much danger with his weatherbeaten fleet recouered the hauen of Tarentum. The Venetian Admiral thus for faken of the French, and seeing the time past wherin he expected the comming of the Great Master of the Rhodes, brake up the fiege and departed from Lesbos to Chios, and from thence to Paros, where he found the Master of the Rhodes with his gallies, vnto whom he complained greatly of the inconstancy of the French, imputing it to them, that the city of Mytilen was not won, I 1502. Neither were they behind with him, but in all places where they came laid the fault as much or more voon him. From Paros the Venetian Admiral took his course to the Island of Melos. where he found one Rhichius an arch pirat of the Turkes, who by force of tempest was driven on shore, and by the sudden comming down of the Island people taken. Him (for that he had exercifed exceeding cruelty vpon certain Christians that he had taken) Pifanting caused tobe fast bound to a spit, and with a soft fire to be rosted to death. From Melos he returned to Corcyra, and there wintred.

The next Spring, Pifaurius with certain gallies which Alexander Bishop of Rome had sent vnto him, under the command of Iacobus Pifaurius Bishop of Paphia, failed to Neritos, now called S. Maura, which is an Island parted from the firm land with a little fret of the sea, long K time before that way let in by the Corinthians. Here Pifaurius suddenly landing his men, surprifed the Island, and with wonderful celeritie and industry cast vp two great trenches, in such fort and to fo good purpose, that 3000 of the Turks horsemen comming at a low water, ouer that narow streit which parts the Island from the maine, were with losse repulsed, and forced to retyre. Wherupon S. Maura the chief city was forthwith deliuered to Pisaurina, with the

The Venetians weary of this long and chargeable war against so mighty an enemy, sent Lodouicus Manetius their embassador to Bajazet, to treat with him for peace: but Bajazet stood vpon such hard points, that nothing could at that time be concluded. Yet Manetine so discreetly wied the matter, that BajaZet sent with him at his returneto Venice, his Embassadour, to pro- L pound vnto the Senat such conditions as it pleased him to grant them peace vpon. This embaffador had audience in the Senat twice, where he in his masters name propounded such vnreasonable and proud conditions, that they were by the Senat rejected, and so he himselfe dismiffed and fent back again.

The year following, the Venetians sent an Embassador to BajaZet, who moved with the pittiful complaints of his own subjects, for the daily harmes they received of the Venetians along fi the sea coast, as also for want of trade; and fearing also some troubles like to arise in his kingdom in Asia(as indeed theredid not long after) yeelded himself more willingly to heare of peace than before. This embassador, called Zacharias Phriscus, was wel heard of Bajazes, and after long fuit, brought the matter he came for into some good terms; and being honourably M rewarded by the Turkish Sultan returned home, carying with him to the Senat far more reafonable conditions of peace than had at any time before bin by BajaZet propounded. Herupon the Venetians shortly after sent Andreas Gritti (an honorable Senator) a man wel knowne

A to Bajazet, both for his famous traffique in former time at Constantinople, and also for that in these late wars he was taken prisoner at the winning of Methone, and his life spared at the intercession of Cherscogles (Bajazets son in law) and afterward ransomed : hee in the name of the State from whence he came, concluded a peace with Bajazet. The capitulations wherof were, first. That the Venetians should deliver up the Islands of Neritos and Leucadia, referring to themselves the Island of Cephalenia only. Then, That Bajazet should restore all such goods between as had bin taken from the Venetian merchants in these late wars. And that it should be law-najazet of the full for them (as they were wont) safely to traffick into the Euxine sea, and to Constantino. Venerant. ple, and there to have their Conful or governor as they had in former time. And laftly, That the Venetian territory should be certainly known, and separated from the Turks by certaine B bounds and limits. These conditions were folemnly agreed upon, and confirmed both by Bajazer and the state of Venice; and so a firm peace concluded in the year 1503, after the VVars

The same year BajaZet affembled a great and puissant army of his best and most approved foldiers, as wel in Alia as Europ, which met together at Sophia, purpoling as it was thought, tohaue inuaded Hungary: but worthily doubting the fucces of that war against so warlike a nation he changed his purpose, and leaving Achmetes Bassa with his Asian soldiers at Sophia, turned himself with the reft of his Army into Albania, to reduce those rebellious people a. gain to his obeifance; and had before fent a fleet of gallies to flop the paffages of that country along it the fea coaft. But the country people understanding of his comming, fled into the C high and rough rocks and mountains, from whence they did the Turks great harm. Who neuertheles with incredible labor and aduenture mounting those difficult places, and killing an exceeding number of those mountain and fauage people, carried all the women and children they could light yoon, away with them prisoners, and with fire and sword made all the country desolat. After which spoil don, BajaZet returned with his army to Manastirum; and departing thence, vpon the way met with a Dervillar (which is a phaseaftical and beggarly kind of Turkish Monkes, vsing no other apparel but two sheepe-skins, the one hanging before, the o-Bajaget in dar ther behind) a lufty strong fat sellow, attyred after the maner of his order, with a great ring in fine bin each ear:who drawing neer unto Bajazet as if he would of him have received an Almes, define wifar or turn ratly affailed him with a short scimitar which he had closely conteyed under his hypocriti- kis Monte. D cal habit. But BajaZet by the starting of the horse wheron herid (beeing afraid at the sudden approch of the hobgoblin) partly avoided the deadly blow by the traitor intended, yet not altogether vnwounded. Neither had he fo escaped the danger, had not Ishender Bassa with his horfmans mace presently throok down the desperat villain as hee was about to have doubled his stroke; but now struck dead, he was forthwith rent in pieces by the soldiers. This treacherous and desperat act so much mooued Bajazet, that he proscribed all them of that superstitious order, and banished them out of his empire.

After so many troubles, Bajazet gaue himself to a quiet course of life, spending most part Bajazet by maof his time in study of philosophy, and conference with learned men. Vnto which peaceable in peaceable kind of life he was by natural disposition more inclined than to wars; albeit that the regard E of his state, and the earnest desire of his men of war, drew him oftentimes euen against his wil into the field. As for the civil government of his kingdom, hee referred it wholly to his three principal Bassa's, Alis, Achmetes, and Iachia, who at their pleasure disposed of all things. After he had in this pleafing and quiet kind of life, to his great contentment paffed ouer five years; of a little neglected sparke suddenly arose such a fire in Asia, as was hardly after with much bloud of his people, and danger of that part of his Empire quenched: the reliques wherof yet tioubleth those superstitious people at this day. Which thing was brought to passe by the crafty deuice of Chafan Chelife & Schach Culi his boy (whom some cal Teckel Schachoculis, and Others Techellus) two hypocritical Persians; who slying into those countries, with the counterfeit shew of seigned holines having procured to themselves a great name among those rude F people, with a number of windy headed fellows (filled with the nouelty of their new doctrin) raised first such a diversitie of opinions about the true successors of their vntrue prophet, and afterwards such a rebellion among st the people, as that the one yet remaineth, and the other

But for the better understanding of the ground of these troubles, which hapned at this time G in the reign of Bajazet, by occasion of these two fugitive Persians, as also for the mortall wars which afterwards infued betwixt Hyfmael (commonly called the great Sophy of Perfia) and Nelymnighajazets successor; it shall not be much from our purpose, briefly to declare the great mutation which at this time hapned to the Persian kingdom, as well in the State it self, as in matters of their superstition. At such time as Asymbeins V sun-Cassanes reigned in Persia, there was one Harder Erdebil (whom Iovius calleth by the name of Hardwelles) a man honorably deseended among the Persians, who contemning worldly honor, riches, pleasure, and what sour els belonged to delicacie of life (commonly accounted the greatest part of humane felicity) as vanities and trifles, led fuch a streit and austere kind of life, with such continencie and contempt of the world, as that the vulgar people, for most part given to pleasure, wondring at that H in him, which they could not or would not imitate; began to haue the man in fingular admiration, for the opinion they had conceived of his vpright life and rare vertues. The fame of this new prophet (for so he was accounted) was grown so great in the Persian kingdom, that people without number reforted out of all parts of Persia and Armenia, vnto the great City of Tauris, to see the man. And he the more to seduce the multitude (delighted in nouelties) began to inveigh against the common received opinion of the Mahometans, concerning the true successors of their great Prophet; and to reviue the opinion of Giuni, syrnamed Sofi, pertuading the people (as if he had bin inspired with some divine inspiration) that none of the professors of the Mahometan religion should inherit the kingdom of heaven after death, but fuch as were the followers of Haly, the true successor of their great prophet Mahomet, and his I fellow in writing. Whom he taught them only to honour, as printy to the mind of the great Prophet, and to to receive his writings, as of all others most authentical; rejecting Ebubekir, Omo and Ofman, with their writings, as most wicked and accurfed men: whom the Turks had cuer, and yet do with the other Mahometans, honor and worthip as the true fucceffors of their great Prophet, and his fincers Interpreters, together with the afore faid Haly; whom the Persians do only acknowledge, and therfore in their prayers do commonly fay, Curfed bee Ebubekir, Omer, and Ofman, and Godbe fauorable to Haly, and well pleased with him. Which their difference about the true successor of their Prophet, in whom was no truth, hath bin, and yet is one of the greatest causes of the mortal! Wass between the Turkes and the Persians; and not the diuers interpretation of their Law (as many haue written) which among ft the Turks and Per- K fians is all one.

V sun-Cassairs mooned with the same and vertues of this new Prophet, or rather (as some Manhagrangh thought) defirous to win the hearts of the multitude that had received this new phantafie; gaue him in mariage his daughter Martha, begotten of the Christian lady Despina the daughter of Calo Ioannes Emperor of Trapezond. Which mariage the Christian Emperour made with the Mahometan prince, and he also accepted therof, therby to strengthen themselues against the Turkish Emperor Mahomet the Great, whose power was then become a terror vnto all his neighbor princes; but to how final purpose this policie serued them both, is before declared in the life of the faid Muhomet. At the conclusion of this mariage, the emperor had specially concuanted with Finn. Cassanes, that his daughter Despina might have the free exercise L of the Christian religion. Wherby it came to passe, that this Martha her daughter, instructed by her mother, became a Christian also: who now maried by her father vnto this precise hypociti Harder Erdebil, in short time bare him a fon called Hyfmael; whom she so much as shee could trained up in the principles of Christian religion. Wherby it came to passe that afterwards when he had by rare fortune obtained the kingdome of Persia, hee alwaies during his life had the Christians in good regard, and neuer found fault with their religion.

Haider thus graced with the mariage of the great kings daughter Marcha, only for his rare votues and puritie of life, as was commonly supposed, grew now into far greater credit and climation of the people than before. So that his doctrine and opinions began generally to be received, and the number of his followers fo greatly augmented, that I acup succeeding his M father Finn Caffanes, but lately dead, began to have his brother in law Haiders power and credit in inspect, and to distrust lest the Persians (who secretly fauored the remainder of the pofleritie of their antient kings) should assemble together under color of this new superstition,

Wherof there arofe two factions, fome fauoring the Viurper, and other-some the poor remainder of the descent of their antient Kings of the race of Tamerlane. For which cause lacup, as he was of a suspitious and trouble som nature and aboue measure jealous of his estate, nothing regarding the necre allyance or reputed holinesse of his godly brother in law, caused him (suspecting no such matter) to be secretly thaide redemurthered; and so having struck off his head, with fire and sword persecuted at the professors murthered. of that new doctrine; fo to deliuer himself for euer of that his vain and needlesse sear: Hylmacl the son of Haider (who was afterwards called the great Sophy of Persia) beeing then but a B child, as it were by fatal destiny escaped the fury of his cruel vncle Ident, and fled into Hyrca. nia, vnto one Pyrchales his fathers friend, who then ruled in a small territory neer vnto the Ca-

Amongst many others of the disciples and followers of Haider (which in that cruell perfecutionwere glad to fly for safegard of their lines) the two before named, Chasan Shelife and Schach Culi, afterwards fyrnamed Cufelbus, in ourward flew both of vertue and learning not inferior vnto their master, flying that dangerous tempest, and passing ouer the river Euphrates, came into Armenia the leffer, and there took vp their dwelling at the great mountaine Antitaturus: at the foot wherof the broken rocks have divers dark and obscure caves, made partly by art partly by nature; which place is by the Inhabitants called Teke-Ili: wherof divers Hi-C storiographers, I know not whether deceived by the name of the place, or els wittingly transferring the name of the place vnto the man that lived therin, have called this Schach Culi(who of the two proued of greater fame) by the name of Techellis, by which name wee wil also from henceforth cal him. A thing hertofore much vied among the religious, and also some of the children of great princes, who oftentimes bare the names of the places where they were born, or where they most lived. This place is both wholsom and exceeding pleasant, for the varietie of fruits and lively fprings, wherwith the plaines adioyning are continually watered, and the mountains at all times of the year garnished.

Here Shelife, with his companion Techellis, having separated themselves from the company of men, and given themselves wholly to a contemplative life; for divers yeares lived most D streitly and seuerely, contenting themselves with such things as the earth of it selfe afforded, without seeking for better. These hypocrits were first seene, and afterward acquainted with the shepheards and herdsmen living upon the mountains, and in proces of time with the rude husbandmen and country people, who wondring at their streit and deuout kinde of life, relieued them with all things necessary. Yea Baiazet himself, hearing of their austere and deuout maner of liuing, fent them yearly fix or seuen thousand aspers, as his alms given them vpon charitie and denotion. But afterwards when they began to tell fortunes, and as it were by the way of distination to prognosticat of things to come, the rurall people held them for more than men, and conceived of them a firm opinion that they were some divine prophets. And so were by the country people first drawn into the country villages, and afterward, as if it had bin against their wils, into the cities; where they had in short time filled all the countrey far and neer with the admiration of their fame. But after they began to publish their new phantafied doctrine concerning the true successor of their great prophet Mahomet, they wanted not their new fangled followers (as had Haider their master before amongst the Persians) who had them in fingular reuerence, persuaded now by them, that they should be condemned for euer, if they did not, as they were by them taught, give the honour of the true succession of their great Prophet, only to Haly, and him only to reuerence and call vpon next vnto the great

When they had thus with their often fermons and blinded prophecies seduced the people, and in short time won great credit among the vulgar sort, of themselves too much given F to nouelty and superstition; they commanded their disciples & followers to wear vpon their Turkish hats a red band or riband, whereby to be knowne from others that were not of their profession. Of which red bands or ribands, they who professed this new superstition, were, and The beginning yet are ouer all the East part of the world called by the name of Cufel baffa's, that is to fad, Red- of the Cufelbaffa's

Hyfmaclalfoliuing in exile, most earnestly embraced that new superstition which Haider G his father had before taught in Persia, but with far better fortune and successe. For as soon as Fewas grown to mans estate, he following his fathers maner of life, and being by nature wond. stull eloquent, comely of person, exceeding wise, and of an inuincible courage, was of the rade vulgar people accounted of more like a god than a man; fo that hee grew to be of great fame and power among it those barbarous people with whom he lived. And not the base and vulgar fort only, but divers noblemen also, and others of good reputation, once allured with the noueltre of his doctrine, the more to manifest their good will toward the author of their fect after they had forfaken their old superstition, ceased not (as the maner of men is) to commend him in the highest degree of vertue and honor. And he himself as yet but a youth, altogether bending his wit to the fetting forth of himfelf, making femblant of more than was indeed in him, obtained, as if it had bin against his wil, riches, honor, same, and authority; of all which things he as a notable diffembler feemed to make no account or reckoning. Neither were fome wanting who would fwear, that Haider his father (as hee was an excellent Aftronomet) calculating his nativitie, should fay, That he should prove a great prophet, and the Auther of true religion, who subduing the greatest part of the East, should become as glorious both in matters of religion and martial affairs, as was Mahomet the great Prophet himselse. Which report being bruted abroad among the common people, greatly increased his authoritic, & gaue them ocasion to talk of wonders. Not long after, Hy mael was first by the admiration, or rather affentation of his friends and followers, and afterwards as if it had bin by general consent, syrnamed Sophos, which among st those people signifieth a Wise man, or the Interpreter of the gods. These prosperous beginnings, with the troubled state of the kingdom of Persia, incouraged him to take in hand great matters: for his vncle Iacup the Persian King was long before dead, being together with his fon poisoned by his adulterous wise:thewhich he prefently perceiving, inforced her to drink of the same cup; and because he would be sure the should not escape, with his own hand struck off her head, and immediatly after died, with his fon. After whose death great troubles arose about the succession, and divers great men one after another afpired to the kingdom, which they enioped not long. And among the rest Elvan Ecg (whom Iovius calleth Aluantes) at that time stood in no sure possession of the kingdom, being mightily impugned by his brother Moratchamus. Hyfmad taking hold of this opportunitie, armed divers of the most able men of his follow- K cis, and receiving some smal aid from his poor old friend Pyrehales, entred into Armenia, and there partly by the fame that ran of him, and partly by the good wil of the people, rather than by any force, recourred his fathers inheritance, wherunto the remembrance of his dead father did not a little further him. He incouraged by this good beginning, daily grew stronger and stronger, by the continual repairing vnto him of such as having once received the doctrine of Hader, were glad of long, for fear of persecution, to dissemble the same: but now having got an head and chiefrain to cleaue to, began openly to shew themselues again, and in great numher to refort vnto him, in hope of the good fucces of their Religion, not so happily begun by His power thus daily increasing beyond his expectation, he besieged Sumachia, a City in L the confines of Media, which he took by force and facked, and with the spoil thereof both enriched and armed his foldiers, which before were for most part naked men. The taking of this city wonderfully increased both his same and credit; as oftentimes it falleth out, That hauty minds, couragiously attempting high exploits, by the good euent of their first attempts make way unto the full of their stately desires. So after this, Hysmaels thoughts were not so low as to think of the taking of this or that little city; but how hee might now compaffe the cat City Tauris, the very seat of the Persian kings, and afterwards the kingdome it selfe. \\ herupon repoling no leffe confidence in his own good fortune, than the valor of his foldiers, he marched with his army directly to the City of Tauris, and that with fuch expedition, that he was come before it before any such thing was feared, much lesse prouided for it. El- M was the Persian King was then at Tauris, and had but a little before fought a great battell againfi his brother Moratchamus for the kingdom; and having vanquished him, draue him out on Armenia and Persia. And afterwards, as it commonly falleth out in the winding vp of Ciu.le Was, had caused divers of the chief Citisens of Tauris, which had taken part with his

A brother against him to bee sewerely executed, filling the eies of their friends with the horrible foestacle of their dismembred bodies, and the hearts of most men with sorow and heavines:wherby he had so alienated the minds of the Citisens from him, that now upon Hylmacis approch, they were al ready to forfake him: of which their disposition Hysmael was beforehand informed, and upon the good hope therof had hasted his comming. Eluan the Persian King thus ouertaken on the sudden, had not time to raise such forces as might suffice either to incounter his enemy, or defend the city; wherfore dispairing of his own strength, and justly fearing the revolt and fury of the discontented Citisens, as a man dismaid suddenly fled out of the city. After whose departure, the gates were presently set open to Hysmael. For the citisens which in those troublesom times (wherin the two brethren contended for the kingdom) had B suffered great calamitie, chose rather in that present danger to receive a Conqueror as then was Hylmael, than to their vtter destruction to oppose themselves against him in the quarel of their cruell King. And the rather, for that they faw a general securitie and open way to preferment propoled vnto all fuch as should receive the reformed Religion of this new Con-

C of the city.

Although Hysmael was thus possessed of the rotal city of Tauris, and had therby made way for obtaining the whole kingdome, yet hee know that fo long as Eluan lived, his conquest was not vnto him affured : and therfore to the vtmost of his power hee augmented his Army with new supplies taken up in that populous city, whom he furnished with armor and weapons taken our of the Kings asmory. In the mean time news was brought unto him. That the Persian King before fled into the farthest part of his kingdom, was now comming from Scyras with agreat army against him: and that Moratchamus his brother forgetting in this common danger all former quarrels, had raifed a great army about Babylon in Affiria, in thort time to join

D Hyfmael neuerthelesse nothing terisied with the report of the great preparation of the two brethren against him, to the intent he might seeme to undertake this War by Gods appointment, and vpon a greater affurance than his own strength, resolved to go against them. And so after he had mustred his army, and in best maner he could prouided all things necessary, hee fet forward from Tauris; vling no other persuation to incourage his fouldiers, but that they Hysmael goeth should all, as became resolute men, make hast and follow him whom God had given them for against the Per achieftain and leader, vinto a most affured victory. The Persian King was at the same time ten daies journy from Tauris, when Hylmael with incredible celeritie preventing the tame of his comming, was come to the mountain Niphates, which parteth Armenia from Affyria: which mountain Elian purposing shortly after to passe ouer with his populous Army, had sent be-

E fore his scouts to discouer the streit passages, and a multitude of pioners to make the wayes more commodious for his great army to passe. Which thing Hysmael understanding, and politickly confidering that it should be much for his advantage, if he should first himself passe ouer those great mountains, and so vpon a suddenfer vpon his enemies then lying in securitic, and fearing nothing lesse than such a desperar attempt, vpon that resolution advanced his enfignes upon the mountains, and having with fmall refistance discomfitted them which kept the passages, came down the same mountaines like a tempest and suriously assailed the King then lying in his camp on the other fide at the foot of the molintain vpon whose approach such aburly-burly was raifed in the Kings camp, that what for the confused rumult of the souldiets, and fearful outeries of the multitude of base people that followed the Camp, the King

F could fearfly give order to his captains what he would have don, or yet incourage his foundiers, or put them in order of battel. So that Hy [mael giving a fierce onler with his Armenian foldiers, there was suddenly begun a most terrible and bloudy battell. Neither did that day thefortune of Hysmael faile him, whose courage and prowesse did neuer faile : for assailing the Kings battell of footmen with three squadrons at once, hee had ouercome them and put them to flight before that the horfmen could arm themselues and mount their horses, which G were for most part vnsadled and vnbridled at his comming. The king, who had nothing either feared or foreseen this so sudden a mischief, but had vainly persuaded himself, That the very fame of his comming with fo huge an army, would fo terrifie his enemies, as that he should find none either at Tauris, or in all Armenia, that durft make refiftance; was glad now to run to and fro to incourage his fouldiers, to stay his discomfitted battels, yea and to come to handy blows himself. But when neither his captains nor soldiers could put in execution his suddendire ctions, which he was inforced to give in that imminent danger, being overcome with shame and desperation, he resolutely thrust himself into the head of his battel, and there va. Elvanibe Per- liantly fighting was flain. Wherupon the Persian horsmen, the greatest firength of the kings han english. Army, having now no King for whom they should fight, betooke themselves to flight; after H whom followed the archers and all the rest of the Kings army.

When as Hylmael had with leffe loffe than a man would have thought fo great avictory could have bin atchieued, possessed the enemies Tents, he made no great pursuit after them. for that he thought it more requisit to refresh his foldiers, throughly wearied & almost spent with long travel and late fight: wherfore for certain daies he reposed himself and his Army in those his enemies forsaken tents. Afterwards, when he had received Embassadors from diuers places, yeelding their cities and towns, and that the favour of the people generally inclined to him, together with the victory, he marched with his army to Seyras, where hee was of the citisens who had before heard of the victory, joyfully received, & his army relieued with all things he could defire. Hy small there entertained with the greatest honors that the fearful citisens could possibly attribute to him, did oftentimes preach vnto them of the truth & excellencie of his fathers doctrine; and withalt pauc out freit proclamations, That hee would account all them for his enemies, which did storwithin the space of thirty daies renounce all their old superstition, and receive this new found verity (as he would have it.) Wherfore, forasimuch as on the one side were proposed most certain rewards by the happy course of his vi-Rories; and on the other was threatned exile and torture to such as should obstinatly persist in their opinion, in (hort time he drew al the vulgar people to embrace his new do arine; and afterwards having payd his foldiers with the riches of that great city, he gallantly furnished both his old and new foldiers that wanted armour, with most excellent armor and furniture. For in that city, one of the greatest and most famous of the East, were many shops full of all K kind of armor, which the armorers with wonderfull cunning vied to make of iron and steele, and the juice of certain herbs, of much more notable temper and beauty than are these which are made with vs in Europ; not only head-pieces, curiaffes, and complear armors, but whole capatitions for horses, curiously made of thin plates of iron and steel. Departing from Scyrashe took also the great city of Saphas, supposed to have bin the city in antient time called Sufa, and Sultania, which for the wonderful ruins of the huge buildings, is deemed to have bin the antient and famous city Tigranocerta. These great matters quickly dispatched, and againg Morat- having in every city placed governors of his own feet; he paffed over the River Tygris, into McCoporamia, of purpose to expulse Moratchamus the late Kings brother out of Babylon; who was yet in arms, and had intended (as is before faid) to have passed into Armenia, to have Joy- L ned his forces with the King his brother. But now terrified with his brothers calamity (who together with a most puissant army, and the strength of the Persian kingdom, was in one day fallen from the height of fo great a fortune) thought it not best to try his fortune in the field against so fortunat an enemy, but forthwith to withdraw himself into the remotest places of that large kingdom, and from thence to expect fome better fortune. For he wel knew that hee was not able to with fland his victorious enemy, now leading after him a most puissant anny; who not long before with a small power had vanquished and slain his brother in a great battel. Hy [mael now by the greatnes of his fame and forces, & as it were by the favor of God himself, become a terror to all the princes of the East, entered into Mesoporamia after the flight of Moratchamm, and received al that great province into his subjection, every man firining as M it were who should first by his speedy submission purchase himself the fauour of thevictorious conqueror. In brief, Moratchamu already terrified, and repofing no great hope in himself or his own power, neither deeming it fafe to flut up himselfe within the walls of any strong City, trust vp his things of greatest price, and with Wines and children fled into Arabia.

This Moratchamus is he whom some Historiographers called Mara Beg, and is in the Turks Histories called Imirfa Beg, who (as they report) afterwards marrying the daughter of Baiazet? and recovering part of the Persian kingdome, was suddenly murthered by some of his Nobility, whom he purposed secretly to have put to death, if they had not preuented the same by murthering of him first. Hy small having victoriously subdued a great part of the Persian king. dome, and filled all the East part of the world with the glory of his name, returned out of Affytiainto Media, and tooke in fuch cities and strong holds as were yet holden by the garrisons of the late Persian King. And afterwards returning into Armenia, made wars vpon the Albania ans Iberians, and Scythians, which dwell ipon the borders of the Caspian: for that those nations, in antient times tributaries to the Persian Kings, taking the benefit of the long civile B wars wherewith the kingdome of Persia, and all the East countries, with the ruine of the Kings house, had been of late turmoyled; had neither paied any tribute by the space of source yeres. nor fent any honourable Embaffage, as they were wont, and as was expected, especially in fo oreat a victory and alteration of the State. Hasimael having thus obtained the Persian kingdome, in short time became samous through the world, and was justly accounted among it the greatest Monarchs of that age. But nothing made him more to be spoken of than the innovation he had made in the Mahometane superstition: for by his device and commandement a new forme of praier was brought into their Mahometan Temples, far differing from that which had been of long time before vsed. By reason whereof, Ebubekir, Homer, and Osman, the successors of their great Prophet Mahomet, C before had in great regard and reuerence, began now to be contemned, and their writings nothing regarded; and the honour of Haly exalted, as the true and onely successor of their great Prophet. And because he would have his subjects and the followers of his doctrine knowne from the Turks and other Mahometans, he commanded that they should all we are some red hatband, lace, or riband upon their heads, which they religiously observe in Persia untill this day : whereof they are of the Turks called Cufelba's, or Red beads. And in short time he had so Hyman exceewied the matter, that he was wonderfully both beloued and reuerenced of his subjects; info-dinely beloued and reuerenced of his subjects; info-dinely beloued of much that his fayings were accounted for divine Oracles, and his commandements for Laws: bit [ub]etts. forhat when they would confirme any thing by folemne oath, they would fweare by the head of Hyfmael their King; and when they wished well to any man, they vivally faid, Hyfmael grant D thee thy defire. Vpon his covne which he made both of filter and gold, on the one fide was written thefe words, La illahe illalahu Muhame dun reful allahe : which is to fay, There is no oods but one, and Mahomet is his Messenger. And on the other side, Ismaill halife lullahe, which is to lay, Hysmael the Vicar of God.

Whilest Hysmael was thus wrestling for the Persian Kingdome, Chasan Chelise and Techellis 1508 (whom we have a little before declared to have bin brought out of the mountains and defarts, into the country villages, and afterwards into the cities; and to have filled the countries of Armenia and a great part of the leffer Asia with the nonetry of their new docrine and opinions, first phantafied by one Ginnet Siech, and afterwards revined by Haider Erdebil, Hysmael his father) having gathred a great army of fuch as had received their doctrine, invaded the Turks Chafan chelife E dominion. For after that Techellus (this cold Propher) had with wonderfull felicity in the pre- und the Turks sence of many prognosticated of things to come; and Hysmael the Sophi (of late a poore exi-dominium. led and banished man) was thought to have grown vnto the highest type of worldly honours, not by mans helpe, but by vprightnesse of life, and the fortunat passage of an undoubted religion: such a desire of receiving that new superstition possessed the minds of the people in generall, that the cities and townes thereabouts were now full of them which in token of their new profession had taken upon them the wearing of the red hat, the knowne Cognisance of the Cufelba's. First they met together at the city of Tascia, at the foot of the mountaine Antitaurus, or as the Turkish history reports, at the city of Attalia, to the number of 10000, vpon agreat Faire day; where they layd hands upon the chiefe magistrate of the city, and execu-F ted him, fetting his quarters vpon foure of the highest towers of the city; and further persuaded by these new masters of this new superstition, to take up armes in defence of themselves and of their fincere religion (as they termed it) in case that any violence should be offered them by the irreligious Turks; they all fwore, neuer to forfake their Captaines for any difireffe, or yet refuse any labour or adventure for the honor of their most holy religion (as the)

would haue it) in defence whereof they had already vowed their foules and bodies. These G ringleaders of rebellion, feeing the minds of their frantick followers, fo well prepared for their purpole, and repoling a great confidence in their valour and resolution; and withall confidence in their valour and resolution; ring that the mony which was bountifully brought in vnto them by the country people, partly for deuotion, partly for feare, was not sufficient to maintaine so great a multitude, gaue leave by publike proclamation to their varuly followers, to forrage the country round about them, and to line upon the spoile of them which would not receive their new sound doctrine. Wherupon they dividing themselves into divers companies, and ranging vp and down the country. brought into the camp abundance of cattell, and other fuch things as the country yeelded: and forthwith (their multitude stillinereasing) they entred into Lycaonia, a populous & fruitfull country, where they refreshed themselves many daies, roaming vp and downeto the great H grieuance and terrour of the people; and brought fuch a feare vpon the whole country, that they which dwelt in open dorps and villages, were glad to fly with their wines, children, and goods, into the strong city of Iconium: for proclamations were in many places set up in the names of Chafan Chelife, and Techellis, wherin many both spirituall and temporal bleffings were in most ample maner proposed to all such as should forthwith take part with them, and follow that their new doctrine already established in Persia: but vnto such as should obstinately perfeuere in their old superstition, after they had oncodrawne their sword, was threatned veter defruction without hope of pardon of life. So that all the inhabitants therabouts, terrified with the terrour of this proclamation, some for feare of death, some vpon inconstancy, some for fafegard of their goods and possessions (dearer unto them than any religion) some other indebted, infamous, in danger of law, beside many sugitive servants, dayly resorted to these new masters. Not long after, whilst the Turks were making preparation for the suppressing of this dangerous rebellion, certaine troupes of horsemen sent from Hysmael, came in good time to these new prophets: for Hysmael in fauour and furtherance of that new superstition, had a little before by fit messengers exhorted them to proceed couragiously in their so religious an enterprise, and to joine martiall force vnto the religion they professed : promising further, not to be wanting vnto them at their need, but to fend them skilfull Leaders, and from time to time to furnish them with coone for the maintenance of that war. All this Hysmael did openly in despight of BajaZer, of small beginning to sow the seed of greaterwar. For he bearing an old grudge against Bajazes for the former wars betwint the Turks and the Persians, as also for their K disagreement in matters concerning their superstition, and prickt forward with the heat of youth, defired nothing more in the greatnesse of his power, and prosperous successe of his affaires, than to have occasion to make war with the Turkish king: for which purpose he fent his 11, mail finds Embassadors vnto the State of Venice, to joine with them in league and amity, in such forme and fort as they had long time before, by Caterinus Zemes, Barbarus, and Contarenus their Em-The Print baffadors, concluded with V fun Caffanes the great Persian King his grandfather. The chiefe fur with the thing that he requested of the Venetians, was, That they would fend him out of Italy by the way of Syria, men skilfull in the casting of great ordnance, and with their sleet to trouble Bajazer by sea : promiting in the meane time himselseto fill Asia the lesse with his army by land, and fo to give a faire occasion vnto them, to recover by sea all such places as they had before L. in the late wars loft vnto the Turks vpon the coast of Peloponesus and Grecia.

The Venetians having with all courteficentertained the Embassadours, gaue them answer, That they would neuer be forgetfull of the antient league and amity they had made with the Persian King, the remembrance whereof was vnto their State a thing most pleasant : and that they were wonderfull glad, that the new King was an enemy vnto the Turke, and had them in fuch regard, as to participat to them the causes of that warrand further to promise vnto them those things, which if his grandfather V fun Cassanes, or his vnele Iacup would have performed, he should not now have had need to make wars with the Turkish Emperor. But such was the alteration of things and times, that as the Persian kings then lived at home in peace, thought it not good to ftir whilft Bajazes was busie in Europe; so now their State standing in far worse M condition and fortune, could not performe that which they heartily wished, and most of all defired; for that they thought it not good to break the league which they had not long before made with Bajazet the Turkish emperor:especially then, when fundry warlike nations of Europe conspiring together, and divers mighty Kings provoked with no injury, but only envyA ing at their happy estate, made warres upon them; yet neuerthelesse were in good hope, that Godwould stand in their just defence, and still preserve their state, which no enemies power had for the space of 700 yeares and more beene able to ouercome. Wherefore they should thew vnto their King, that they would as occasion should serue, and as it should stand with the good of their State, do their vttermost denoire to make him understand, that nothing was deeretunto them than the friend ship of so great a King: nor any thing more honorable, than by mutuall counsell and combined forces to affaile the Turke their common enemy.

Shortly after, the Embassadors (liauing obtained nothing more than the hope of a league tobe in time concluded, and being honourably rewarded) returned with their gallies to Cyorus, and so from thence to Syria, where they had secret conference with Petrus Zensus (the son B of Caterinus Zenus, a man famous for his embassage vnto V sun-Cassanes into Persia) Gouernour of the Venetian Merchants at Damasco. Which thing Bajazes having intelligence of and of the passage of the Persian Embassadors that way, complained grieuously both by his Embasfadors and letters vnto Campfon Gaurus Sultan of Ægypt, That he dealt not as a friend and confederat with him; in fuffering these Embassadors so to passe throughout the middest of Syria, unto the Christians their common enemies, to stir them up to war. Whereupon all the Veactian Merchants which were at Tripolis, Aleppo, Damasco, Berytus, and Alexandria, and especially Zerus himselfe, were forthwith apprehended by the commandement of the great Sultan and carried in bonds to Caire, where they were many times inforced in chaines to anfwer vnto fuch things as were layd to their charge, and after they had by the space of a yeare C endured the manifold despights of the proud Mamalukes, hardly obtained to escape with life

The two seditious Prophets, Chasan and Techellis, well strengthened with the aid of the Persians, were now come vnto I conium the most famous city of Lycaonia; and wasting all the country before them, drew a great multitude of people to receive their new doctrine. For the repressing of which outrages, Orchanes and Mahomethes, two of BajaZet his nephews (who in flead of their fathers Alem Schach, and Tzian Schaeb, the fons of Bajazet before dead, gouersed those countries) gathered together their forces, and disdaining to suffer such disgrace by such a rabble of rascal people, in the sight of so famous a city, came into the field to give them battell. But they in their youthfull heat making too must hast, and joyning battell in a place orchance and D of disaduantage, were by the rebels ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neither would these ring. Mahametes wo leaders in that victory haue forborne to haue affailed Iconium, but that they wanted Artillery and engines of war requisit for the besieging of cities. Corentinal lo, one of the fons of Bajazet, having at the same time levied a convenient Army about Thiatyra, Sypilus, Magnesia, and Phocea, durst not further stir or set forward against the rebels, although they lay difperfed about the country fast by him. These new prophers with enlignes displaied, marching from countrey to countrey through the heart of the lesser Assentered at length into Bythinia, where neere vnto the river Sangarius they met with Ca-Fagofes Baffa the Viceroy of Afia, comming against them with a great army well appointed, mhich he had a little before raifed vpon the bruit of the comming of these rebels, and had al-E socommanded Achometes (whom the Turks call Achimetes) the eldest sonne of Bajazes then liuing, Gouernor of the great countries of Capadocia and Pontus, to raise his power, and to sollow at the backe of the rebels: who if they should hap to be put to the worse, would neither be able to retyre, neither to keepe the field, being fo shut vp betwixt two so great armies. But Techelia by his speedy comming frustrated these designes of the Viceroy; for marching with all speed, he was upon Caragoles before he was well aware of his comming, neere unto the mountaine Horminus, as he was then taking vp of more foldiers, and daily expected the commingof others, as if he had been going against some puissant enemy. The Viceroy seeing the Rebels approch, although he had before not purposed to have encountered them before he had raifed far greater forces; thought it not now to fland with his honor, to refuse to give them F battell, although his army for most part consisted of the sude country peisants, taken vp vpon the sudden out of Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontus, and Bythinia, raw soldiers, and for most part vnarmed: as commonly they are which in those countries are pressed against their wils Out of the townes and villages, and are of the Turkes called Afapi, who of the Ianizaries are scarcely accounted for men. But his greatest confidence he reposed in the approued valour of his antient horsemen, by whose means he doubted not in safety to retyre out of the battell, G and to faue himself if any thing should fall our otherwaies than well making no great account of the common fouldiers, more than by them if he could, to weaken the force of the rebels : who on the other fide (their greatest force confishing of footmen), had no hope to faue them. felues by flight, but only by plainvalour and dint of fword. Which Techella well-confidering exhorted his foldiers to remember into what country they were come; and that chore was no cities of refuge, no new power, no other gods of desence to fly vnto, if they should not that day play the men: Wherefore leavs couragiously (laid he) fet forward against our enemies. and by victory defend our lines, together with the truth of our religion, for which we have y wowed both our foules and bodies. He had feareely faid thus much, but that his whole Army. in token of cheerefulnesse, gaue a most terrible shout, and without further stay fet vpon their H enemies. The Viceroy had placed his footmen in the maine battell in the middle, and his horsemen in the wings, thereby to have compassed in his enemies : but Techellis had set all his footmen in one great square battell, and his Persian horsemen for a resuge. But the Vicerov his fresh-water fouldiers could scarcely abide the fight of Techellis his army; for in the front of the battell flood fouldiers throughly armed, and all the rest of his army with red hats you their heads, as if they had beene embrued with bloud, which wonderfully terrified the Baffaes cowardly and viskilfull fouldiers; fo that having endured the fight fearcely halfe an houre. they all turned their backs and fled. The Turkish horsemen which had valiantly assailed the rebels army on both fides, although they had flaine many with their arrowes and lances, and fornewhat difordered the battell, for that the footmen were enforced to leave their places, and I to prefle ftill on forward against them; yet when Techellis his foldiers (having overcome the tootmen, and dividing themselves into divers squadrons) began with their long pikes to kill their horfes, and to lay hardly vnto them, they likewife betooke themselves to flight also. Then the Persian horsemen (which all this while had stood still as lookers on) lest their standings, and following the chafe flew many of the Turks in their difordred flight: and following faction, inclosed the Viceroy as he was staying of his horsemen, and could not for the thickenesse of the dust well discerne his enemies so that he had beene there taken, if he had not been speedily releved by his guard, and so delivered from that danger. The rest of the Tutks horsemen faued themselves by flight. In this battell seven thousand of the Turks footmen were ilaine, and all their enfignes taken, with great store of prouision.

After which victory, Chasan and Techellis resting their army one day, marched to the city of cutaic, necrevato the mountaine Hornatoius: this city is scituated as it were in the midst of accus of cas. Asia the lesse, and is the seat of the Turkish Emperors Viceroy in Asia; as Sophia in Moesia is for his other Viceroy in Europe: for it was reported, that the country people had for feare of the present war conveyed thither the greatest part of their wealth; and the rebels well knew, that the Viceroy himselse with his chiese horsemen were fled thither also: neither doubted they, but that all the army might be greatly enriched by the wealth of that city, if they should without delay employ their whole forces for the gaining thereof, their enemies now altogether discouraged with their late ouerthrow. Techellis also deeming that enterprise of so much worth as whereon to gage his whole forces, comming before the city, placed fuch field pieces L as he had before taken in the battel, & his archers in such fit places as might most anoy the detendants: afterward he caused scaling ladders to be set up, and proclamation made thorow all his camp, That the whole spoile of the city should be the foldiers if they could take it s with promife of greater rewards to them that should first recouer the top of the wals. Filled with this hope, the rebellious multitude approached the wall, fearing neither enemies force, multitude of thot, or danger of death, firining who should first mount the ladders, & some climbing one in the necke of another, fo to get vp by the ruins of the wall. The defendants in the meane time from aboue casting down vpon them great stones, timber, fire, scalding water, lime, fand, and fuch like without measure: wherewith although many were ouerthrowne and crusht to death or spoiled, yet others prefently stept vp in their place; neither was any of them seen, for M feare of the pretent danger to fhrinkeback or be difcouraged : for the Viceroy on the one fide, and Tabancon the other, were both eie-witnesses of enery mans valour in that hot service: the one prickt forward with doubtfull hope, for feare to be enforced to give oner the affault o begun, and the other with the due regard of his honor, life, and state, all subject to that danA ger, and therefore in person himselfe performed all the parts of a worthy chieseraine and couragious souldier. But at length the desendants wearied with the sierce assault of the enemy, and for most part wounded, Techellis continually sending in fresh men, and withdrawing such as were hurt, by plaine force brake into the city in two places ouer the heaps of the dead bodies: and having repulfed the defendants, burit open one of the gates, and thereby brought in his whole army. Then began a miferable flaughter of the foldiers and poore citifens in every house and corner of the city. At which instant the Palace (whither the Viceroy had retyred carages the himselse with his family) was also taken: the Viceroy himselse with his wines and children bis must and were there also taken prisoners, and the stately Palace built with marble, in a trice consumed children taken second Emperour of the Turks.

Therich city of Cutaie, the seat of the great commander of the Turkish Empire in Asra, tait, thus taken by Techellis, and his whole army both beautified and inriched with the spoile thereof the perfuaded himselfe, that it was now no hard matter for him to take the city of Prusa alto the antient feat of the Turkish Kings in Bythinia, and so endanger the whole state of the Turks Empire in Afia, if he should now without delay carry the terror of himselfe thither, before the Turks could in that country make head against him, or the citisens be able in so fulden a feare to make any fufficient provision for the defence of themselves and their city; and so in the course of his good fortune to vse the courage and cheerefulnesse of his souldiers. Wherefore appointing aday when howould fer forward, he commanded all things necessary tehemade ready for the taking of that rich city, being neither ftrongly walled, neither furni-G thed with any good garrifon for the defence thereof.

But whileft he was making this proparation; a new army, lately thipt over the Hellespont from Callinolis into Afia, inforced him to change his former determination. For Bajazet waked at the name of Techellis, & the fame of the new superstition now generally received in Persia, hadlong before given commandement to his sonnes, hephewes, and the Viceroy of Asia, That they should with all earefulnes prouide, that that part of his kingdome tooke no harme thereby. But after he saw Techelis of a poore hermit become a great captaine, and backt also with the Persian King, and all his doratinions in Asia in danger of some great alteration he sent Alu Baffa with his Europeian army. This Alu an Eunuchtborne in Macedonia (yet for his Bajaru fracourage comparable with the greatest captaines) had fot his many and worthy deferts, in the dith dis Base time of the great Emperous & Malionet. Balazet his father selevate himselfe horb the honors. D time of the great Emperour Mahomet, Bajazet his father, getiento himselse both the honour against Techtiand name of a most famous chiefetaine. He having made choice of the principall horsemen 44 of Epinus, Macedonia, Seruia, Illyria, and Thracia, and joining vnto them feuen thousand lanizaries (the most assured hope of the Turks in all their expeditions) passed over from Callipolis into Phrygia, and voon the way directed his letters unto Achomates and Corcutus, Bajazet his sons, and to all the other Sanzacks and Gouernors of the Turks provinces in Asia, That they should with as much speed as they could, raise their forces and meet him in Galatia. But Techellis advertised of his comming, thought it best for him to depart out of Pontus, and to retire to some place of more safety, lest by longer staying he should be enclosed by his enemies, repairing thicherwards on euery side; or else vpon some great disaduantage to joyne battell: H for he faw, that if he staied neuer so little, he should find no safe passage or place of refuge to retyreymo, having left fuch large and fracious Countries, fo many enemies Cities, fo many great rivers, so many discontented people behind him; all which the first favor of the vulgar fort, and speedy course of his victory, had a little before layd open vnto him. Wherefore calling together his Captaines and most expert men of war to consult vpon the matter, it was generally thought to be a point of meere madnesse, or else of extreme necessity, with so small a power of unskilfull fouldiers, without any sufficient stiength of horsemen, to joyne battell with such an enemy as better knew the countrey than he, and far exceeded him both for number and expertnesse of his souldiers. Wherefore Techellis trussing up his rich prey he had before gotten, began now with speed to retire backe againe with his followers through F Galatia. But the Baffa having intelligence almost every houre by letters and espials, both of the retyring of Techellis, and the way he held, passed ouer the river Sangarius, and coasting the country, came and incamped betwixt the cities of Cutaic and Ancyra, which way it was supposed the enemy would passe. Where when he had there a while rested his wearied souldiers, and was certainely aduertised, that the rebels had taken another way, he set forward againe, and after fine daies march in the plaines of Galatia, ouertooke the ftraglers of the enemies. G who wearied or wounded, were not able to hold way with the army rail whom the Baffa commanded to be cruelly put to the fword. And Techellis to terrific the great Baffa, or at leftwife with a most horrible spectacle, to stay his pursuit, caused Garagoses the Viceroy, whom he had coiled along with him in chaines, to be cruelly empailed by the highway fide, vpon a sharpe flake fet fatt in the ground, and fo left him flicking for the Turks towonder at. But Alis Baffa nothing difmaied with the horrible death of fo great a perfonage, held on his way with more haft than good speed, exhorting his souldiers patiently to endure the painfulnesse of the long march, and to straine themselves to take reuginge of those rebellious theques and robbers, who defroying the country before them, spared not so much as the Turks children, and the temples of their religion; and fo the day following came into the plaines of Ancyra. The fame H day also Achemates came vnto the Baffa with ten thousand souldiers. Alis Baffa perceining that he could not possibly with his whole army ouertake his enemies, matching with greater speed before him, and grieued at the heart to fee them escapes out of his hand, resolved to prove if he could with his horfomen overtake them iwhereupon leaving his footmen with Achomates, he himfelfe with eight thousand horse following the enemy voon the spur, outercooke the reseward of their army at the mountaine Olyga, a little from the city of Ancyra, vnto whom he gaue an hot skirmish.

2 cebelly which a little before had taken a fit place for his campe, upon the rising of the hil, although lie faw his men faint with long travell and the feorehing hear of the Sun; yet quicks ly perceiving that he should have to do only mith horsemen, and that in a place of advantage. turning his army, and orderly placing his foldiers, as the ground & the shortnesse of the time would give leave, valiantly received the impression of the Turks, and with their long pikes and arrows at the first repulsed them; so that is seemed they would neither have given ground vn to the bragging horsemen, neither have done any thing not beseeming their formervictories, had not Alis Baffa fent 1000 Carbines, who in troups orderly following one another, delinered their fhot as thicke as haife vpon the enemy with which from emany of them being flain. and moe wounded, their ranks began to be somewhat disordied: whereupon the other horsemen breaking in, with great flaughter ouerthrew the vauntgard of Techellis battell sinwhich conflict Chafan Chelife himfelig was flain. Techellis alwaies at hand where most need was,euen in the midft of the flaughter of his men fet in order a new battell of his most ready and best & armed foldiers, the only remedy in forgreat a distresse; and bringing them on into the front of the battell,opposed them against the horsemen, now (as they thought) in possession of the vi-Gory; commanding them by little and little to retire vnto, the mountaine, to the intent that they might seeme to do that by commandment of the Generall, which they were like enough to have done of themselves for seare: hoping that it would so come to passe, That the Turks finding the difaduantage of the place, would leave fo hardly to affaile them. But the Baffa encouraged with the first successe of the battell, exhorted his soldiers to vrge the missory, now almost as good as gotten, & not to give the enemy space to recover the Arength of the mountain, but valiantly to charge them, and with a little short paines that day, to end all the war, to the honor of Raja Zes their fourraigne, and worthy commendations of themselves in generall. In this fort encouraging them, he with a troupe of his best horsmen (to animate the rest, and to thew his own valor) brake through the enemies battelliwhich thing he in the fame heat, with more courage than discretion, attempting to performe the second time, was inclosed by his dian-fafire, enemies and flain:vpon whose fall the fortune of the battell was in a moment changed; for the Turks, which erst fought couragiously, having beaten backe and almost overthrown their enemies, now difinated with their Generals death, began to fight but faintly, and by little & little to give ground, and at last turning their horses about, fled. On the other side Techelis his soldiers who but a little before had reposed greater hope in the strength of the place and the mountain, than in their weapons and valour, now encouraged with new hope, and taking heart in the faint charge of their enemies, began to thrust forward, and with a most terrible noise M crying victory, put to flight the Turks horsemen, before wearied with long trauell, when as they had by the Generals rashnesse lost a notable victory almost already gained. Techellis although he knew that the enemy could neither refresh his horses, nor yet with any affurance keepe the field, if he should have pursued him; yet having lost many of his best soldiers, & the

A rest of his army fore weakened with trauell, fasting and fighting, determined to refresh his weatied followers vpon the mountain Olyga, From whence after a few daies he marched ouer the river Halys vnto the city of Tascia, his old dwelling place, and so to the city of Celenis, which the river Marfya (much spoken of by the Poets) runneth thorow, and is now called by the name of Maras, but as then the regall feat of the mountaine King Aladeules. The Turkes horsemen having thus in some small fort rather revenged the injuries done by the rebels, than obtained any victory, returned to Achomates, who was then comming on with the footmen. Notlong after, Bajazet understanding of the death of Alis Bassa his Generall, feat Ionuses Bassa Ionuses Bassa ha warlike captaine, and of great experience (borne in Epirus) in his stead. he had received the charge of the army from Achomates, marching forthwith into Cappado. army against B cia and keeping the way on the right hand towards the mountaine Antitaurus, came in few Techellis. daies vnto the city of Tascia, the place of Techellis his abode: where burning and destroying the country all about, he came and encamped with his army at the foot of the mountaine. The Baffa had in his army about forty thousand horse and foot, well appointed, with many field pieces, and plenty of victuals which he brought with him, for feare of want in that bare country. Techellis terrified with his comming, having of late received no aid from Hy small the Rersian king, and wanting also great artillery, and besides that, seeing his soldiers greatly both diminishediand discouraged with the late battell at Olygat determined not upon so great disadvantage to meet his enemy in the plaine field, but to keep the rough mountains and thicke woods hoping that if he could be able any time to keepe those strong places, he should either regenue some aid from Highmatl, or by the heat of the Turks leaders take them at some notable adjuntages In the meane time many notable skirmishes passed betwirt the soldiers on both fides: for the Turks fetching a compasse oftentimes about the mountains, and seeking for the best passages, by the case rising of the hils, came to skirmish with their enemies : and Techelluis souldiers on the other side, fallying many times out of the woods and abrupt places of the mountains, valiantly affailed the Turks. After they had a long time in this fort, as if it had been in disport, rather proued their forces one upon another, than done any great matter; the Turkes prying into euery corner, at length perceived two waies whereby their whole army with enlignes displaied might without any great difficulty be brought vnto the top of the mountaine, and so into their enemics strength. The Bassa having well viewed and considered D thaplaces, caused the lanizaries at one instant to march up to the mountaine by one of the aforefaid waies, and theirest of his army by the other: who with fost pace climing up the steepe mountains, with their targuets desended themselves as well as they could against their enemics dares and thot. For Techellis his fouldiers having before taken the high mountaines and places of aduantage, cast downe upon the Turks great stones and shot without number, as is that beene out of some strong fort. But the Turks bending certaine small field peeces against the places which most anoied them, easily draue them from their standings; the harquebutiers still following their ensignes, throuded close under the targuetiers, and deliuered their deadly shot as shoures of raine upon their enemies. Whose desperat approch Techella perceiwing, caused a retreat to be sounded, and with all his army retired further off into the higher H mountaines and rougher woods. The night following, perceiving that by the cuill successe of the former skirmish he had lost a great part of his credit and strength, he with great silence forfooke the woods, and passing quite ouer the mountaines sled into Armenia, then part of the Roefian kingdome. Neither did the Turks perceive their departure untill it was light day, and that their feouts entring the thick woods, and finding the enemies baggage, with some wounded foldiers not able to fly, brought newes unto the Bassa of the enemies departure, and of his feedy flight into Armenia. Which thing, when he by them that were taken, understood to brockainely true, fretting and chasing like a mad spant that he had not presently vpon the enemies retreat befet the wood round, he fent his horsemen forthwith to pursue them : but all in Saine, for Techellis was by direct and knowne waies gone into Armenia. Some few straglers not F able to make fo much hast as the rest, were ouertaken by the Turks horsemen, and brought backe to the Bassa. -

Techellis thus put to flight, tonufes caused streit inquisition to be made through all the ciries of the leffer Afia, for all fuch as had professed the Persian religion: and them whom he found to have borne armes in the late rebellion, he caused to be put to death with most exquisit torments, and the rest to be burnt in their forcheads with an hot yron, thereby for euer to be G knowne; whom together with the kinsfolks and friends of them that were executed, or fled with I cibella, he caused to be transported into Europe, and to be dispersed through Macedon ma, Epirus, and Peloponelus: for feare lest if Techellis now fled into the Persian Kingdome. thould from thence returne with new forces, they should also repaire againe vnto him, and raife a new rebellion. This was the beginning, course, and ending, of one of the most dangerous rebellions that euer troubled the Turkish Empire : wherein all, or at least wife the greatest part of their dominions in Afia, might have beene eafily furprifed by the Perfian King, if he would throughly have profecuted the occasion and opportunity then offered.

The remainder of Techellis his followers, flying into Persia, by the way lighting upon a Carauan of Merchants laden with filkes and other rich merchandife, tooke the spoile thereof: H for which outrage comming to Tauris, the captaines were all by the commandement of Hall

Terbellis burne made executed, and Techellis himselfe to the terrour of others burnt alive.

The next yeare (which was the yeare 1509, the fourteenth day of September) chanced a great and terrible carthquake in the city of Constantinople and the countries thereabouts: by the violence whereof, a great part of the wals of that imperiall city, with many stately buildings both publike and privat, were quite overthrowne, and thirteene thousand people overwhelmed and flaine. The terrour whereof was fo great, that the people generally forfooke their houses and lay abroad in the fields : yea, Bajazet himselfe, then very aged and fore troubled with the gout, for feare thereof removed from Constantinople to Hadrianople; but finding himselse in no more safety than before, he left the city and lay abroad in the fields in his tent. This carthquake endured by the space of eighteene daies, or (as the Turkes Histories report) of a moneth, with very little intermission, which was then accounted ominous, as portending the miscrable calamities which shortly after happened in the Othoman family. After this carthquake enfued a great plague, wherewith the city was grienously visited, and for the most part unpeopled. But after that the earthquake was ceased, and the mortality assuaged, 84jazes caused the imperial city to be with all speed repaired, and to that purpose gaue out commissions into all parts of his dominions for the taking up of workemen: so that there were at once in work eighty thousand workemen, who in most beautifull manner in the space of foure moneths againe repaired the ruines of that great city.

Bajazet had by his many wives, eight formes and fix daughters, which lived to be men and K women growne: and the fons all Gouernors in divers provinces of his large Empire: whom the Turkish Histories reckon up in this order, Abdullah Zelebi, Alem Scach, Tzihan Scach, Achmet, Machmut, Corcut, Selim, and Muhamet. Yet Antonius Virisu a Genoway, who long time liued in Bajazet his court, and (as he of himfelfewriteth) waited in his chamber at the time of his death, reckoning up the fonnes of Bajazet, maketh mention but of these six, Sciemscia, Alemscia, Achomates, Mahometes, Selymus, and Corcutus: naming the forenamed by names fomething differing from the other. Scienfcia the eldeft, Gouernor of Caramania, for his towardinesse most decrely beloued of his father, died of a naturall death before him, and was of him and his fubjects greatly lamented. Alemfila died in like manner, of whose death as soone as he was advertifed, by mourning letters written in blacke paper with white charactes (as their maner of wri- L ting is, in certifying of heavy news) he cast from him his Scepter with all other tokens of honor, and caused general mourning to be made for him in the court, and through all the city of Constantinople, by the space of three daies; during which time all shops were shut vp, all trading forbidden, and no figne of mirth to be seene : and for a certaine space, after the manner of their superstition, caused solemne sacrifices to be made for the health of his soule, and 7000 aspers to be given weekely to the poore. His dead body was afterward with all princely pompe conveyed to Prusa, and there with great solemnity buried. Tzihan Gouernour of Caria, and Mahomer Gouernor of Capha, vpon their fathers heavy displeasure, were by his commandement both strangled.

Of his other foure fons, Achmit otherwise called Achemates, Machmit, or Mahometes, Cor- M Cut, Of Carcutme, and Selymus the second (namely Mahometes) was of greatest hope and expectation, not giuen to fensuality or voluptuous pleasure, as Achomates his eldest brother, neither altogether bookish as was Corentus, nor yet of so sierce and cruell a disposition as Selymu but of such a lively spirit, sharp wit, bountifull disposition, and princely carriage of himA felle, that in the judgement of most men, he seemed already worthy of a kingdome. Which immoderat favour of the people, caused his elder brother Achomates, yea and Bajazet also himtelle to hanchim in no small jealousie, as if he had affected the Empire; and was in short time the cause of his vntimely death: which thing he nothing doubting, hastned (as fatal things are) by such meanes as he least feared might have procured any such mortall distrust or danger.

Most of Bajazte his children were by divers women, yet Achomates and this Mahametes were by one and the same mother i sor which cause, Mahometes tooke greater pleasure in him than in any his other brethren, although it were not answered with like lone again, Achomates was Lord and Gouernor of Amasia; and this Mahometes, of Magnesia; who desirous to see the manner of his brothers life and gouernment, difguifed himfelfe with two of his familiar and faithfull friends, as if they had bin religious men, of that order which the Turks call Imalier. These men are for most part comely personages, borne of good houses, who in cleanly attire made after an homely fashion, do at their pleasure wander vp and downe from towne to town. and country to country, noting the dispositions and manners of the people, whereof as fitteth best their purpose, they make large discourses afterwards to others : they commonly carry about with them filuer cymbals, wheron they play most cunningly, and therunto sing pleasant andwantent ditties: for which idle delighe they receive mony of the people, as an almes given them of deuotion. These are the common corrupters of youth, and defilers of other mens beds a menaltogether given to ease and pleasure, and are of the Turks called, The religious brethen of Loue: but might of right, better be tearmed, Epicurus his hogs, than professor Canvieligion at all.] Mahometes and his two conforts, as men of this profession, travelled vp and downe the countries of Pontus and Capadocia (where Achimates commanded) and so to thecity of Amasia; receiuing for their merry glee by the way as they went, the almes and denotion of the soolish countrey people. And being at length come to Amasia vpon a solemne holiday, they awaited the comming of Achomates to the church : who passing by, staid awhile listening attentiuely vnto their pleasant and alluring harmony; which was for that purpose most curiously and skilfully before denised, and by them both with their instruments and voices performed. When they had ended their musicke, and according to the manner of their idle profession expected his denotion; Achomates being a man of a spare hand, commanded fine afpers to be given them in reward [which is about fix pence of our mony.] Mahome-D undiffaining his brothers base reward, as a signe of his miserable disposition, would in no wife discouer himselfe, as he had before determined; but taking horse, returned with speed to Magnelia: from whence he wrote taunting letters to his brother Achomates, feoffing at his good husbandry (no praise to a Prince) and in contempt sent him backe againe his five aspers; which thing Achomates tooke in fo euill part, as that he was neuer afterwards friends with him. The report of this fact was in short time dispersed throughout all parts of the Turkish Empue, divers men diversly deeming of his purpose therein.

Not long after Mahometes had in this fort plaid with his brother Achomates, he attired him- Mahometes diffellewith certaine of his trufty followers as if they had beene feafaring men, and with a small guild at a feather came to Constantinople, and there landing as adventurers from sea, tookediligent view comments to both of the imperial city, and of the city of Pera standing opposit against it, curiously noting Constanting how all things was his Contract of the city of Pera standing opposit against it, curiously noting and le to the how all things were by his fathers appointment ordered and gouerned. It hapned whileft he sourte was thus flaying at Constantinople, that Bajazet had appointed a solemne assembly of all his chiefe Baffaes at the court, which Mahometes was defitous to haue the fight of, as alfo of the fafhion of his fathers court: but as he with his companions pressed to have entred in at the court gate, they were by their base apparell taken of the porters to have bin rude mariners, and so by them kept out. Wherefore confulting what to do in that case, he went and presently bought a most beautifull Christian captine boy, and the next day comming again to the court with two ofhis companions (as if they had been aduenturers at fea) requested to be let in, for that they had brought a present for the Emperor. So finding meanes to be admitted to the presence of Bajazzet, one of his conforts (as if he had bin a sea captain) boldly stept forth, and with divercuerence offered the present vnto the Emperor; which he thankefully tooke, and in token therof gaue him his hand to kiffe, and commanded a rich garment wrought with gold to be given vnto him, with two other of leffe value vnto Mahometes and his fellow, supposed to be the said captaines followers: who all this while stood afarte off, as if it had beene for renerence of the Emperour, but indeed for feare to be discouered. As these counterfeit guests were returning 6 from the court in their garments of fauour, they hapned to meet with three courtiers which knew Mahometes; who dismounting from their horses, had done him honour and due reues rence, as to the sonne of the great Emperor, had he not by secret signes forbidden them, as one unwilling to be knowne. When he had thus feene his father, the court, and the imperiall city, hewent againe aboord, and fo with speed returned to Magnesia.

The report of this his doing, had in short time filled both the city and the court, and was at last brought to Bajazets ears: which raised in his suspitious head many a troublesome thought. greatly fearing, that in these sly practises lay hidden some secret and desperate conspiracy. dangerous to himselfe and his other children. Wherefore after long discourse had with the three great Baffacs then of his secret counsell, concerning the matter, to rid himselfe of all H feare, he resolued in any case to take him away. And therefore caused them in his name to writevnto Asmehemedi, a gallant courtier, and alwaies neere vnto Mahemetes, to poyson him with a secret poison, for that purpose inclosed in those letters sent vnto him : with promise of great rewards and preferments for that his service, to be afterwards received from the Emperor:charging him withall, that if be could not effe a the matter, he should so conceale it, as that Mahometes should have no distrust thereof the least suspition whereof, would tend to his yetter destruction. This Amehemeds for som unkindnes bare a secret grudge against Mahometes, which Bajazet knowing of, made choice of him the rather; and he on the other fide, partly to performe the old tyrants command, and partly to reuenge his owne privat wrong, vigilantly awaited all Mahinettein oportunities to bring to effect that he had in charge. At length it fortuned, that Mahinette ha- 1 uing disported himselse in the gardens of pleasure, and being thirsty after his exercise, called for drinke : Asmehemedi alwaies at hand, in a guilt boule fetcht him such drinke as he desired, whereinto he had fecretly conucied the deadly poylon fent from Bajazet. Academetes having drunke thereof, in short time began to seele himselse euill at case, and presently sent for his physitians: who thinking that he had but something distempered himselfe with drinking too much cold drink in his heat, perceived not that he was poisoned, until that within fix daies after, he died. Of whose death Bajazet aduertised, could not abstaine from mourning, although he himselfe had bin the only author thereof: and the more to manifest his heatinesse, commanded all the court to mourne with him, and praiers to made in their temples after their superflitious manner, and almes to be given to the poore for the health of his foule. His dead body K was afterwards carried to Prusa, and there honourably buried with his ancestors. Asmebemedi the traitor in reward of his faithfulnesse towards his master, was by the commandement of Bajazet cast into prison, and neuer afterwards seene, being there (as it was thought) secretly made away.

Now had Bajazet but three fons left, Achomates, Selymun, and Corcutus. Achomates Gouetnour of Amasia, was a man both politick and valiant : but much given to pleasure and delighthim Bajazet and most part of the great men of the court favoured above the rest of his brethren; except such as were before corrupted by Selymus. Corentus for his milde and quiet nature, was of most men beloued, but not thought so sit for the government of so great an Empire; especially by the Ianizaries and fouldiers of the court, for that he was (as they thought) altogether I drowned in the study of Philosophy, a thing nothing agreeing with their humor. Yet might Bajazet seeme to do him wrong, if he should not according to his promise againe restore him unto the possession of the Empire, which he had almost thirty yeares before received at his hands; as is before in the beginning of his life declared. But Selymus being of a more hauty difposition than to brooke the life of a subject vnder the command of either of his brethren, and altogether given to martiall affaires, fought by infinit bounty, feigned courtesse, subtill policy, and by all other meanes good and bad, to afpire vnto the Empire. Him therefore the lanizaries with all the great fouldiers of the court, yea, and some of the chiefe Bassaes also (corrupted with gitts) wished about the rest, for their lord and soueraigne: desiring rather to line vnder him which was like to fet all the World on a hurly burly (whereby they might increase M their honor and wealth, the certaine rewards of their adventures) than to lead an idle and vnprofitable life (as they tearmed it) under a quiet and peaceable Prince.

Whilest men stood thus diversly affected towards these princes of so great hope, Bajaset now far worne with yeares, and fo grieuoully tormented with the gout that he was not able to helpe himselfe: for the quietnesse of bis subjects and preventing of such troubles as might arife by the aspiring of his children after his death, determined whilest he yet lived (for the auoiding of these and other such like mischieses) to establish the succession in some one of his fonnes; who wholly possessed of the kingdome, might easily represse the pride of the other. And although he had fet downe with himselfe, that Achomates should be the man, as well in remet of his birth-right, as of the especiall affection he bare vuto him; yet to discouer the dispolition of his subjects, and how they stood affected, it was given out in generall termes. That he meant before his death to make it knowne to the World, who should succeed in the Emoire without naming any one of his fonnes; leaving that for every man to divine of, according as they were affected; which was not the least cause, that every one of his sonnes with B like ambition began now to make small account of their former preferments, as thinking onely youn the Empire it selfe.

second Emperour of the Turks.

First of all Selymus, whom Bajazet had made Gouernor of the kingdome of Trapezond, rig- 1511 ging vpall the ships he could in Pontus, sailed from Trapezond ouer the Euxine (now called selymus aided theblacke fea) to the city of Capha, called in antient time Theodofia, and from thence by by Mahometes land came to Mahameter King of the Tartars called Præcoponses, a mighty Prince, whole law rifeth as daughter he had without the good liking of his father before married : and discouering vnto gainst bis fahim his intended purpose, besought him by the facred bonds of affinity betwixt them, not to there shribke from him his louing sonne in law in so sit an opportunity for his advancement; And withall shewed vnto him, what great hope of obtaining the Empite was proposed vnto him C by his most faithfull friends and the soldiers of the court, if he would but come neerer vnto his father (then about to transfer the Empire to some one of his sons) and either by faire meanes to procure his fauor, or by entering with his army into Thracia, to terrifie him from appointing either of his other brethren for the successor. The Tartar King commending his high deuice, as a kind father in law with wonderful celerity caused great store of shipping to be made teady in the Ponticke sea, and Moeotis, but especially at the Ports at Copa and Tana, vport the great river Tanais, which boundeth Europe from Asia : and arming fifteene thousand Tartarian horsemen, deliutered them all to Selymus, promising forthwith to send him greater aid if he should have occasion to vie the same. These things being quickly dispatched, Selymus passing ouer the river Borysthenes, and so through Valachia, came at length to Danubius, and D with his horsemen passed that samous river at the city of Chelia: his sleet he commanded to meet him at the port of the city Varna, called in antient time Dionysiopolis, in the confines of Bulgaria and Thracia: he himfelfe still leuying moe men by the way as he went, pretending in thew quite another thing than he had indeed intended which the better to couer, he gaue it out as if he had purposed to have invaded Hungary.

But Bajazet a good while before advertised, that Selymus was departed from Trapezond, and come ouer into Europe, maruelling that he had left his charge in Asia (the rebellion of Techella and the Persian war yet scarce quieted) and that vpon his own head he had entertained forceine aid to make war against the most warlike nation of the Hungarians, and farther, that with his army by land, he had seized vpon the places neerest vnto Thracia, and with a E strong nauy kept the Euxine sea; he began to suspect as the truth was, That all this preparation was made and intended against himselfe: for the crastry old fire had good proofe of the vnquiet and troublesome nature of his son, especially in that without his knowledge he durst presume to take a wife from among the Tartars, and afterwards with no lesse presumption of himselse raise an army both by sea and land: whereby he easily perceived, that he would neuer hold himselfe contented with a small kingdome, so long as he was in hope by desperat aduenture togain a greater. Yet thinking it better with like diffimulation to appeale his violent Baiaget fendeth and fierce nature, than by tharpe reproofe to moue him to further choller, he fent vnto him embaffadors to declare to him with what danger the Turkish Kings had in former times taken Selyana. vpon them those Hungarian wars : for example whereof he needed not to goe further than to his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who many times to his exceeding loffe had made proofe of the Hungarian forces: wherefore he should do well to expect some fit opportunity, when as he might with better aduice, greater power, and more fure hope of victory, take those wars in hand. Whereunto Selymus answered, That he had left Asia, inforced thereunto by the inand the helpe of his friends, to win from the enemies of the Mahometan religion a larger and G better prounce for that little barren and peaceable one which his father had given him bordering upon Hiberia and Cholchos, bare and needy people, living as connice among it the rocks and mountaines. As for the Hungarians whom they thought to be a people inuincible and therefore not to be dealt with all, he was not of that base mind to be daunted with any danger, were it never fo great: and yet that in his opinion the war was neither fo difficult or dangerous, as was by them pretended, forasmuch as the antient prowesse of that warlike nation was now much changed together with the change of their Kings; and their discipline of war not onely much decaied, but almost quite lost, after that Vladislaus, farre vnlike in policy and prowesse, had succeeded the renowned Matthias in that kingdome. Neither had he (as he said) from his cradle learned to be afraid of death, or of the common chances of war, as knowing H that neither God nor man would be wanting to him, who with an honourable resolution did aduenture vpon vertuous and worthy attempts: and that therefore he was fully refolued for his owne honour (which his father had in some fort blemished by the immoderate advancement of his brethren) either to die honourably in the field in battell against the enemies of the Mahometan religion, or else gloriously to extend the bounds of the Turkish Empire; and that he would not (though one of the youngest in the othoman family) be accounted inferiour to any of his brethren in vertue and proweffe. Thus was the Hungarian war never by Selymu inten-Infants ginen ded, notably by him pretended, and with no lesse dissimulation by Bajazet dissuaded. The Emto Stlymus by Bafadours, although Selymus in all his speeches shewed no token of peace; yet in his fathers name presented unto him divers gifts, thereby if it might be to appeale his fierce and cruell mind. Vnto his old government they adjoined Samandria, which the Hungarians call Schenderouia, a strong city of Seruia voon the borders of Hungary, with many other strong towns in the same country: they gave him also threescore thousand ducats, beside a thousand garments of cloth and filke : with good store of provision wherewith to relieve and content the foldiers by him entertained: lest that they drawne far from home in hope of spoile, should take it in euill part if they should be sent away emptie handed. Selymus in a happy time hauing received these gifts, returned the Embassadours vnto his father, with more doubtfull answer and uncertaine hope than before: yet changing nothing in himselfe of his former refolution, secret messengers and letters from his friends in the court still whetting him forward (too much already inflamed with defire of foueraignty) perfuading him to make hast and to K repose his greatest hope in his quicke speed; for that they understood, that about the time of his fetting forward, his brother Achomates was comming with a great power, being fent for out of Capadocia by his father.

Birezet wested In the meane time Bajazet, moved the rather with the feare of Selymus, resolved vponthat, appoint business whereof he had long before in his minde deeply confidered, and now faid openly, That hee would appoint his successor, who in stead of himselfe, spent with yeares and sickenesse, should bring with him the floure of youth and strength of body, fit to gouerne so great an Empire. But when those things were propounded unto the souldiers of the court by the soure great Bassaes (who in all things both of peace and wars had next place vnto the Emperor himselfe) it was forthwith gainfaied by those martiall men, crying aloud with one voice, That they L would know no other Emperor but BajaZet, vnder whole conduct and good fortune they had now serued aboue 30 yeres : and therfore would not suffer him to line a prinat life in obscurity, who with fo many victories and strong cities taken, had brought the Othoman Empire vnto that height of renown & glory. They faid morcouer, that there was in him yet ftrength enough if he would but with the reuerend honor of his age retain the majesty of his place, and the glory he had gotten with his long and happy reigne, and most famous victories : and that of his children, fuch a one should vidoubtedly in his due time succeed in the Empire, as of right ought: only they wisht, that the old Emperor might in the mean time line in health, with a long and happy reigne : neither needed he (as they faid) to feare that after his death any controuerfie thould arile among his fons about the succession; for that the Othoman progeny vsed M to attain the imperial feat, according to the old custome of their anceffors the Othersan kings, by right and order only, and not by corruption or faction. But if he would needs upon his own prinat good liking, or as it were by new adoption, proceed to make choice of such a one as the people & the men of war (his most loiall & faithful subjects) nould not so well like of it would

A be an occasion of much more trouble, and haply the means to bring in that consusion of the State, which he thought therby to eschu. For then, beside the dislike of the people, the other brethren would neuer indure so notable an injury, or euer be at quiet, vntil they had (as men wrongfully cast off and disinherited) by strong hand and indangering of all, recouer their honor loft by the headstrong wil of their aged father.

The foldiers thus before instructed by the friends and fauorits of Selymus (who with monv and large promises had corrupted their captains and chief officers) spake these things frankly, to have deterred the old Emperor from his purpose. But he thinking that they had (as he himself did) especially affected Achomates his eldest son (for that they had generally prote- najages sieks fted, That they would against all injuries defend his honor, vnto whom the Empire should of toprefer Achi-B right appertain) (aid he would make choice of Achomates, if it should stand with their good Empire. liking. But the chief of the fouldiers, who corrupted by Selymus, had together fold both their faith and themselves, cunningly commended Achomates, and seemed wonderfully to like of him; yet to accept of him for their Soueraign, Bajazet yet liuing, they faid was not agreeing with the antient custom of the Othoman Kings, neitherfor the behoof of the men of war, neither yet good for the state of the Empire; for a smuch as neither his brethren, Corentus and Selymus, neither the foldiers of the court, could patiently endure the least touch of the suspition of infidelitie; which they must needs do, if hee as a suspitious father should doubt either of the loue or loyaltie of his most dutiful sons, or of the faith or constancie of his most faithfull feruants, wherof he had made fo many trials. Besides that, it seemed vnto them all vnreasona-C ble, that by the odious prejudice of that fact, the foldiers should be left defrauded of the rewards vsually granted vnto them during the time of the vacancie of the Empire, arising of the spoil taken from them which are of religion different from the Turks. For it is a custom, that immediatly upon the death of the Turkish Emperor, all the Iews and Christians which dwel at Constantinople, Pera, Hadrianople, Thessalonica, and Prusa, especially merchants, exposed vnto the injuries of the Turks, are by the Ianizaries and other foldiers of the court spoiled of all their wares and goods, and become vnto them a prey: neither will they give their oath of allegeance vnto the new Emperor, vntil he haue granted vnto them all that prey, as a bounty; and have folemnly sworn by his own head (the greatest affurance that can by Oath bee given among the Turks) freely to pardonall the offenders, and for euer to forget all the outrages D before committed. When Bajazet saw his men of war thus generally to oppose themselues against the translation of the empire to Achomates, he of purpose to corrupt the minds of them which were before already corrupted, promifed to give them five hundred thousand duckats, if they would stand fauorable to Achemates, and accept him for their Soueraign: which masse of mony his customers and receivers undertook to levy of the same merchants strangers and Iewes, and to pay it as BajaZet had promifed. Yet the ouerthwart forwardnes of these men of war ouercame the good fortune of Achomates, although the reward promised were great. For why, they had in their martial minds conceived far greater rewards & preferments, if in fted of a peaceable and quiet prince, a monstrous Tyrant of restlesse nature (such as was Selymus) might by their helpe and meanes aspire to the Empire. Thus Bajazet driven from his hope, thought it best for the present to dissemble the matter, & concealing his grief, with patience to put vp that dishonor, vntil a fitter opportunitie were offered for the effecting of that hee so much defired. Selymus advertised by his friends, with what affection and and fastnesse the soldiers of the Court had in the fecret fauor of him, openly with stood the earnest desire of Bajazet for the preserment of Achomates; because he would no longer frustrar the expectation of his fauorits by lingring or delay, or feem to diffrust the ready good wils of the men of war towards him, left the borders of Hungary, & with his army marching thorow Thracia, incamped at length Selymu marvpon the rifing of a hill not far from Hadrianople, from whence the neighing of his horses that mithbut might easily be heard, and his tents from the high places of the city discouered. From thence Hadrianople. I he fent a meffenger to his father then lying in the city, to certifie him, That for a finuch as hee segment his had not of many years before feen him, he was now therfore defirous to come vnto his prelence to visit him, before he croffed the seas backe again by his appointment to Trapezond. his faller. And therather, because it might so chance that he should never see him again, beeing now both aged and diseased. Besides that, it much concerned (as he would have had him beleeve)

the quietnes of his kingdom in Asia, and the vnity of his children, if the controversie betwixt G him and his brother Achomates, which could not fafely be committed to meffengers, might by themselves be discovered to him their father, as an indifferent hearer and decider therof. Wherefore he humbly befought him to appoint him a time and place to give him audience m, and not to deny him leaue to come and kiffe his hands: which thing his Ancestors neuer refused to grant to their poor friends, much lesse to their children. Bajazet, who a few dayes before understanding of the comming of Selymus, and throughly seeing into his deuices, had called vnto him certain of his Sanzacks or chief captains, with their felect companies out of the neerest parts of Grecia, and had also set strong watch and ward through the City; fearing lest under colour of parle, his soldiers attending about his own person, corrupted by Selymus and his friends (who even then loded with gifts and promifes, were fecretly vpon the point of H reuolt) (hould be quite drawn away from him, and so he himself at length bee either by open force oppressed, or secret trechery circumuented, thought it best to cut him off atonce from all hope of conference, or acces vnto his presence. Wherfore seriously blaming him, That he had vpon his own head brought his army into another mans province; that he in arms required audience; and lastly, That he so insolently abused his fathers lenitie and patience; he by the fame messenger sent him further word, That he should not presume to approch any neerer vnto him, or expect any thing appertaining vnto peace; who garded with forreine power, had without his fathers leave entred into aims, and spoiled the countries of his friends. And that therfore he should do wel, with all speed to retyre out of Thracia, yea and out of Europalso, and dif banding his forces, again to retyre himfelf unto his charge in Pontus; in whichdoing I he should find greater fauor and kindnes with him his father, than euer he had before : but if he would needs proceed in the course by him begun, then he would no more take him for his fon, but for his enemy, and before it were long, that ply chastise him for his malapert infolencie, little differing from vnnatural trechery. The messenger with this answer dismissed, it was not long after, but that Bajazet was by his Espials aduertised, That Selymus the night following was rifen with his army, and marched directly toward Constantinople; whither he was fent for by his friends, in hope that vpon his approch with his Army, some sudden tumult or vprore would to his auail arise in that so great and populous a city. Wherupon Bajazet searing lest in staying at Hadrianople, he might lose the Imperial city of Constantinople, early in the morning by breake of the day departed from Hadrianople towards Constantinople, K Vponhis departure, Selymus peaceably entred the city of Hadrianople, the Citisens searing, that if they should have made any resistance, their unseasonable faithfulnesse toward Bajazet might haue turned to their veter destruction. Selymus after he had a while refreshed his army with the plenty of that city, according to his former determination fet forward again, of purpole by long and speedy marches to have prevented his fathers comming to Constantinople. Bajaset was yet scarsly come to Chiurlus, or rather Tzurulum, an antient ruinous city almost reliantowers. vpon the mid way betwixt Hadrianople and Constantinople, when warning was given him ferbing faiber. by them that followed his army, that the forerunners of Selymus were at hand, cutting off the straglers of his army, and with hot skirmishes staying and troubling his rereward. The aged Emperor more mooued than terrified with the strangenes of the matter, because his marching L should not seem as if it were a flight or chase, commanded his standard to be set vp, and al his army to make a stand; of purpose that if Selymus should come up to give him battell, hee B. jagen chief might find him in readinesse. The great Captains and Noblemen then present with Bajazet. C. madadas whether it were for old acquaintance, or vpon some new inclination of their affection, or else restriction view von hope of new allyance and preferment, withing well vnto Selymus, and therefore indirection. vpon nope or new any ance and preferment, withing wen vitto setymar, and therefore the day and cunningly favoured him, feemed not to like of Bajazet his resolution, to be so far modulate him. the spaint with the youthfull heat and lightnesse of his son, as to seek revenge by battell, whereas the victory it felf could yeeld him nothing but forrow, but the ouerthrow threatened destruction both to himselse and all them that werewith him: the imminent event whereor feemed to be fo much the more dangerous and fearefull, by how much hee was at M that time inferiour vnto his sonne both in warrelike prouision and number of armed souldiours. Wherefore it were the best course for him (said they) to moderate his anger, and not now in the winding vp of his life, to make too much hast by a miserable death in a wofull battell to blemith the whole glory of his former life. There was (as they would have per-

A suaded him) but one only course to be taken, full of wholsome policie and safety; which was that he should with such speed as he had begun, march on forward to Constantinople, that so Selamus excluded out of the city (his chiefest hope) and then not knowing which way to turn himself. should either of his own accord, or for fear of his fathers greater forces, thinke of rerum: and so with his rascall followers more honestly perish by their hands whose countries he had spoiled, and vpon whom he must of necessity live in his return, than by the sword of his father. The author of this counsel was Mustapha, the most antient Bassa of those which beeing in greatest authoritie vnder the Emperor, are only of his priny counsel, and sway all matters of importance concerning either peace or war: he then vpon an vnthankfull and malicious mind loathing Bajazet, as one that had too long reigned, hated him also for certain privat B displeasures conceived of the emulation of the other yonger Bassa's by him promoted; & secretly bare great affection to Selymus, both in condition and fauor resembling his grandfather the Great Mahomet, by whom he was brought up himself, and him of all the sons of Bajazet he thought most worthy of the empire. This Mustapha was born in the town of Seres (neer to Amphipolis) the fon of a Greek priest, a man of a fly, crafty, and subtil wit, alwaics subject to corruption: which diseases of mind were in him well to have bin discovered by his froward look and squint eies, the certain notes of a nature to be suspected. Next vnto this Mustapha was Bostanges Bassa, born of the honorable house of the Deucagina in Ætolia, and therof called Deucaginoli; a man for his couetousnesse, ambition, and treachery, infamous, as the foul & miferable end of his life afterwards declared. Vnto this man Selymus had by fecret mariage be-C nothed one of his daughters, now mariageable, as a reward of his corrupt faith. By the which sleight he also allured Ajax (Aga or captain of the Ianizaries, and great Master of the houshold) to promise his aid for the obtaining of the empire, wherunto he said he was by destiny called: and by his means drew other inferior captains secretly to fauor his quarrel; to whom he spared not to promise what soeuer might please their humors. Yea the captains almost generally either corrupted with reward, or for feare following the inclination of the greater commanders, of themselves leaned that way. Of all the rest, only Cherseagles Bassa (whom the Turks histories call also Achmet Hertezeck Ogli) a faithfull constant vpright man, free from all double dealing and deceit, a fast and afforced friend vnto BajaZet his father in law, was of opinion, That the immoderat pride and infolencie of Selymus was even there by force of Armes Chaffeeler D and strong hand forthwith to be oppressed, before he should approch any neerer vnto the Imperiall city, for fear of raifing some further tumult or trouble there than were well to bee ap- faithfull to Bopealed; which was the thing that Selymus his friends most of all desired. Neither was it to be dech him to thought (as Cherfeogles faid) that the naked Tartarian horsemen, although they were in num- give bassell to ber more, would euer be able to abide the first charge of Bajazets well armed pensioners. As Selymu. for the lanizaries, of whose approued faith and valor tried in many dangers, he had before had good experience; there was no doubt but that they would now to the vimost of their power desend the person and honor of their aged and victorious Emperor, who had of long time so wel of them deserved; and also to revenge his quarrel vpon disobedient Selymus, who neither fearing God, the iust reuenger of such vngratious dealing, neither the infamy of men, had most vnnaturally lift up his sword against his father, wickedly to deprine him of life, of whom hee had received life. Wherfore he perfuaded him, in his own iust quarrell to go forth vnto his foldiers with cheerful countenance, and putting them in mind of the benefits they had from time to time most bountifully received at his hands, as also of their allegeance and duty; to make them to understand, that reposing his trust in their fidelity and valour, he had resolutely fetdown with himfelf, in that place before he went any further, by their faithful hands to chaflife the presumptuous insolencie of his vnnatural I sonne, together with his rebellious Fol-

But now that we are fallen into the remembrance of this Cherfogles, it shall not be amisse, both for the honor of the man, and the great loue he alwaies bare vnto the Christians, to step F 4 little out of the way, to fee the cause why he being a Christian born, turned Turk. For hee was not (as almost all the rest of the great men about Bajazet were) taken from his Christian Parents of a child, and so brought vp in the Mahometan religion, but being now a man grown turned Turk: yet fo, as that he neuer in heart forgot either the Christian religion, or loue to-Ward the Christians 3 a thing not common among such renegats. He being the sonne of one

Cherleogles, a small prince of Illyria neer vnto the black mountain, and going to be maried to G a Lady whom he most intirely loued, and vnto whom he was already betrothed, honourably descended of the house of the Despot of Servia; his intemperat father with luftfull eye beholding the yong Lady of rare feiture and incomparable beauty, defired to have her for himtell and regarding more the fatisfying of his own inordinat defire, than his own honour, or the fatherly loue of his fon, took her in mariage himfelf; all his friends laboring in vaine to diffuade him, and with open mouth crying shame of so foul a fact. Wherfore the yong man. moored with the indignitic of fo great an injury, and driven headlong with dispair, fled first to the Turks garrifons which lay not far off, and from thence to Constantinople; where the fortune of the man was to be wondred at : for being brought before Bajazet, who with cheere. full countenance entertained him, for that he was honorably descended, and well liked both H of the man, and of the cause of his revolt; similing upon him, said, Be of good cheere, noble Youth. for thy great courage is worthy of far greater fortune than thy fathers house can afford thee : now in feel of thy Love wrong fully taken from thee by thy father (the kinfwoman of a poor exiled Prince) thou shall hanc given thee in maring ethe daughter of a great Emperor, of rare and lingular perfection. And not long after abjuring his religion, and changing his name of Stephen, to Achomates and Cherles. eles, he maried one of BajaZets daughters, a princesse of great beauty, and deserved to have a place among the Baffa's of greatest honor in the court. Yet stil retaining the remembrance of his former profession, with a desire to return therto again : insomuch that he kept in his secret closet the image of the Crucifix, which he shewed to Io. Lascario, as to his trusty friend, as bee himself reported. This man at such time as the city of Modon was taken by the Turks, and a I multitude of poor Christian captines cruelly put to death in the fight of Bajazet, by eneft intreaty faued the lines of the Venetian Senators; and afterward delinered Andreas Grini, beeing pritoner at Constantinople, and condemned to die; who not many years after was chosen Duke of Venice. He was the chief means whereby the Venetians to their great good obtained peace of Bajazet. He also by his great authority, and of his own charge redeemed innumerable Christians from the seruitude of the Turks, and set them at liberty. Neither is his kindnes toward the furtherance of good learning to be forgotten: for at fuch time as the aforesaid io. Lafearis the notable and learned Grecian, by the appointment of Leo the tenth, fought antient works of famous Writers, hee procured the Turkish Emperours Letters patents, that he might fieely at his pleasure search all the Liberaries in Grecia, to the great surtherance of K good letters,

Now Bajazet incouraged by this mans perfuafion (as is aforefaid) and hearing as hee lay in his pauilion, the alarm of the enemy, with the tumult & clamor of his own foldiers as if they had bin men afraid, and fundry meffengers also at the same time comming to him with news, That Selymus with his Tartarian horfmen had almost inclosed the rereward of his Army, and already taken some of his baggage; grinding his teeth for very madnesse and grief of mind, with tears trickling down his hoary cheeks, got him out of his paulion in his horf-litter (for he was at the same time so troubled with the gout, that hee was not able to sit on hors backe) and turning himself vnto the Pensioners and Ianizaries standing about him, as their maner is,

Will you, foster children, valiant soldiers, and faithfull keepers of my person, who with great fortune to the falliers have ferued me in field about the face of thirty years; and for your faithful and good feruice have both in of the cont. time of peare and war, of me received fuch rewards, as by your own confession and thanks iting, far execcled your own expectation, and the measure of our treasures . Will you (Isay) suffer the innocent Father to be butchered by his graceles son? And your old Emperor, tormented with age and diseases, to be couchymurthered by a company of wild Tartars, little better than arrant roques and thecues? Shall I be now for faken in this my heavy old age and last act of life? And shall the delivered wnto myne enemies, by them, by them (If ay) who many years ago with great faithfulnes and invincible courage defended myne honor and right against my brother Zemes? and have many times since not only valiantly defended this M Empire against most warlike nations, but also victoriously augmented the same? But I wil not solightly believe that which to my no small grief is brought unto myne ears concerning the zeuelting of my army: mother if I did beleeve it, am I fo fearfull as to be therwith discouraged, or to seek to make Shift for my felf. For towhat purpose should I think of flight, as though I could in any place find more faithfulnesse,

A or forer defence than with you? And concerning your selves, what should be your hope by this so infamous nechera? If any of you for I cannot beleeve that you are all so mad) without regard of faith of worldly home or the fear of God, have polluted your minds with the pernitious conceit of fo foul atreason doe you think to gain greater rewards and preferments by your trechery and villang than by your fidelitie & con-Sancie? There be many which carefull of my person, persuade me to reserve this my sicke and feeble bods who my better fortune, and to commit my felfe to flight, for ather to fanemy life with shame and infamy. than to end my daies with honor and glory. Which is fo far from my thought for the apprehension of any for to do, that I will to the contrary forthwith give the fierce Enemy battell, and in this my last dineer make troof of all your fidelitie and valor, and of every one of your good wils in particular : and so by condust of the Highest either defeit the power and breake the strength of this gracelesse man : or els hauing B reigned about thirty years an Emperor, end my daies together with them which shall wato the end consinue with me in their faithfulnesse and loyaltie, although I should bee most shamefully and dishonorably betraved and for taken of fome of myne own Gard. Which thing though lying fame would make me beleeue. net will I not fear it until I make proof therof.

The common fort of the Ianizaries (vnto whom the great Commanders and captains cor- The commo fort rupted by Selymus, had not for their le uitie and multitude imparted their purpose for trans- of the langue, ferring the empire to Selymus) began to cry out as if it had bin with general confent, That he Bajazet, define should not doubt to join battel with his enemies, and so to make proofe of their constant fi. bastel. delitie and valour. Which was done with fuch a cheerefulnes and defire, expressed by great C shouts clapping of hands, and clattering of armor, that it seemed they would play the parts of resolute soldiers, and that as guiltlesse men they tooke it gricuously to be once suspected of treason or insidelitie. Others also who secretly and in heart were well assed to Selymus, for fashion sake followed them with like cry, but specially the great Commanders of the Empefor scourt and army, now changed their affection, whether it were for shame of the fact, or for fear of discovering themselves out of season, is vncertain. Wherfore according to the maner of such men, which through their mutability and mischieuous disposition, fearing to be conuinced and discouered, adde vnto the present a second and new treason or treachery to couer the former: fo Mustapha and Bostanges, not daring now to shew themselves for Selymia, to make agreat shew of their seigned loyaltie toward Bajazet, departed themselves out of his pauilion

D to incourage the foldiers and to marshal the batttel.

Bajazet fick in his chariot, by the aduice of Cherfeogles the faithful Baffa placed his battell The battel bea in this order: The Sanzacks (which are the gouernors of provinces) with their horsemen, in and Stlymu. number about 6000, he set in the front of the battel : the Spachi og lans and Siliphtars, who are the chief horsemen of the Court, and as it were the Emperours Pensioners, were placed as two wings on each fide of the great foundron of the Ianizaries; in the midst whereof was old Bajazet himself. Other 4000 horsemen (servants to the great men of the Court) were left in the rereward, and to gard the baggage. These slaves (for so indeed they are) for their apparell and furniture, and for their valor also are little inferior to their masters, by whom they are so fumptuously maintained both for strength and oftentation. The battel thus ordered, Bajazet commanded the trumpets to found, and a red enfigne in token of battell to be displaied. On the other side, Selymus placing his Tartarian horsmen in both wings, and his Turks in the middest, in manner of an halfe moon, for that he in number of horsemen far exceeded his sather, did almost on every side inclose him, and so charge him. The Tartars when they were come within 100 paces of their enemies, casting themselves (after the manner of their fight) into greatrings, empty within in manner of a crowne, and fo running round, that they might both backward and forward deliner their arrows, call upon their enemies whole showre's of shor, as if it had bin hail, to the great annoiance of the Turks. When as in the mean time the other Tartarian archers farther off, shooting their arrows not right forth, but more vpright towards heauen, which falling directly down fore gauled the Turks horfes alfo. But the old foldiers, F taught by the example of their captains, ferred close together, and casting their targets ouer their heads as if it had bin one whole roofe or penthouse, received their Arrowes with lesse harm, and hasted with as much speed as they could to come to handy blows. The pensioners also at the same instant brauely charged the middle of Selymus his battell, where his Turkish horimen flood; and Ajax captain of the Ianizaries, drawing out 700 ready harquebusiers out G of the squadron of the Ianizaries, with them assailed the hindmost of one of the wings of the Taitars: and the four thousand servants lest in the rereward, as desirous as the rest to show their forwardnes, with great flaughter repulsed the other wing of the Tartars, which came to haue spoiled the Turks carriages. This sierce battel betwixt the father and the sonne, with doubtful cuent indured from noon until the going down of the Sun; Selymus in many places stil restoring his declining battel, and fighting himself as for an Empire. But after that the Tartats, hardly charged by the harquebusiers, were not able to abide the shot, especially their horses, being with the viewonted noise therof wonderfully terrified, and so carrying back their riders whether they would or no began to fly the rest of the horsmen could neither by commandment, threatning, or wounds, be inforced to flay, but turned their backes and fled. The H footmen alfowhom Selymus had attyred and armed after the manner of the Ianizaries, being forfaken of their own horfemen, were now by Bajazets horfemen compaffed about and almost Selymus his army thus ouerthrown, and himfelf hardly befet, was by certaine troups of his Turkish horsemen which yet stayed with him, deliucred from the present danger, and beging wounded, was mounted upon a fresh horse, and so with all speed hee could fled after the Tartars. But doubting to be purfued and ouertaken by his fathers speedy horsemen, hee changed his horse, and took another of a wonderfull swiftnes: and so reserving himself, to his suture fortune, with a few of his followers fied to Varna, and from thence by fea to Capha.

The horsewheron Selymus fled was all cole blacke, called Carabulo (that is to fay, a blacke Cloud) whom Selymus as a good feruitor ever after exempted from all feruice; and had him in the host course fuch estimation, that covered with Cloth of gold, he was as a spare horse without a rider led pobligation. after him in all his great expeditions, fir (tinto Persia, & afterward into Egypt, where he died at Cair, and there to the imitation of Bucephalus, Great Alexanders horse, had a monument ercaed for him. Wherein Selymus thewed himself more kinde than unto his owne brethren, whom he cruelly murthered, and hardly afforded vnto some of them so honourable a Sepulture.

In this battel, of 40000 which Selymus brought into the field, escaped not aboue 8000, but they were either flain or taken prisoners. Of Bajazets army were lost about 700, and 3000 hurt with Tartarian arrows. Which loffe he presently reuenged with extream cruelty, causing all K fuch as were taken prisoners to be without mercy put to the sword in his fight; whose heads were laid together by heaps, and their dead bodies as if they had bin towers. Of this notable battel betwirt the father and the fon in the year 1511, Chiurlus, called in antient time Tzurulum, before an obscure old ruinous city (or as Ionius calls it, a village) became famous. But much more afterward by the fatal destiny of Selymu, who not many years after, strucken with a most lothsom and incurable disease, ended his daies in the same place with an untimely and tormenting death; God(as it is to be thought) with reuenging hand in the same place taking iust punishment sor his former dissoyaltie toward his father, as shall herafter in due time and place be declared.

Three daies Bajazet lay stil in the same place where he had obtained the victory, until such L time as all his fouldiers were again returned from the chase of the enemy: after that, he held on his way to Constantinople, and there bountifully rewarded his souldiers. In the meane time Achomates hearing of all the trouble which had hapned betwixt his father and his brother Selymus, with the cuent thereof, came with an Army of 20000 from Amalia, thorow the countries of Galatia and Bythinia, vnto the city of Scutari, called in antient time Chrisopolis (though some suppose it to have bin the famous city of Chalcedon) which city is scituated upon the streit of Bosphorus, directly against the city of Constantinople. In this place Achomates incamped his army, neer the fea fide, expecting what course his father would take afber fo great a victory. For besides the prerogative of his age, and the especial love of his father towards him, the general affection of the vulgar people, with the good opinion he had of M hunfelt, had already filled his mind with the hope of the Empire. Wherfore hee ceased not night nor day to fend messengers over that narow streit to Constantiantinople, and most earneftly to folicit haprest his father, in fo fit an occasion to make hast to dispatch what hee had folong before determined, concerning the refignation of the empire. He also importuned his friends and familiars in best manner he could to commend him to his father, and in most ample fort to extoll his graue purpose for translation of the empire; and to do the vetermost of their devoir, that seeing God and good fortune had justly overthrown the rath attempt and force of his brother Selymus, he by their good means might the fooner obtain the empire. of which he was the vndoubted beir.

Bajazet, who of himselfe and according to his old good liking was altogether desirous of Bajazet defices the preferment of Achomates, was by their perfuasions easily intreated to hasten the perfor- mais value it. mance of that he had before determined for transferring the empire. And making no great Empire. fecret of the matter, commanded certain Gallies to be made ready for the transporting of J_2 B chomates from Scutario to Constantinople. But the great Bassa's and soldiers of the court, the fecret favorits of Selymus, understanding the matter, began again openly to refist and impure his purposed determination, and to alledge the same reasons they had before at Hadrianople alledged: in fine they faid plainly, they would by no means fuffer him fo far to disable him. felf, as an infufficient man to refigue the empire, who of late had with to valiant and couragious an heart fought for the honor of his crown and dignitie; and that therfore fo long as hee lived, they would acknowledge no other Soueraign but Bajazet Yet for all that, as they meant not to cut off Achomates hope, to neither ought he to distrust the good wil of the men of war: but that he being a man of most approued and known valor, might in due time with their general good liking injoy his right, which should then without all question be due vnto him as C the eldeft fon of their Emperor. They faid moreouer, That they had in the late battel against Selymus sufficiently declared what minds they were of, both towards their Emperor & Achomates, and what confidence they were to repose in the fidelitie of their foldiers, who to manifest their faithfulnes and loyaltie, had not refused to offer themselves to the hasard of a most vnequal battel, yea their lives vnto death it felf. De foul diffimulation, the couert mask of all mischief! vnder which, meer trechery is here protended for great loyaltic, the aged Emperor too too much flattered, Achomates shamefully deluded, and the man that might not as then without some addition of disgrace bee named, Selymus, even bloudy Selymus secretly sought for about all men to be preferred.

Bajazet by this offwardnes and infolencie of the foldiers again disappointed of his purpose, D or els(as some thought) delighted with the sweetnes of sourraignty; for that after the late victory he feemed (as one grown young again) neither to feel him lelfe old or vnable still to gouern fo great an empire; fent word to Achomates, how the matter stood, & that he should forthwith depart from Scurari to his old charge at Amasia, from whence he would again call him. at fuch time as he had with new bounty won the hearts of the foldiers, & procured the good liking of other the great men in court, wherby so great a matter and not vivall, might the better and with more feetivity be effected.

Achomates thus deceived of his hope & expectation, gricuously complaining that he was fo mocked of his father, and contemned of the foldiers of the court, began to mix his new request with words of heat and discontent, and to invey against his father, for making him a byword (as he termed it) and a laughing flock unto the World, after hee had taken the paines to come fo fan, and that by his special appointment. But if he proceeded so to dont, and to make fogreatreekoning of the foldiers of the court, that in respect therof he neither regarded his promise, noise hat was right and iust; he would himself by force of arms take upon him the defence of his own honour and right; fo lightly effected by his father, and reuenge the differace offered vnco him by others.

Wherunto Baia at answered by the Cadelescher (which is a man of greatest place and authoritie among the Tanks in matters concerning their superstition, and therfore of them honored about others, as the facred interpreter of their law) that he did neither well nor wisely, without infleause to fall into so greatrage and choler, as by his speech and force to think to Fextore that good which was only by lone and loyaltie to be gained: wheras all things should be furely kept for him, and the empire vindoubtedly descend vinto him, if by vintimely hast hec did not mar that hope which he ought by sufferance and patient expectation to cherish. He might (as the Cadelescher told him) learn by that late example & fortune of his brother Selymu, what might be for his own good and welfare; and that it was a thing of far more danger, diniciale. art with bim desperatly to thrust himself headlong into such an action as he could not possibly see the end G of than moderating by reason his hor passions, to expect with patience the opportunitie of time, and fitnes of occasion, with the alteration of matters, all tending to his good.

Achomates inflamed with anger and grief of the repulse, all the while the Cadelescher was deliuering his fathers message, gaue him many sharp taunts, and had much adoe to stay himtell from offering of him violence, oftentimes threatning him, that in short time both his father should dearly buy the changing of his purpose, and the soldiers of the court their treacherous dealing. And to fending him away with this short answer, he presently rose with his army, and passing thorow Bythinia, cruelly spoiled the country in his return to Amasia. There daily more and more inflamed with the grief and the indignitie of the repulse before receiued, he determined to inuade the lesser Asia: that if it should so fall out, that hee must needs H by force of arms try his right against either of his brethren, he might therin vie the wealth of that rich province. Wherby it it should chance that he should by the practife of any fail of the whole empire, yet he should at the leastwife be possessed of the one half therof, and be the readier for all euents, having all these great and rich provinces in his power. Wherfore calling vnto him his two fons, Amurathes and Aladin, young princes of great hope, after he had gricuously complained of the vnkindnes of his father Bajazet, and of the injuries don against him by his enemies in the Court, he declared vnto them, that there was now no hope left for him to obtain the empire, except they would forthwith enter into arms with him, and fo together with him, defend both his and their own right and honour, against the malice and injuries of their enemies : which hee faid would be an easie matter to doe, by surprising the leffer I A sia, if they would couragiously enter upon it for a smuch as all Pysidia, Licaonia, Pamphilia, with the lea coast of Ionia, were not as then kept with an army or navy. And as for his brother Corentus, there was no great doubt to be made of him, who according to his quiet dispofition would be content either to fit stil, or els in regard of his iust quarrell to take part with him, or if he would needs intermeddle his quiet state with the troubled, and so enter into arms, might easily be thrust out of whatsoeuer he possessed. As for the Gouernors of the rest of the prouinces, hee doubted not but that they would also yeeld either to his commaund or fortune. Wherfore he willed them to pluck vp their hearts as men of courage, and to go into the countries therabouts to take vp men, and what soeuer els were needful for the wars. These gallants, of their own youthfull disposition ready enough for such a matter, and now incou- K raged with their fathers persuasion, did what they were by him commanded, and had in short time raised a notable army of voluntary souldiers, of whom the greatest part were of seruile condition. But Achemates himselfe, besides his old army which he had formerly led against the Persian rebels, leuied new forces also, and called forth into the field all the able men that were to be found in the Cities round about 1 and forunning through the prouinces, proclaimed himself king of Asia; and such as would not forthwith yeeld vnto him, those he and his two fons in divers places profecuted with all hostility; by which means many cities, especially such as were but meanly sortified, partly for sear, partly by constraint, were deliuered vnto him.

After that, he entred with his army into Licaonia and the borders of Cilicia, where by em- L baffadors and often letters he requested Mahametes his brothers fon (who then governed those countries) to aid him in his iust quarrell against them, who by crafty and sinister persuasions had to his dishonor and disgrace withdrawn his fathers good will from him, and so far sedu ced him, that he was determined to appoint another successor in the empire, than him his el dest and first begotten son. Which their malice he would (as he said) prevent; and by force of arms recourr his right, which his father knowing to be due vnto him, was about to have put him in possession therof whilst hee yet lived, had bee not by the simister practise of others bin hindred. For the recouery wherof, if Mahometes would out of his province aid him with men and victual, and so further his iust cause, he promised that he should find a far better Vncle than he had found a father, and that his prefent friendship should in time be most amply M and bountifully requited.

Wherto Mahametes answered, That he could not do what his vnole had required, except he were so commanded by his grandfather Bajazet, whom alone hee acknowledged for his dread Soucraign: and that it was not for him to judge whether he did right or otherwife, That hee A would not in his life time refigne the empire to his fon. But this (he faid) he was not ignorant of that hee was not to yeeld his obedience to any other, to long as hee lived possessed of the Empire: to whom both his father Tzihan Schach whilft he lived, and himfelfe alfo, had given their outhof obedience and loyaltie. Wherfore it were good for him to pacific himself, lest in feeking variably retienge of his enemies, he should to the offence of all men wrong his father, and by too much heat & hast ouerthrow both his hope and honor, which of right should be most great, if he could but in the mean time have patience, and stay himself a while. Achemates, who expected nothing leffe than fuch an answer, but thought that Mahometes would either for love or fear have prefently come ynto him, and now finding his requests to bee with greater grauitie and confideration denied by his nephew, than were by reason of him deman-B dedentred with his army into the borders of his province, and with fire and (word began to destroy the country before him. Which Mahometes with such power as hee had thinking to remedy was by the way incountred by his vncle, not far from Larenda, and there overthrown: and taking that city for refuge, was there certain daies befieged by Achomates, and at last, together with his brother (then but a child) deliucred into his hands, at such time as the City was by the fearfull citifens by composition yeelded vnto him. Achomates having taken the city with his two nephews, caused Mahometes his counsellors, with his foster brother, by whose persuasion it was supposed that he had so answered his Vncle and indangered himself, to bee out to death. -

• These proceedings of Achomates filled Bajazes with griefe and indignation, that he should 1512 C in so great years be set upon by two of his own sone after another. Yet to proue if those Basings sinds troubles might without more bloudshed be pacified, he sent Embassadours vnto him to re- Embassadours vnto him to prooue him for his difloyaltie, and to command him forthwith to fet at libertie his two Nephews, Mahometes & his brother, and so without more stir to get him again to Amasia: which if he should refuse to do, then to denounce vnto him open war. But hee, which by how much themore he had after his repulse ambitiously affected the empire, had resolved with himselfe to deal so much the more cruelly in his proceedings; having received this message from his father, caused the chief embassador (for that he had in frank speech delivered his message, and denounced vnto him wars) to be in his own presence put to death; and threatned the rest with Achomatet kilthe like, if before the going down of the Sun they avoided not his camp.

This outrage highly offended BajaZet, and alienated the mindes of many, before well affeded to Achomates; for that without any reucrence to his father, and contrary to the law of nations, he had violated the Embassadors sent to him for peace. Vpon the first bruit herof, the foldiers which then waited at the court gate, in the hearing of Bajazet exclaimed, that the insolencie of Achomates was not longer to be suffered, but forthwith by force to be represt: that by sufferance and delay he would grow from enill to worse; and that if BajaZet should prolong the time, and in fatherly fort feek by fair means to reclaim him, he should afterwards in vain craue the aid of his best foldiers against his rebellious son, strengthned by his owne long fufferance. Mustapha also the chief Bassa, with Bostanges and others of great place (who secretly lauored Selymus, and had cunningly caused these things by sit men to be dispersed among E the fouldiers) began at first to mutter, and as it were to wonder at the strangenes and heinousnes of the fact, in such fort, as if they had condemned the deed done, but not the doer. But afterward, when they faw that BajaZet was throughly heated, both by his own angry disposition and the speech of the soldiers, and vpon the considence of his former victory against Selymus, now ready to feek reuenge; they began then to heap fresh coles upon the fire, and bitterly to invey against Achomates, as a traitor to his aged father and the state; and withall highly commended the fidelitie and courage of the Ianizaries and foldiers of the court, who for the fafety and honor of their aged Emperourwere most prest and ready to expose themselves, their lives, and what soeuerels they had, vnto new dangers.

So was Achomates by the craft and subtilitie of these great men, by the apger of his father, Achomatespreand the judgement of the foldiers, proclaimed traitor, and order taken, that the foldiers of the claimed traiter Court, with the Europeian horsemen, should with all possible speed be sent against him into Asia. But when choice was to be made of some valiant and worthy Generall that might take vpon him so great a charge, which seemed especially to appertain vnto some one of the great

Baffa's:it was firange to fee how they all began to firain curtefic at the preferment, and cuery G one to rejuse the place, and disable himselfe, saying, That it were a great indignitie, that the Emperors Army should be led against his son by any of his servants : and the souldiers (hauing their lesson before hand) said plainely, That they durst not nor would not draw their twords, or lift up their hands against the son of the Emperor, and heir apparant of the empire. except they were conducted and commaunded by some of the Othoman bloud in person pretent with them : for so had his brother, long before when hee rebelled in Cilicia, and now of late Sclymus his rebellious fon, bin both ouerthrown and vanquished, euen by the conduct of Bajazet himself, and not by any of his servants. These things all tended to this purpose, that Selymus might by indirect means be reconciled to his father, (whom they secretly fauoured, although for fear of displeasure they durst not so much as name him, but by way of disgrace) H and by this very meanes to make way for his returne to Constantinople, and so consequently giue him power to seise vpon the Empire. For it was probably supposed, that neither Baja. Ret himself, being very aged and discased , neither Corontus (altogether buried in his study) would vidertake the mannaging of those Wars. So that of the Otheman Family onely Selvmas was left, to whom that charge might be committed; all the Nephews of Bajazes, by reason of their tender yeares, as yet unfit for the same. At these speeches of the Bassa's and the fouldiers, BajaZet as a man perplexed and in a chafe, flung away into his palace, excufing himfell by reason of his great years and diseased body. But complaining deeply, That Corents in following the vain title of learning, with a quiet contented kind of life, had in the means time neglected other studies and honourable qualities, better beseeming his princely birth I and Calling. As he was thus reasoning with himself, and deutsing what course to take, Mustapha the old Bassa, who all the time of his reign had vsed to dis-burthen him of his cares, hauing by way of talk drawn him into a full discourse concerning the proceeding to the intended War, set upon him with this crafty and premeditated speech, framed of purpose for his destruction.

Your Majesty may not (most dread Soueraign) although by years and strength of body you were neuer fo wel able, you may not, I fay either transport your army, or your selfe passe ouer in person into Afia; lest whill you are there from place to place chasing Achomates, you leave a far more damerous enemy behind you in Europe, who may in your absence seise upon Thracia, Gracia, yea and the Imperiall City it K. selfe, destitute of sufficient Defendants. Dowe not heare, that Selymus is raising of new forces about Varna? to expect a new supply of horsemen from the Tartar king his father in law? And already as it were housering ouer our heads? Is he not of greater spirit and courage, than to be daunted or dismayed with the misfortune of one battell? or if you shall send oner your old beaten souldiers into Asia, and call Corcutus into Europe, with the forces he leavied the last yeare, who in time of your sicknesse may withstand the attempts of Sclymus: will be fearethefe fresh water soldiers of Asia, or their phylosophical Generall, which feared not the soldiers of your court, the pickt and chosen men of the world, and your selfe a most worthy and victorious Emperor? You are deceived, and (if I may be so bold so to say) you throughly see not into the doubtfull event of things, if you thinke not, that you must at one time wage war against two dangerous enemies, even in the remotest parts of your Empire, in Asia and Europe : For whilest you L shall go about to expulse Achomates out of Cappadocia, Selymus neerer at hand, and awaiting all opportunities; will by and by at your backraife a most dangerous war in the very heart and chief strength of your Empire. But if you, mooned with the greatnesse and due consideration of the danger, hall goe about to desend Thracia, and for that purpose retaine with you the most approound and faithfull souldiers of the Court, you shall see all Asia on a fire before your face : neither will Achomates make an end of waste and warre, untill such time as he hath drawne the Empire of Asia unto himselfe. Wherefore if it be not to be imputed to your fault, but to your fate or fortune, that two begotten of your felfe, should by your felfe and the comfent of all men be sudged traiterous unto your evowne and dignitie; whereof the one through rashnesse, the other upon pride and vaine discontentment, hath risen up in armes acainst you. It by doe you not in so doubtfull and perplexed a matter, preferre safe and sound aduise be- M forcibat which masketh under the shew of maiestie and honour? and whom you cannot both at one time correct and be renemged upon, to fet upon them as occasion shall serue when they are together by the eares between themselves ? This is the onely hope of your safetie, this is the onely way, if you fi all resolute (as the common pronerbe faith) to drine out one naile with another, and so to ouercome

A your enemies : moderat for a while your hot defire of revenge, and for the prefent diffemble your griefe : grant unto one of them pardon, and in show take him into your grace and fauour, imploy him against the other : fo shall you without danger, how soever it shall fall out, perfecute the one whom you love not, with the halard of the other whom you trust not; and at your pleasure oppresse him to whom you shall commit your ensiones and army : the hands of your faithfull and trusty soldiers being ener at your appointment ready totake revenge. So hall you with securitie make an end of this war, exposing wnto the danger him whome nou hadrather to overcome as your enemy, by him whom you wish also to perish.

Mustapha had scarse made an end of speaking, but the other Bassa's (as they had before 4-R greed among it themselves) began where he left, and with all their cunning laboured to perfinade Baiazet to call home his fon Selymus, and to make him General of his Army against his brother faying that he had already endured sufficient punishment for his former disloyalty. and therfore it was like that he as a wel corrected child would from thenceforth contain himfelf within the compaffe of his most dutifull obedience. Wheras Achomates, proud of his birthright, having of late violated his fathers Embassadors, and filled all Asia with rebellion. was not like to be brought to any reasonable conformity, untill hee were by force of Armes pluckt down, and so made to know himself, in like manner as was his brother Selymus of late. Bajazet feeing that in resoluing of a matter of so great consequence, Cherseogles Bassa (his sou inlaw, and the only faithful counsellor then about him) fat all filent, hanging the head, as one of a contrary opinion to the rest, stood a great while in doubt what to resolue voon. He could not so easily forget the late injuries don against him by Selymus, it was yet fresh in memory, how that he had out of Asia inuaded Europ, surprised Hadrianople, given him battel, indangered his person by his Tartarian horsmen, and that only by the goodnes of God hee had obtained the victory. On the other fide, his Majesty contemned, his Nephewes imprisoned, his Embassadors violated, the cities of Asia ransacked, and all those goodly Countries presently smoking with the fire of rebellion, so filled his old heart with anger and Indignation, as that hedefired nothing more than to be reuenged. Whilest he was thus strugling with his owner thoughts, and doubtful what to do, the vnfaithful Baffa's by deep deceit and trechery (Cherfeegles most instantly persuading the contrary) ouercame him so far, as with his owne hand to n write letters to Selymus, promiting, that forgetting all injuries past, he would vpon the hope of his loyaltie receive him into his former grace and favor, and make him General of his army, ifhe would without delay repair to Constantinople, and so passe ouer into Asia against his rebellious brother Achomates.

Whilest these things were in doing at Constantinople, Corcutus being aduertised by Letters from his friends, of the weak estate of his aged father, and by what persuasions lice had bin induced (after that Achomates had bin proclaimed Traitor) to call vito him Selymus, and to make him General of his Army; came down out of Magnefia to Phocis, and there imbarking himself in his Gallies, sailed to Constantinople. Where being arrived, he went pre-corentus comes fently to the Court, attended upon with a great number of his friends and fauourits; and en. to confiantingtring into the priuy chamber, humbled himself before his father, and kissed his hand: and after much talk had betwire them of divers weighty matters, is reported to have spoken vnto him as followeth.

It is now about thirty years past (most reverend father and dread Soueraign) since that I (being chosen corentus bis and proclaimed Emperor by the prerogatine of the foldiers of the Court, by generall confent of the Citi- ratio to like falens of this Imperial City, and by the grave judgement of the wife and grave Bassa's of the Court) have cheerfully and willingly, and as I may truly say, with my own had delivered from my self to your Maiesly, the possession of this most glorious king dom and Empire. Which thing what worldly Wight would have dan, but either a Madman, or els amost kind ond louing son? Vnto which so rare an example of a religi-Fou and louing heart, I was not by any fear or constraint inforced, but only by regard and contemplation of your own sacred person, and due consideration of my duty. Neither did it in the course of so many yeares cuer repent me of that my singular kindenesse and duty done; when as I contenting my self with such things 44 you had vnto me assigned, and with the generall commendation of my well-doing, as wel as with a kingdom shought this your great estate and highest type of worldly honour, not to be compared with the quie G content n ent of my pleasing Studies ; when as I accounted it a vain thing, and not befeeming the relolution of a sciled and quiet mind, to long after these worldly things, which being had and inioged to the ful work no full contentment in the vnfatiable defires of man : and that furmounting vertue, and the fuces, o most sweet meditation of beauculy things, promised unto my contemplatine and ranished minde things of far more worth and Majesty than all the Kingdoms and Monarchies of the world. But whilf I was tracing this path, little regarding worldly honour, or the glory of an Empire; and was for pure deuction and defire of knowledge traucking into the farthest part of Arabia, who the Altar of our most facred Prophet Mahomet and so to the Indians, as to men of a more exact knowledge and sincere profession you in the midst of my travel drew me out of Egypt by the long hands of the Egyptian Sultan back againinto Phygia commanding me, that eschuing the manifold dangers which in my long travel I must needs H have fallen into . I should from thenceforth have more regard of my life and health, and to expect the fruit both of my lovaltic towards you, and of your fatherly love towards me. As if you had bin then of opinion, that the time would come when for the cuill disposition of some, an innocent man, denoted unto the fudy of wildom and learning, might be a flay both unto your felf and the whole Othoman Family. Since which time I have ever both dutifully obeyed your command, and with as much care and integrity as I poflibly could, discharged my charge: and in the late Persian war, raised and brought into the field myne army, wh. rwith I defended the frontiers of my province from the incursions of the Barbarians. But after they were vanquished, and by your forces driven out of the lifer Asia, and that my unnatural and graceles brethren, the one of them in Europ as amost desperat Recreant, had in plain battell assailed the person of your most sacred Maiesty (his renerend father, far spent with age, and then grianously tormented with the gout) of purpose to have at once deprived you both of your life and empire. And the other in Asia seeking by like disloyalty and most horrible treason there to possess himself of a kingdom, had besieged and taken prisoners his brothers sons his nephews, yong princes of great expectation, your faithfull and loning subjects; and proceeding further, had fet all that part of your empire on a broil: I thought my felf in dui, and to repair hither onto your Imperial Majelty, for that I fam it came to paffe, not without the providence of the most Mighty that I might at such time especially request the instreward of my due desert of you my most reverend and louing father, the most religious observer of equity and Iustice when as you having had too great proof of the infidelity of my unnatural brethren, might most fitly and most commodioufly perform that which you upon great reason might now grant unto me your dutiful and obedient son, although my former deferts had merited no fach thing . Wherfore most grations, 1 befeech you, by all K your fatherly loue and affection towards mee, and my known loyalty towards you, to vouch fafe before the comming of Selymus, to have regard of myne honor, with the state of your empire: for when he shal once in arms break in, he wil at a trice cut of all hope of pacification, and supported by the men of war, confound all things at his pleasure. For I hear, that the very garders of your person, and chief commanders of your armes, altered in disposition towards you do but expect the good offer of time, when they may willingly salute for their Emperor and Soueraign, him whom your good fortune of late, full fore against their wills, ouert brew in open field. Wher fore that empire wherof I was somtime possessed, and for the rare desert of myne antiem loyaltietoward you, is of good right due unto me, restore to me again whilest you may, and whill it is yet in your power in this sudden and momentary occasion now presented. For your Maiesty shall in vain favor my most sust and vpright ciaim, after that you (having once received into the Imperial city L a desperat and ambisious man) have for ever lost your liberty, sogether with your self.

Corcutus with tears standing in his cies, having ended his speech, the aged Emperor moved forcib cons. with a fatherly affection, and the reasonable persuasion of him his only loyall and most kind fon, comforted him vp with good words, and willed him to be of good cheer, and withall difconcred vnto him the very ground of his resolution in calling home of Selymin; telling him strain was further, That he could be wel content to refigne to him again the Empire, but that it was not in his power fo presently to do, for fear of the foldiers of the court, who had (as he said) of late withflood him in the like motion, and would againe with tooth and naile gainfay it, if hee should but give the least occasion for them to suspect any such matter. But that by the plot M now laid, selymus (hould under the title of honor be drawn out of Europe, together with the foldiers of the court, into Asia against Achomates (both bars vnto his present desire for transferring of the Empire; in whose absence it should be in his power freely to dispose thereof

A st his pleasure: which he promised presently to resigne vnto him, so soone as they were once passed ouer into Asia. Which thing once don, although it were not altogether to their liking, vet feared he not, that either the captains or foldiers, who had of late fo honorably and faithfully defended him against Selymus, should now for his sakedislike of Corcutm, or attempt any thing not befeeming the glory of their late defert : but rather hoped, that if his two vnnaturall and rebellious fons, Achomates and Selymus, should once joine battell (as it was most like they should) that either the one or both should by the just judgement of God perish for their so great disobedience, murdred by the hands one of another. Corcutus not much disliking o his fathers purpole, and refting himselfe wholly vpon his fauor, thought it not good further to atgue the matter his father had fowell confidered of but taking his leave returned to his lodging not without hope of obtaining the Empire, and to remained many daies after at Constantinople: during which time he fought neither by gifts nor golden promifes to procure the love and good liking of the great Bassaes or soldiers of the court; for that he as a plain vpright man, thought it not good by fuit and corruption (the great promoters of the vnworthy) to feeke for that at their hands, which was of right due vnto him by his fathers fauor & promife. In the mean time Selymus his fast friends aductifing him of the comming of Corcutus to the court, aduised him to make haste, and with all speed possible to come to Constantinople; for that it was to be feared, lest Bajazet being very aged, and withall easie to be drawn away might by the persuasion of Corcuts be induced to alter, yea, and perhaps quite breake off the course beforewell fet for his most ready preferment. Vpon which news, Selymus attentiuely waiting G woon nothing more than to haue excesse wnto his friends in court, and before resoluted, at his fift comming thither not to spare for any cost in corrupting the men of warre, and so to possesse himselfe of the Empire; made now no stay but with certaine troups of horsemen. commanding the rest to follow after, came with wonderfull celerity to Constantinople. Corcusus with the great Bassa's and Courtiers, and most part of the soldiers of the court, going to meet him at the gates of the city, at his entrance received him with a kiffe (as is the manner of the Turks) and brought him through the midst of the city, all the people running out by heapes to haue a fight of the man, of late in euery mans mouth for his desperat rebellion, but now welcommed with much thundring that in token of triumph, and the joyfull acclamation of men, women, and children, and people of all forts. So that it eafily appeared, that all the ha-D tred before conceined against him, for his late outrage against his father, was now quite forgotten; and that he would in short time before his other brethen aspire vnto the Empire. The next day after, Selymus came to the court, and having accesse to his father, fell prostrate beforehim and kiffed his feet, and with the greatest shew of humility possible, craued of him pardon for his disloyalty. O deepe dissembler, and traitor of all other most trecherous! of late in field with sword drawne to have slaine his aged father, but now prostrate at his feet; and within an houre mounted perforce into his imperiall feat.

The old Emperour finiling upon this Crocodile, in most kinde manner tooke him up, and courteously said vnto him:

Thy faults, son Selymus, are so much the leffe, for that they have found speedy repentance, wherefore Basicets cristy £ I do the more willingly grant thee pardon: but from henceforth endeauour thy selfe, that God who hath section one but einenther anathle a little and the selfmus. given thee anotable spirit and courage, may also be thought to have indued thee with a good and well disposedminde. There is a martiall matter ready, worthy thy hardnesse, wherein thou mayst sufficiently manifest wno the world thy forwardnesse and courage: there when time scrueth let it appeare.

Shortly afterwas called a Councell for the wars, but especially for the chusing of a Gene- The crafty diftall to goe against Achomates: the honour of which place when many would have given to Selymus. Selymus, he began with great diffimulation to refuse, making as though he would not in any case be preserved before his brother Corcutus, to whom he would (as he said) willingly give place, both in respect of his yeares and learned discretion, who could no doubt with greater authority and wisedome mannage that war: as for himselfe, now he had obtained his fathers gratious pardon and farrout, he could well content himfelfe with any corner of the Empire,

But Corcutus and his friends, who had reposed all their hope and all their denises in the de-Patture of Selymus with the foldiers of the court; as if they had with great modelty contended onboth fides, againe perfuaded him, yes, and instantly requested him not to refuse than honour, by generall consent without any disgrace to his brother, given to him as to a worthy G Chiefetaine of great experience in martiall affaires. So Selymus with wonderfull cunning deluding Corents and his fauorits, whileft he seemeth craftily to refuse the thing he most defireth, is by the generall confent of all parts chosen Generall of the army to go against his brother Achomates. Which was no fooner made knowne vnto the fouldiers, especially the Iani. zaries and other fouldiers of the court; but they before instructed, with loud acclamations sa luted him not for their Generall onely, but for their foueraigne Lord and Emperoralfo; and fo without further delay put themselves in armes to defend and make good that they had done, if any better disposed should seeme to withstand them or dissent from them.

Sclymus by the fouldiers thus faluted Emperour, at first made shew as if he had beene halfe vnwilling to take vpon him the Empire; and so began faintly to refuse it, as moved so to doe H by the due reuerence and regard of his father, yet living. But after a while he fuffered himfelfe to be intreated: and then commending himselfe and his cause wholly to the men of warre, to binde them vnto him the faster, promised beside the particular fauours he ought them to beflow a right great and generall largeffe among ft them : which he afterwards accordingly per-

After that, he requested the chiefe Bassass and commanders of the army there present, to go forthwith vnto his father, and to take such order (seeing it was the mind of the whole army it (hould be fo) that the Empire might by his good will, without further trouble or tumult be forthwith transferred vnto him.

Must apha the great Bassa, in whose wyly head all this matter was (to his owne worthy de- I Aruction) first hammered; whether it were vpon a new finenesse of his owne, or that Selymus (as it was given out) had threatned to kill him, except be would go and shew all the whole proceffe of the matter to his father: comming as a man difmaied to Bajazet, (who awaked with clamour and tumult of the foldiers, was come out of his chamber, into the open roomes of his Palace) in few words deliuered vnto him this most vnwelcome message, as followeth:

Treblunt freeb Emperour (faid he) the men of war have in their Councell faluted Selymus both their Generall and of Mullophu to Emperour, which their choice they require thee to ratific, being ready presently to breake into the Court to ding him to re. kill us both, if thou shalt refuse forthwith to resigne the Empire. They all with one consent request that of fire the empire thee, which they have already put into the hand of another. Wherefore it is a thing of far more danger, so sceke to recover that thou hast already lost, than willingly to yeeld that which is already taken from thee, K secing it is not by any force or policy to be regained. They in armes, in fury, and now entred into rebellion, thinke wpon fomegreater mischiefe.

Bajazet troubled with feare and choler, and then too late perceiving the trechery of the Bassacs, and how he had bin by them betraied , pausing a while at the strangenesse of the matter, afterwards in fury brake out into these words:

False and forsworne, do you thus betray me ? and with such monstrous villang requite mine infinite jun of old Be bounty? Why do you not also as murtherers take away my life, which could not endure for a while to expha and the a peet the diffoliation of this my weake and aged body; but deposing your just and lawfull Soueraigne, must needs in post haste set up a most wicked and gracelesse man to reigne over you? But much good do it you with your desired Emperour, the contemner of God, and murtherer of his father : to whomere it be long, L you shall full deerely pay the price of this your perfidious dealing and trechery against me. And he himtelfe beginning his Empire by most unnatural treason, murder, and bloudshed, shall not (I hope) escape the heavy hand of God, the undoubted and severe revenger of so great impiety and treason.

Mustapha, with Bostanges and Ajax as falle as himselfe, returning backe again to the soldiers speaking not a word of the fortow and indignation of Baja (et, told them how that he was well content to refigne the Empire, and so had appointed Selymus (towhom both God and the generall consent of the men of war had already deliuered the Empire, to succeed him in the Empire. When this their speech was generally reported, they whom Selymus had before corrupted, began now to hold up their heads and looke big on the matter: and others who before flood doubtfull what to do, seeing now no other remedy, in hast joyned themselves vnto the M fame faction. Whilest all things were thus disorderly carried by the vnruly souldiers, Selymus was by them mounted upon a couragious horse, and so with all pomp conducted up and down most of the faire streets of the Imperial city; and with the generall voice and clamor of the people (how soeuer their minds were for most part otherwise affected) saluted Emperor. And

A the same day both the great Bassa's and the souldiers in generall, were all solemnly sworne vnto Selvmus, as their only Lord and Emperour.

Corentum, whether it were for griefe of his hope now lost, or for feare of his life, although corentus fliets. Selvmus had promifed to give him the city of Mytilene, with the Island of Lesbos, secretly embarked him selfe and so returned to Magnesia.

Baiazet of late one of the greatest Monarchs of the world, but now thus thrust out of his empireby his fon, detecting both him and the treachery of his subjects, and our come with forrow and melancholy, determined of himselfe, before he were thereto enforced by Selymus, to forfake Constantinople, and to retyre him selfe to Dymotica (a small city wholesomely seituared in Thracia, not far from Hadrianople; where in former time he had for his pleasure be-

B stowed great cost, and now as he thought best fitted his present estate.) Wherefore causing great store of treasure, plate, jewels, and rich furniture to be trussed up, he with five hundred of his houshold servants, full of heavinesse and sorrow, with teares trickling downe his aged cheekes, departed out of the Imperiall city, towards Hadrianople, with purpose from thence to have gone to Dymorica, Selymus brought him about two miles vpon his way, and fo returning againe to Constantinople, tooke possession of the Palace.

Bajazet being then about scuenty six yeares old, or as some report full sourescore; and beside his old disease of the gout, fore weakened with heavinesse and griefe of minde, was not able to travell aboue five or fix miles a day, but was constrained by the extreamity of his pain and weakenesse, to stay sometimes two or three daies in a place. Whilest he was thus trauel-C ling, Selymus no leffe carefull of the keeping of his estate, than he had before been for the obtaining of the same, began now to doubt, That if he should depart from Constantinople, and with all his Forces passe ouer into Asia against his brother Achomates, Bajazet in the meane time might in his absence returne to Constantinople, and so again possessible himself both of the sity and the empire. Wherefore to rid himselse of that seare, he resoluted most viper like before his going to kill his father, and so most vnnaturally to depriue him of life, of whom he had received life: such is the cruell and accursed nature of ambition, that it knoweth neither father, mother, brother, wife, kindred, or friend, no sometimes not her owne children; the fury whereof was neuer in any more pregnant, than in this most monstrous and cruell zyrant Selymus.

The readiest and most secret way he could denise for the effecting of this his damnable de- selymus prattiuice, (which without great impiety could not be fo much as once by him thought vpon) was, fith with Hatoworke it by poyson: vpon which resolution he secretly compacted with Haman a lew, his jestely by secretic Discourse of the secretic Discourse of t fathers chiefe Physician, to poylon him , promising him for his reward a pension of ten duc- story, to possion katsaday during his life. And for that men are oftentimes with terrotir and feare, as well as bim. with reward, enforced to be the ministers of mischiese; he to be the more sure of this lew, (prone enough for gaine to doeuill) threatned him with most cruell death, if he did not both fecretly and speedily worke this scat, commanding him so some as he had done it, to returne vnto him to Constantinople.

The deceitfull Iew moued both with the feare of death and hope of reward (two great mo-E tiues) comming shortly after to Bajazet, and finding him very weake, seeming to be very care full of him, told him, That he would prepare for him a porion, which should both restore to him his health, and also strengthen his weake body, if it would please him to take it the next morning early lying in his bed. Bajazet nothing diffrusting his old physitian whom he had so often and follong truffed, faid he would gladly take it. Early the next morning commeth the lew with the deadly poyfon in a cup of gold, Bajazet yet sleeping, which he fet downe in the chaire of Estate, and so stood waiting untill the aged Prince should of himselfe awake. But Bajaset fleeping foundly (as oftentimes it chanceth when men fleepe their laft) and withall fomewhat longer than flood with the Iewes purpose, he presuming of his wonted practife, awaked him and told him, That the time to take the potion was almost past, and asked him if

F itwere his pleasure then to take it. Bajane doubting no treason, willed him to bring it: whereof when the Icw had taken the fey, (hauing before himfelfe taken a preservative against that poyfon) he gaue it to Bajazet to drinke, who cheerefully dranke it vp: the Physitian com- najaste page. manding them that waited in his bed chamber, and attended on his perfor, to keepe him well medijibe lim. couered with warme cloths, and not to give him any thing to drinke vntill he had well sweat.

Bajazet.

This curfed lew having thus poyfoned the aged Prince, to avoid the danger of the fact, and to c carry the first newes thereof to Selymu, secretly conveied himselfe away, and fled in haste to Constantinople. But Bajazet attainted with the force of the poyson, began first to feele most grieuous gripings in his stomacke, the strong paine whereof appeared by his miserable complaining and heavy groaning; in the middest of which torments he gave vp the ghost, in the yeare 1512, when he had raigned thirty yeres. The Turks report that he died a naturall death: but Antonius Vtrius a Genoway, who at that time ferued in Bajazet his chamber, and was prefent at his death, reporteth, That vpon his dead body the euident tokens of poylon were to be seene. His dead body with all his treasures were presently brought backe againe to Constan. tinople, and deliuered to Selymus, who caused the body of his father to be with the greatest solemnity that might be, buried in a most sumptuous tombe, in a chappell neere vnto the great H Mahometan temple, which he had before built for himselse at Constantinople: which Mo. nument there remaineth at this day to be seene. His servants were all by Selymon restored to their places which they before held in the court in the time of their old Master excepting five of the pages of his chamber, who lamenting the death of their Master about the rest, had attyred themselues all in mourning apparell; for which cause they were by the commandement selymmetalfeth of Selymme cast in prison, where two of them were put to death; the other three at the suit of two of bu Fa Solyman, Selyman his fon, and of other two Bassacs, were faued: but being stript of their rich apbe part to death parell and what foeuer elfe they had gotten under Bajazet, they were involled for common folfor mourning diers under Sullustares Bassa. Of these three, Autonius Vivins (the Genoway before spoken of) was one, who after ten yeres of miserable captiuity amongst the Turks, at last escaped at such 1 time as Selymas was by the Perfian discomfitted; and with much adoe returning againe into Italy, wrote the history of all such things as he himselfe had there seene, with the calamities of Bajazet his house, and a great part of the tyrannous reigne of Selymus.

Hamon the falle Iew (as the fame author reporteth) comming to Constantinople, and exinfly rewarded pecking some great reward for his soule treason, by the commandement of Selymus had his for but itrache head prefently flrucke off: with this exprobation of his trechery, That opportunity feruing, he would not flicke for reward to do the like against Selymus himselfe. Of this Bajazet, lanus Vitalia writeth this Elogium:

> Paulus Ioulus Illuft.vicerum Flog.lib. 4.

Dum rerum exquiris causas, & dum procul Hunnes Carmannos, Cilices, Sauromatasque domas : Bajazethe, domi proles tua te petit armis. Et te per fraudes amouet imperio. Adjeit inde novum scelere scelus & tibi miscet Poculalethiferis illita graminibus. Intempelinos crudelis vipera fætus, Per sua sic tandem funera, rupta, parit. Quid tutum eft, cui fint ingentia requa tyranno, Si timeat natos, prozeniemque fuam ?

In English thus:

Whil'st that thou Bajazether seekes of things the hidden cause. And faine wouldst bring the Hunne and Russe vnder thy Turkish lawes: Thy sonne at home steps up in armes against thy royall Crowne, And by false treason and deceit findes meanes to plucke thee downe. Whereto he addeth mischiefe more, and streit without delay, By poyfon strong in glittering boule doth take thy life away: The cruell viper fo brings forth her foule vntimely brood, Which eat and gnaw her belly out, their first and poisoned food. What things may Princes hold for fafe, that do great kingdomes sway, If of their children they must stand in dread and scare alway?

Phil. I onicer. Turc. Hift.L.

En Selymus, scelere ante alios immanior omnes: In patris, & fratrum, dirigit armanecem. In Perfas mouet inde ferox : Memphitica regna Destruit : & Syros Athiopasque domat. Hine in Christicolas irarum effundere fluttus, Ipsorumque imo vertere regna parat. Cum diro victus prosternitur vicere : Christus Scilicet eft populi, portue & aura fui.

Lo Selymus, in cruelty exceeding others farre, His father, and his brethren both, destroies with mortall warre. The Persian siercely he assailes : and conquers Ægypts Land : The Syrian, and the Moore likewise, he tam'd with mighty hand. But purposing in his mad mood, the Christians to confound, And the memoriall of their name to root from off the ground, A loath ome Canker cat him vp, and brought him to his end: Christ is to his the safest Port, when he will them desend.

LIFE OF SELYMVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE THIRD AND MOST WARLIKE EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

His Selymin, by fauor of the great Bassass and men of war whom he had before corrupted, having deprined his father Bajazet first of the Empire, and shortly after of his life also, and now fully posses- 1512 sed of the Empire himselse; sirst tooke view of the treasures which the Turkish Kings and Emperors his ancestors had before of long time heaped vp in great abundance : out of which he gaue vnto the souldiers of the court two millions of duckats; and for a perpetuall remembrance of his thankfulnesse towards them, augmented their daily wages, allowing vnto euery horseman source aspers a day, and to every footman two above their wonted allowance. By which exceeding bounty, he greatly affured vnto himfelfe the minds of the men of war,

Shortly after he passed ouerwith a great army into Asia, leaning the gouernment of the imperial city of Constantinople vnto his only sonne Solyman: and marching into Galatia, came his brother to the city of Ancyra, in hope there to have oppressed his elder brother Achomates. But he vn. Achomates. derstanding before of his comming, withall wifely considering how vnable he was to withstand his forces, fled before into the mountains of Cappadocia vpon the confines of Armenia, taking vp men by the way as he went, and praying aid of all forts of people, yea, euen of such aswerebut of small ability themselues, and vnto him meere strangers; that so he might in bestmanner he could, prouide such strength as might serue him to make head against his brother, and for the recouery of Asia.

Selymus having spent that summer without doing any thing worth the speaking of, and confidering that he could not well Winter in that cold country necre vnto the great mountaine Taurus, by reason of the deepe snowes and extreame cold there viually falling; and that to go farther was to no purpole, for a finuch as Achomates flying from place to place, and mountain to mountain, was not to be surprised; he retyred backe again into Bythinia, and sending his Europeian horsemen downe to the sea coast, and the Ianizaries to Constantinople; resolued to winter with the rest of his army at Prusa. At which time being wholly bent against Achomates his competitor of the Empire, he for certaine yeares continued the league which his father Bajazet had before concluded with Vladiflaus King of Hungary, Sigismundus King of Polonia, and the Venetians. And thinking no care (no not of Children) superfluous which might concerne the establishing of his Empire, he called vnto him fiue of his brothers sons, Orchanes the Selymus marfonne of Alem Scach; Mahometes the fonne of Tzihan Scach; Orchanes, Emirfa, and Musa the therein fine of hu brothers fonnes of his brother Mahometes; all young Princes of great hope, of yeares betwirt fix-fonnes. teene and twenty, excepting Musa who was not past seuen yeares old : Of all these, Mahometes (whom his vncle Achomates had a little before taken prisoner at Larenda, as is before declared, and vpon the death of Bajazet had againe set him at liberty) being about twenty yeares old, was for rare feature and princely courage accounted the paragon and beauty of the Othern family : which great perfection, as it woon vnto him the lone and fauour of the G men of war, and alto of all the people in generall: fo did it hasten his speedy death; onely Selyme his civell vincle enuying at his life. After he had got these poore innocents into his hands. he tent for diners of his great do &ors and lawyers, demanding of them, Whether it were not better that some fine, eight, or ten persons should be taken away, than the state of the whole Empire should with great effusion of bloud be rent in funder, and so by civile wars be brought in danger of otter rume and destruction? Who although they well perceived whereunto that bloudy question tended, yet for seare of displeasure they all answered, That it were better such a small number should perish, than that the whole state of the empire should by civile war & ditcord be brought to confusion; in which generall calamitic, those few must also of necessity perith with the rest. Vpon colour of this answer, and the necessity pretended, he commanded H there his nephewes before named, to be led by fine of his great captaines into the castle of Prusa where they were all, the night following most cruelly strangled. It is reported, that Stabonetes with a perknife flew one of the bloudy executioners fent into his chamber to kill him; and fo wounded the other, as that he fell downe for dead; and that Selymus being in a chamber fast by, and almost an eye witnesse of that was done, presently sent in others, who first bound the poore Prince, and afterward strangled him with the rest: whose dead bodies were buried at Prula amongst their ancestors. The cruelty of this fact wonderfully offended the minds of most men, insomuch that many even of his martiall men filled with secret indignation, for certaine daies absented themselves from his presence, shunning his sight as if he had beene some fierce or raging lyon.

Of all the nephewes of old Bajazet, only Amurath and Aladin (the sons of Achomates) yet re-Selimus feeketh mained, whom he purposed to surprise vpon the sudden, and so torid himselfe of all seare of offer the lines his brothers children; having then left none of the Othoman family, but them and his two breof Amaiato Control thren vpon whom to exercise his further cruelty. These two young Princes had a little before of Accounted reconcred the city of Amasia, from whence they were the Summer before expulsed by their viicle Selymus, at such time as Achomates their father was glad to fly into the mountaines of Capadocia. Solymus fully resolued upon their destruction, sent V fegi one of his Bassacs with fine thousand horsemen, who by great journies trauelling to Amasia, might vpon the sudden come won these two yong Princes, and take them altogether unprouided, and as then searing no fuch danger:which was thought no great matter for the Bassa to do, for a smuch as he might K with his light horsemen easily preuent the same of his comming; and the City of Amasia where they lay, was neither well walled, nor as then furnished with any fufficient garrison for defence therof: befide that, Achomates himfelfe was at that time absent; bufied in taking vp of foldiers vpon the frontiers of Caramania. But Mustapha the old Bassa, by whose special means Selymus had obtained the Empire (as is afore declared in the life of Bajazet) being priny vnto his wicked purpose, and now in mind altogether alienated from him, detesting his most execrable tyranny, both for the vnworthy death of Bajazet, his father, & the guiltleffe bloud of fo many yong princes his nephews by him shed without all pitty; and having compassion of the imminent danger whereinto these two brethren were now like also to fall, by secret and speedy messengers gaue them warning of the comming of the Bassa, and of all that was intended L against them. Who vpon such knowledge given, presently advertised Achomates their father thereof, and laid tecret ambush themselves for the intercepting of their enemies. So that within few daies after, the Passa comming with his horsemen towards Amasia, sell before he was aware into the middest of his enemies : at which time also, Achomates following him at the heeles, fo thut him in with his army on every fide, that most of his men being slaine, he him-Processas felfe with divers other captaines were taken prisoners and brought to Achomates, and by his commandement committed to fafe custody.

Now it fortuned, that some of Achomates soldiers scoffing at the prisoners whom they had taken, told them how they had bin deceived, and how all the matter had been carried (fo hard a thing it is to have even the greatest counsels in court kept secret) boasting, that they wanted M not their friends, cuen of fuch as were most inward with Selymus, who secretly fauoured the better caufe, & would not long fuffer the cruell beaft to rage further; all which things Selymus his foldiers reported again after they were ranfomed and returned home. But Vfegi the Baffa lying still in prison; and getting certain knowledge of the whole matter, by secret letters gaue third Emperour of the Turks.

Selvmen of late enuying at the great honour and authority of Mustapha, and withing him dead. (whose desert he was not able, or at leastwise vnwilling to require) caused him vpon this accusation without further triall to be secretly strangled in his sight, and his dead body (as it Mustapha Basia were in scorne of his former felicity) to be cast our into the street for every man to gaze vpon. ibered, This was the shameful end of this traiterous Baffa, who had of long time at his pleasure commanded all things in the Tutkish Empire, and was for riches, power, and authority, next vnto the Emperors themselves : but now lieth as a dead dog in the street, no mandaring for search to cast earth vpon him. A rare spectacle of the vncertainty of worldly selicity, and a worthy B example of difloyalty. But Achomates hearing what had happened to Mustapha, in revenge thereof in like manner executed V fee Bassa his prisoner; and according to his courteous na- Viei Bassa put ture fet all the rest of the prisoners at liberty.

Selymus thirsting after nothing more than the guiltleffe bloud of his brethren and nephews, voon whom he had against all right vsurped the kingdom, whereof he neuer thought himselse sufficiently assured so long as any of them breathed; began with the first of the Spring to deuisewith himselfe, how he might first take away his brother Corcutus, who then lived at Magnesia, and having cast offall hope of the Empire, gave himselfe wholly to the study of Philotophy, which he (seduced with ambition) had in euill time a little before forsaken; but now retyring himfolfe thereto againe, as to his greatest contentment, spent his time in quiet contemplation, not attempting any thing against his cruell brother vsurping the Empire. Selymus resoluted upon the destruction of this harmlesse Prince, suddenly commanded his captaines to make choice of 10000 hor semen to be in readinesse within three daies, giving it out that he would make an inrode vpon the fudden into Cappadocia. In the number of these horsemen, Ammine Managines a Genoway, author of this history (as he of himselfe reporteth) was one.

All things being in readines against the appointed time, Selymus in person himselfe set forward with his army from Prusa, still keeping the way on the right hand; so that the souldiers, who thought they should have marched directly into Cappadocia, and so to Amasia, as it was before commonly reported; began now to perceive by the contrary course they held, that they weretogo for Lydia and Ionia. When a valiant fouldier among the rest, who had sometime D served one of the Bassaes in Corcutus his court, by divers circumstances gathering the intention of Selymus, secretly conneied himselfe out of the army, and being excellently well mounted, taking the neerest way, came to Magnesia, and gaue Corcutus warning of the comming of his brother. Coreutus confidering the great danger he was in, richly rewarded the meffenger, and leaving his house in such order as it was wont to be, fled with two of his servants to the sea side, in hope to have found passage either into Creet or else Rhodes.

The next day after Corcutus was departed, early in the morning came Selymus to the castle of Magnesia before the rising of the Sun, in hope to have found Corcutus yet in his bed:but being deceived of his expectation, he fell into a great rage, and with cruel torments examined all his brothers servants and Eunuchs, What was become of him, and where he had hid himself? E and with much ado got it out of them, That he had warning of his comming by a fugitive foldier, and was thereupon fled, but whether they knew not. Wherefore Selymus stated there fifteen daies, during which time he caused diligent search to be made all ouer the country, and along the sea coast, for to have apprehended him. But when after much search he could heare no tydings of him, he caused all his brothers treasure & rich surniture to be trussed up, and to selymmetate the besent by sea to Constantinople. So leaving one of his captains with a thousand horsmen in the field of the gamifon at Magnesia, he returned againe to Prusa with as much speed as he came from thence: verily tuppoling, that his brother was for fafegard of his life, by fea fled into Iraly. All this while Bostanges, Selymus his son in law, lying with a fleet of gallies vpon the coast of Ionia, had taken from Corcutus all hope of escaping by sea: so that he was saine to hide himselfe in a caue neere vnto the sea side, not far from Smyrna; liuing in hope, that after a few daies the fleet would depart, and so he should finde some opportunity to escape.

After he had thus a great while in feare most miserably lived with country crabs and other likewild fruit (a poore diet for a man of state) and was with extreme necessity inforced to send his man for reliefe to a poore shepheards cottage thereby, he was by a country pelant discoue-Coccumulation, red to Cassumes, who with two much diligence fought after his life: and being by him appres. G hended was carried towards the tyrant his brother at Prufa.

Right welcome to Selymus was the report of his taking; who as foone as he understood than he was within a daies journy of Prula, sent one Kirengi. Ogli (who of his squint looke was called Chier Zeinall) to strangle him up upon the way, and to bring his dead body to Prusa.

This captaine comming to Corcutm in the dead time of the night, and awaking him out of his sleepe, told him his heavy message; how that he was sent from his brother Selymus to see him executed, which must as he said presently be done. Corcutm exceedingly troubled with these heavy news, and fetching a deepe figh, desired the captaine so long to spare his life, vn. till he night write a few short lines vnto his brother Selymus. Which poore request being granted he called for pen and paper, and readily in Turkish verse (for he had spent all his time H in study) reproued his brother of most horrible cruelty; vpbraided him, that he had not only most distoially thrust his father out of his Empire, but also most vnnaturally deprived him of life, of whom he had before received the fame; and not fo content, had most tyrant oully flaine his brorhers children; and now like an unmerciful wretch thirsted after the guiltlesse bloud of himselse and Achomates his brethren. At last concluding his letters with many a bitter curse, he besought God to take of him just revenge for so much innocent bloud by him most vanaturally spilt. And when he had thus much written, he requested the captaine, that it might together with his dead body be deliuered vnto Selymus. So without any further delay he was The lamentable according to the tyrants command presently strangled. The next day after, when the dead bodeath of Cores. dy was presented vnto Selymon, he vncouered the face thereof, to be sure that it was be, and see. I ing a paper in his hand, tooke it from him: but when he had read it (for all his cruell nature and stony heart) he burst out into tears, protesting, that he was never so much grieved or troubled with any mans death as with his: for which cause, he commanded general mourning to be made for him in the court, and with princely folemnity buried his body. Three daies after, he caused fifteen of those diligent searchers who first found Corcusses, to have their heads strucke off, and their bodies to be flung vnto the fea, faying, That if he were by any extremity driven to fly and hide his head, they would not flick to ferue him in like maner as they had don his brother,

Now of al the posterity of Bajazet remained none alive to trouble the cruel tirants thoughts but only Achomates and his two fons : who vpon the approch of the Spring, fet forward with his army from Amasia, excited by the often letters of his friends, who assured him, that Selymus K might vpon the sudden be easily oppressed, if he would with al expedition come to Prusasforas much as the Lanizaries and Europeian horsmen, the vindoubted strength of his army, were at that time absent, and he himselse as one hated both of God & man, could not in so sudden and vnexpected danger tel what he were best to do, or which way to turn himselfe : wherefore they willed him without delay to haften his comming, and not to expect the milder weather of the Spring, left in the mean time Selymus should call together his dispersed forces, God (they faid) did oftentimes offer vnto men, both the opportunity and theanes to do great matters, if they had the power to lay hold thereon, and therefore he should do well now by celetity and courage to seeke to better his cuill fortune, which but a little before had bereft him of his fathers kingdom, for if Summer were once come on he must either gain the victory by plainbattell, L which would be a hard matter, or els get him packing out of Capadocia and all Asia the lesse Achemates, who before had promised vnto himselse better successe, no well for the great strength he had of his owne, as for the new supply of horsemen he had procured from Hysmae the Persian King, but especially for the hope he had, that Selymus generally hated for his late cruelty, should in the time of the battell be forfaken of his owne foldiers ; yeelded to the pertuation of his friends, who with many pleafing words fet before his cies glorious things, cafie to be spoken, but hard to be effected. Wherefore when he was come into Galaria with somewhat more than 15000 horsemen, having for hast left his sootmen by easie marches to come after him: Selymus advertised of his comming, by speedy messengers sent for his horsemen to Ptusa. In the meane time whiles he is leuying other common souldiers, and expecting the M rest of his forces; fortune, which alwaies fauoured his attempts, did then also avert the danger prepared for him by the vnfaithfulnesse of his followers, and shewed to him the open way to victory. For Achomates secret friends which were in Salymus his campe, continuing sime in their good will toward him, did earnestly by letters persuade him (being already set forward, and now come as far as Paphlagonia) to make half, and to come before Selvmus his forces were come together: for that he had fent for the Ianizaries and Europeian horsemen, and did with all speed and diligence make all the preparation he could possibly; which for all that would all come too late, if he should vpon the sudden come vpon him before he was prouided. Which letters being by chance intercepted, gaue Selymus certaine knowledge both of Treason against his brothers purpose and comming, together with the treason intended against him by his selymus discoowne feruants: wherefore executing them who had writ those letters, he in their names caused others to the same effe & to be written to Achomates, persuading him with all seed possible to come fillon, and not to flay for his footmen, for that Selymus might easily be oppressed with a few troups of horsemen, if Achomates would with speed but come and shew himselfe vnto his friends and fauorites; who vpon the first signall of battell would raise a tumult in the army, and vpon the fudden kill selymus, vnaduisedly going to and froin the battell. Which letters to written, Selymus caused to be figned with the seales of them whom he had before executed, and found meanes to have them cunningly delivered to Achomates, as if they had bin fent from his friends : who giving credit to the same, and presuming much voon his owne firength, doubted not to leave his footmen, who followed eafily after him, under the conduct of Amurath his fon; and came and encamped with his horsemen neere vnto the mountaine Horminius, vpon the banke of the river Parthemius, Selymus also departed from Prusa, and hauing receiued into his army ten thousand Ianizaries (but a little before come ouer the streit) lent before Sinan Baffa, Generall of his Afian horfmen, to know & make proofe of the Arength C of his enemies. The Baffa as yet not knowing where Achomates lay, neither of what force he stran Biffa was, being deceived by the darkenesse of the morning, sell into a place of disadvantage, where disc infield by he was fet upon by Achemates, and having loft feuen thousand of his men, was glad with other eight thousand which were left, to fly backe vnto Selymus.

For all this lofte, was not Selymus discomforted, or doubtfull of the victory, but forthwith marched on forward to the river Elata, which runneth directly out of the mountaine Horminius into Pontus, watering most large fields upon the right hand, which at this day are called the plaines of the new land. So did Achomates alfo, who although he knew his brother to be enery way too strong for him, yet being encouraged with the late victory, and in hope that his friends in Selymore his army (whom he vainly supposed to have bin yet living) would in the ve-D sybattell doe some notable matter for him, and that victory would follow his just quarrell; resolved neither to retire backe, neither to expect the comming of the rest of his army. The nuerwas betweene the two camps, and the number of both armies certainely discouered: yet could not Achomates (to whom the open fields offered a safe retreit vnto the rest of his army) possessed with a fatal madnesse, be persuaded (considering the greatnesse of the danger) in time to provide for the fafety of himfelfe and his army, carried headlong (as it feemed) by inenitable destiny to his fatall destruction, which presently after ensued.

Selymus a little before the going downe of the Sun, with his army passed ouer the river Ela. selymus with ta, and gaue generall commandement through all his campe, that every man against the next fith our the day should be ready for battell : and in a wood not far off placed a thousand horsemen in am-river. E bush, under the leading of Canoelis, his wives brother, a valiant yong gentleman, whom his father had a little before sent from Taurica vnto his son in law with a chosen company of Tartatian horsemen: vnto him Selymus gaue in charge, that when the battell was joined, he should thew himfelfe with his horfemen vpon the backe of his enemies, and there to charge them.

As soone as it was day, Selymus in a great open field put his army in order of battell, placing his horsemen in two wings, so that all his spearemen were in the right wing, & the archers and carbines in the left: in the maine battell ftood the Ianizaries with the reft of the footmen. On the other fide Achomates having no footmen, divided his horsemen into two wings also.

Whilest both armies stood thus raunged, expecting but the fignall of battell, a messenger came from Achemates to Selymu, offering in his mafters name, to try the equity of their quar-F tell in plain combat hand to hand; which if he should refuse, he then tooke both God and the World to witnesse, that Selymus was the only cause of all the guiltlesse bloud to be shed in the battell, and not he; whereunto Selymus answered, that he was not to try his quarrell by the appointment of Achomates and though he could be content fo to do, yet would not his foldiers fuffer him fo to aduenture his person and their owne safety; and so with that answer seturned

Actionistes having received this answer, without further delay charged the rightwing of his brothers army, who valiantly received the first chargesbut when they were come to the sword and that the matter was to be tried by handy blowes, they were not able longer to endure the force of the Persian horsemen; who being well armed both horse and man, had before requefled to be placed in the formost ranks, by whose valor the right wing of Selymus his army was disordered, and not without great losse insorced to retire backe upon their followes. Which thing Selymus beholding, did what he might by all means to encourage them againe; and prefently brought on the left wing with their arrowes and pistals, in stead of them that were sted: and at the same time came on with the Ianizaties also, who with their shotenforced Achona. tes his horsemen to retire. Achomates himselfe carefully attending every danger, with greater H courage than fortune came in with fresh troups of horimen, by whose valor the battell before declining was againe renewed, and the victory made doubtfull: but in the fury of this battell whilest he was bearing all downe before him, and now in great hope of the victory, Canaolia with his Tartarian horfemen rifing out of ambush, came behind him, and with great outcries caused their enemies (then in the greatest heat of their fight) to turne vpon them : at which time also the footmen standing close together assailed them afront, and the horsemen whom the Persians had at first put to flight, now moved with shame, were againe returned into the battell: so that Achomates his small army was beset, and hardly assailed on every side. In fine his enfignes being ouerthrowne and many of his men flain, the rest were faine to betake themfelues to flight. Where Achomates having loft the field, and now too late feeking to faue himfelfe by flight, fell with his horse into a ditch, which the raine falling the day before, had filled with water and mire; and being there knowne and taken by his enemies, could not obtaine fo much fauour at their hands as to be presently slaine, but was reserved to the farther pleasure of his cruell brother, Selymu understanding of his taking, fent Kirengen (the same sqint eyed captaine which had before strangled Corcutus) who with a bow-string strangled him also. His dead body was forthwith brought to Selymus, and was afterward by his commandement in royall manner buried with his ancestors in Prusa.

Now Amurath, Acomates his sonne, understanding upon the way by the Persian horsemen Aldin to closes (who seered together, had againe made themselues way through the Turks army) of the loss Anomaio. of the field and the taking of his father, returned backe againe to Amalia: and there after K Paris, and the good deliberation, refolued with his brother to betake themselues both to flight, he with the state to Egypt.

Persian horsmen passing ouer the river Euphrates, fled vnto Hysmal the Persian kings but Aledin the yonger brother paffing ouer the mountaine Amanus in Cilicia, fled into Syria, and fo to Campion Gaurus the great Sultan of Ægypt.

After this victory, Selyman having in thort time and with little trouble brought all the leffor Asia under his obeisance, and there at his pleasure disposed of all things, determined to have returned to Constantinople: but understanding that the plague was hot there, be changed his purpose, and passing ouer at Callipolis and so travelling through Grecia, came to Hadrianople, where he spentall the rest of the Summer, and all the Winter following: and afterward when the mortality was ceased, returned to Constantinople : where it was found, that an L hundred and threefcore thousand had there died of the late plague.

Hypmiel the Persian King, whose same had then filled the World, hearing of the arrivall of Amurath, sent for him and demanded of him the cause of his comming. The distressed young Prince, who but of late had loft his father, together with the hope of fo great an Empire, and now glad for fafegard of his life to fly into fluange countries, oppressed with forrow, by his heavy countenance and abundance of teares, more than by words, expressed the cause of his comming : yet in short trained speech, declared vnto him, how that his father, his vnele, with the rest of his cousins, all Princes of great honour, had of late been cruelly murdred by the vnmercifull tyrant Selymus: who with like fury fought also after the life of himselse and his brother, the poore remainders of the Othoman family, who to faue their liues, were both glad to M fly, his brother into Ægypt, and himselfe to the feet of his imperial! Majesty:

Hylmacl moued with compassion, and deeming it a thing well beferming the greatnesse of his fame, to take the poore exiled prince into his protection and to give him reliefe, willed him to be of good comfort, and promised him aid. And the more to affure him therof, shortly after

A gaue him one of his owne daughters in marriage. For it was thought, that if Selvmus for his tyranny become odious to the world) should by any meanes miscarry (as with tyrants commonly falleth out) that then in the Othoman Family, fore shaken with his vnnaturall crueltie. none was to be preferred before this poore Prince Amurat : besides that, it was supposed that if he should inuade him with an army out of Persia, that upon the first stirre, all the lesser Asia mourning for the voworthy death of Achomates, would at once revolt from him, who for his cruelty and shamefull murthers had worthily deserved to be hated together both of God and

Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring Hylmael furnished Amurat his new some in Law with ten thousand horsemen, willing him to passe ouer the river of Euphrates at Arsenga and to enter into Cappadocia, as well to make proofe how the people of that Countrey were affected towards him, as of the strength of the enemy: after whom he sent V sta Ogli, the most famous Chiefetaine amongst the Persians, with twenty thousand horsemen moe, with charge, That he should still follow Amurat within one dayes journey: and he himselfe with a farre greater power stayd behind in Armenia, doubting to want victuall, if he should have led fo great an army through those vast, barren, and desolate places, whereby he must of necess.

Amurat marching through the leffer Armenia, and entring into the borders of Cappadocia, 1514 had divers towns yeelded vnto him by his friends; some others he tooke by force, which he either facked or elfe quite rased; and brought such a generall seare upon the inhabitants of that kill Capadisia, province that the people submitting them selves to him all the way as he went, it was thought he would have gon directly to Amasia, had not Chendemus (an old warlike captain whom Selymus had left for his lieutenant in Asia) with a great army come to meet him at Sebastia, which at this day is called Siuas. This Chendemus had also long before aductifed Selymus both of the preparation and comming of the Persians, as soon as he had learned by his espials, That they were passed the river Euphrates. V pon which news Selymus came presently over into Asia, and commanding all his forces to meet together at Prufa, had with wonderfull celerity leavied thereabout forty thousand common soldiers. Which so soon as Amurat understood, as well by fuch prisoners as he had taken, as by advertisement from his friends, although he was very defirous to have fought with Chendemus, yet doubting that if Selymus (hould with his wonted D celerity come against him, he should be intangled in the streits of the mountain Antitaurus, he retyred backe again to V fla Ogli. But Selymus, who all that yeare had in his hauty thoughts bin plotting some such notable exploit as were worthy his greatnes, standing in doubt whether he should by sea and land inuade Hungary, the Rhodes, or Italy, at that time fore shaken with civill warres, having now so fit an occasion given him by the Persian, to the great joy of all Christendome, converted himselfe wholly to the East, and in thirty dayes march came to selymus resol-Arfenga. Where ioyning his army with Chendemus, when he vnderstood that his enemies hathe Persian. uing harried the country, were again retyred; prickt forward with the griefe of the iniury, and defire of reuenge, with hope of victory he resolued to follow after them foot by foot, and forthwithto enter into Armenia the greater, the principall prouince of the Persian kingdom.

But the difficulties of this notable expedition, which were in Councell propounded by them which had best knowledge of those Countries, were great and many; all which by his owne good hap and inuincible courage, he himselse afterwards ouercame: for the sould iers which had in short time already marched by land out of Illyria, Epirus, and Macedonia, into Cappadocia, must of necessity in this long expedition take vpon them new labours: they were to endure the sharp and pinching cold of the huge mountaine Taurus, and by and by after the most vehement and scorehing heat in the plaines of Armenia the lesser, with extreme thirst, hunger, and most desperat want of all things: and well the more, for that the Persians in their retreat, fooyling the countrey as they went, had veterly destroyed all that might serue for the vie of man, of purpose to leaue nothing to their enemies but want of all things, if they should pursue them: besides that, his most expert Captaines stood in no small doubt of the petty Princes of Armenia the leffe, and the mountaine King Aladules, whom they were to leave behind them at their backs, without any great affurance of their friendship, who they

either in the battell, or for want of victuals, or in the streit passages. For they were to be te. G lieued with victuals from the Armenians; and Aladeules forces then in readinesse, were neither for number nor power to be contemned who also with castles commodiously placed, and fliong garritons, at his pleasure commanded all the freits, passages, and entrances which led out of Capadocia into Armenia and the Persian kingdome: for all the mountaine countries were under his command, and his kingdome stretched from the mountaines called Scodrifci necre vnto Pontus, all alongst the great mountaine Taurus vnto Amanus, which divideth Ci. licia from Syria.

Among st the rest, old Chendemus Viceroy of Natolia, a man of great experience, and of all others in greatest credit, fauour, and authority with Selymus, persuading him to stay a while in Capadocia, and there to refresh his Europeian fouldiers already weary of their long travell, H and to to expect the comming of his enemies. And to perfuade him from the dangerous ex. pedition into Persia, spake voto him as solloweth:

It is not to be thought (most mighty and invincible Emperour, that the Persians are fled for feare, becauje they retyred before they fet eye upon witheir enemies : it is a fineneffe, and they plainely go about to cutrap es, whiles they by flight make a falfe femblant of feare. Know we not what cunning heads, what able bodies Persia breedeth? Will they feare the naked Turkish light horsemen or archers, which with their couragrous barbed horses and themselves strongly armed, feared not the Scythian shot : or (if that be too little) which by their valour have vanquified fo many nations, and gained unto their King fo great and large an Empire ? Thinke you, that you have either greater or better forces than had long age Cal- I filmes your amele, or great Mahomet your Grandfather; who diverstimes proving their forces against this enemy, where more than once put to the worft, I my felfe then feruing in their camps neere unio Trapezond and the mountaines of Nicopolis. I will not deny, but that the great ordnance which you carry with you may fland you in great flead, fo that fit place may be found to bestow so many field pieces in : but this forched ground, the frofen and abrupt mountains, with the wast and solitary plaines beyond them, terreferre, whom all the armed Forces of our enemies in places of great advantage could not difmay. You must fight not only with your valiant enemies, but with the difficulties of nature also. Neither may your Majefix give any credit to the Armenians or Aladaules, Princes of most doubtfull faith: although at your first setting forward they shew a faire face, and seeme nener so friendly: for they will but expect and await fome fit occasion to take you at an advantage, and so to fet voon you when you least fearethem. But K admin you were affured of wittory, o with how much warme blond of your best foul diers shall you buy the the fame? with what other foldiers, with what other forces will you defend Grecia, if the Christian Kings bearing that you for enlarging your Empire, or defire of fame being gone into the furthest part of Armementa, shall in the meane time innade you? Wherefore if it be better and more wifedome, with safety to defend your owne, than with danger to feeke for that is other mens if Princes of greatest policy base repofed the glory of their wictory, not in the greatnesse of the slaughter of their enemies, but in the safety and prescruation of their own foldiers: spare to object your seife and your army to most manifest danger, and anadnifedly to commit all at once to the hazard of good fortune: which being a most tickle and unconflant meffreffe, if the shall but once dally with your dangerous attempts, you shall through your rashnesse infar fhorter space tumble downe headlong from the tipe of so great Majesty, than you have thereunto a L while ago by your rare vertues worthily affired.

Selymus as he was of a rough and fierce nature, so would be have all things done according to his own denice and direction; and though he were not a little moued with this speech of fo grave a counfellor and most expert commander, and saw many of his captaines troubled with the imagination of the future danger; yet in a fume refuting some little of that which Chindenue had faid, he dismissed the Councell, protesting openly, that he would proceed in his intended purpose, hap what hap should, from friend or foe : although that old fellow were (as he faid) so carefull of his life, that he feared to die a noble death. Which Selymus had no sooner faid, but prefently others about him, accustomed to serue his humor, which enused at the glo- M ry and wealth of old Chendemus, tooke hold vpon these words, and beginning with the great-nesse of his forces, the valour of his souldies, the store of his artillery, with his own invincible fortune; made calie matters of all the former difficulties, and with great words labored to exA tenuat al that the grave Baffa had before faid concerning the proweffe and power of the enemy. After that they began to discredit Chendemus; saying, That hee being a martial man, and of known resolution in al his most warlike actions, had not said as before, for want of courage. or any distrust of the victory, but of purpose to hinder that most honorable expedition, and to cut offall hope of victory, (which was, as they faid, as good as already gotten) beeing before loden with Amurats great promises, and the gold of Persia. Wherefore they wished him to beware of the fly old Fox his wyles and treason, and to proceed on in his expedition so much the more boldly; and not to think that his foldiers would refuse any danger or labor so long as they faw courage in himfelf, but would be ready (as they faid) to vindertake the most desperat difficulties of war, and defired nothing more than to be conducted into those far Countries. B where by their martial prowesse & valiant acts they might make their Emperor Selymus could with the Great Alexander, and themselves comparable to his Macedonians. And to work the vttet destruction of this most faithful Counsellor without all recure, these false flatterers suborned bold faced accusers, who falsly and shamefully affirmed, that hee had received great fums of mony of Amuras, and did not therfore in time go against the Persian robbers; wherebvall the former calamities happened (as they faid) in that pronince. For which pretended causes Selymus commanded Chendemus without further hearing to be slain: but indeed to ter- chendemus rificothers from like liberty of speech, and withall to teach them, to deem those devices and Ballaby the counsels as most excellent, which their foueraign should as it were by divine insperation find of selimus slaid of selimus slaid out himself, and so to accept of them without contradiction. The sudden death of this most C faithful counsellor Chendemus strook an exceeding fear into the minds of all men, for that so honorable a personage, of late in so great credit and fauor with his Soueraigne, was without hearing executed; whom they had knowne as a man of great account both for his proweffe and policie, to have flood fast on Selymus side, first in his wars against his father, and of late against his brother: not doubting but that Selymus, by nature cruel, and suspitious even of trifles, would with like tyrannie not spare men of meaner calling, who spared not his dearest and most antient friends.

: Selymus marching from Arlenga, came to the confines of the leffer Armenian kings, and of Aladeules; where by his Embassadors he requested the kings of those nations (who were then in arms) that they would join their forces with his against the Persian, and to go with him in-D to Armenia the great, promifing that when the wars were happily ended, he would give vnto them all such teritory as should chancein those wars to be taken from the enemy, as a reward of their aid. But these poor kings, who hated both Hylmael and Selymus, for the manifold injuries they daily received in the frontiers of their dominions, lying in the midst between them (as it commonly falleth out, that the weakest go the wals) craftily expecting the event of this war, would not openly shew themselues, but answered, That they had taken up Armes for no other purpose but for the defence of themselues and their kingdoms. Not meaning in that doubtfull War to bear themselues as enemies unto either of those two mighty princes their friends and Neighbours, of whose iust gricuances they were not able or worthy to determin; yet if they would without hostilitie, in peaceable manner passe through their Dominions, E they promised to give free passage vnto him and his Army; and after he was entred into Armenia the greater, to relieue him with such prouision of victual as their base countrey could afford.

Selymus thus deceived of this his first hope, (for why, hee thought those poor kings would at the first either for loue or fear haue bin ready to haue done him all the service they could) dissembled his grief for the present, as wholly bent against Hysmael, searing that if he should by worder deed offend those neuter princes, he should have them at his backe his most assured and vindoubted enemies. Wherefore passing the mountaine called Scodrisci, he came in 8 days to the great mountain Moschij, which the samous river Euphrates, with his mighty fiream and hugy broken banks, separateth from the great mountain Antitaurus, & with perpetual steep ridges runneth into Iberia and Colchis, and on the East discouereth Armenia the greater. Here Selymus with enfignes displaied marching alongst the bank of the river, departed not from the same, for fear to lack water in that hot and barren countrey; and so held on his way directly Eastward, leaving the Countrey of Armenia the lesse voon his lest hand, and the frontiers of the kingdom of Aladenles on the right, until he came to the mountain Periardo. This great mountain, famous for the rifing of two great and notable rivers out of it. G is for the wonderful tertulitie of all things, of the barbarous people called Leprus, which is to lay fruitfull: for Euphrates and Araxis there running out of two divers and contrary Marthes with many arms water and inrich that champian and dry country. Selymus having made fo great a journey, and yet not able fo much as by report to vnderstand what was become of Hylmaels to great and populous army, which he knew was but a little before departed out of Cappadocia; as a man in doubt and half afraid, staied and incamped his army at the head of the river Euphrates; and from thence fent out his fcouts every way, if haply they could intercept some which might give them knowledge of their enemies. But the Armenians, whether it were for fear of the Turks comming or that Hysmael their king had so commanded were all before fied out of that part of the country wherby Selymus was to passe with his army; and have H uing fortaken their houses, had carried away with them, or els by fire destroied what soener might ferue for the vse of man.

The Turkith fcours after they had by the space of two daies scoured up & down the country, returned back again to Selymus, not having taken fo much as one man; thewing vnto him. That all things were destroyed before him, and nothing left but wild fields and a most desolar country, without any appearance of man or beaft: and that they were of opinion, that either the Armenian guids were deceived in the way, or els had of purpose brought them into such defait places, wheras wanting pasture for their horses, and food for men, they must needs together perith with hunger. Which their present sear was greatly increased by the weak kings whom they had left behind them at their backs; but especially Aladules, who either for fear I or thame had a few daies at the first holpen the Turks with victuals, but after they were fartherentred into Armenia, performed nothing of that he had before most faithfully promised: tecking therin the fauor of Hy [mael, who he thought would with the fame good fortune vanquish the Turks, that he had not long before the greater part of the East. Selymus perplexed in mind, began now to suspect treason, to fear famin, to dread the desarts and forfaken places, and with grief of mind to call to remembrance all that old Chendemus his faithfull Counsellor had before most truly told him. For all that, he shewed himself to his soldiers with cheerfull countenance, as a man nothing difmaid: which his firm constancy seemed to promise to their discouraged minds good succes, with speedy victory. Wherefore calling vnto him his Guids, and fuch as best knew the country, and understanding by them, that on the right hand & beyond the mountain Periardo lay the most fruitful country of all Armenia, he rose with his army, and compassing the hil toward the North, turned down toward the river Araxes, and about the city of Coy passed his army ouer the river, his sootmenby little bridges, and his horsemen by foords. For Araxes until it have received such rivers into it as fall out of the marshes of Periardo, runneth but with a small streame, and is in some places easie to be pas-

Selymus had scarsly wel got ouer the river and incamped his great army, when V sta Ogli (who having joined his forces with Amurat, lying incamped not far off, and fearing left the City of Coy and the unprouided citisens should by the sudden comming of the enemy be oppressed) quickly role with his army, and let forward to meet the Turkes: for that city of all others in L that country, for fresh fountaines and rivers most pleasant (wherein the Persian kings, for the great plenty of al maner of fruit, & wholfomnes of the air, leaving Tauris, were wont to fpend most part of the summer) had then in it many rich citisens and sumptuous buildings; which Valla Ogh thought good betimes to rescue, and not with dishonour to lose that rich city, loo king as it were voon it; and leaving it vnto the enemy, to fuffer him there to refresh his bunger starued soldiers with plenty of all things. Casimus an Armenian born, and present in those wars, did by many probabilities (as loving writeth) thew unto him; That this city of Coy was in antient time that most famous city which was called Areaxata, which Domitius Corbulo destroicd. Neither did Hysmael himself (although he had but a little before sent the greatest part of his forces against the Coraxeni, who were then risen up against himin rebellion, as one that M made no great reckoning of the Turks, or ever thought that they durst have come so far into Aimenia) make any delay, but forthwith as foon as he had heard of the comming of Selymus, came also in person himself vnto his army.

By chance I fla Oali (who contrary to all mens expectation had till then shunned to sight,

A or come in fight of his enemies, of purpose with lesse danger and losse of men to overthrow them afterward, being fore weakned & almost spent with long trauel & want of victuals) lav then incamped neer the city, when as the Turks feouts, vpon the comming of Hyfmael, perceined by the rifing of the dust, and the neighing of the Persian horses, that some greater power was at hand. Which fo foon as it was noticed in the Turkish Camp, they began to rejoice exceedingly, and to conceive the first hope both of their safety and victory; glad that now meeting with their enemies they should either by victory turn their labor, foil famin, and extremities, wherwith they had a long time friuen, into cafe and plenty of all things, or elfe by honorable death end all their miteries at once. For many of the horfmen, especially of them which came out of Europ, whose horses were started for want of forrage, and the common B footmen frene with long travell, and grieuously troubled with the flix (who travelling in the extream heat of the fun, had for most part lived upon Crabs and other wilde fruits, with a bad supping made of meale and vineger, and almost dispairing to get the sight of their enemies) began now to die in every corner.

Hylmael as soone as he was come within sight of his enemies, reposing great considence as Hylmael sinds wel in the valor of his foldiers, as in his own rare fortune, the more to terrific them, thought it an invalid to good forthwith to give them battel. Wherupon he fent an herald vnto Selymus, accompanied with certain skilful foldiers, which should in best fort they could take view of the number and force of their enemies, of their artillery, and in what fort they lay incamped; and to tell him. That for a femuch as he had no title vnto Armenia, nor that the Turks had at any time claimed C any interest therin, he could not but maruel, why he had against all right entred with his Army into his dominion. But if he haply vpona vain prefumption, to the imitation of Alexander of Macedon, should think so much of the world his own, as he could by his sword & good fortune win, he should then make himself ready against the next day to make proof of his fortune, and the forces of others not inferior to his own.

Wherunto Selyman answered, that the fresh remembrance of the manifold injuries done to Selimun bit anthe Turks by the Persians, was such as might giue him iust cause to take up arms: for a smuch fiver vous thysas long ago, both his grandfather Mahomet the Great, and his Vncle Cassumes, and even of late math his father Bajazet, and he himself also in his wars against his brother Achomates, had received great wrong and dishonor from the Persians. All which things, although they were of them-D felues important, yet he esteemed not of them as sufficient causes of war, but only sought aster his enemy Amaras his brothers son, who had of late spoiled Cappadocia; whom if hee would quietly and friendly deliuer vnro him as the mutual lawes of amity and friendship among princes for the maintenance and preferuation of their estates and kingdoms required, shen he would withdraw his forces, and peaceably return into his kingdome: otherwise, hee threatned with fire and sword to destroy not the frontiers of Armenia, but euen the heart of Persia. And dismissing the herauld, both the armies for that day lay still in their trenches, ex-peding the dreadfull event of battel. The next day Selymus by persuation of his Captaines brought his army into the open field, Theorder of Se. and in order of battel fet forward against his enemies, which lay about two miles off; thinking lymas battell, B that Hysmid a prince of so great name would traightway accept of battel : yet what strength the Persian King was of what number of men hee had, what manner of horsemen, how armed, and with what weapons, he could not certainly learn: for befide that the Perfians are by natute ingentious and fubril, the foldiers generally fo reuerenced and loued Hyfmael their King, that no one was found to have gon from him to the Turk; wheras many revolted from Selymis wifilm, as rewas afterwards learned of the Persian captains.

Selymus, who had at that time 80000 horsmen under his ensignes, placed Chasan Bassa, his lieurenant General of Europ, with his Europeian horfmen in the right wing, and Sinan B. ff. with his Asian horsemen in the left; and before them both the Acanzij, which are voluntary horimen the forerunners of the Turks Aimy, who in hope of spoil follow the Turkes Wars Pout of all countries in the middle battel he placed the Afapi or common foldiers, which bafe and half naked people, as men of little worth or estimation, are commonly thrust into the kont of the Turks battels, to receive the first fury of the enemy, and to blunt their swords, thore than for any other good service directly behind them he bestowed his great artillerie, gatded with 4000 horsemen: last of all followed himselfe with his chosen pentioners and Ianizaries, lanizaries compassed about with smal field pieces and his cariages, as with a double trench : G for he had (as their maner is) so inuironed himselse round with his sadled Camels made saft one to another with long chains, that they stood him in stead of a strong trench, from whence he might speedily relieue any part of his distressed army; and in case of extremitie being in the midft of his ftrength, might as out of a fure fort repres the furious affault of his enemies. He also commanded his footmen in the vauward of his battel, that vpon the approch of the e. nemies horse, they should speedily withdraw themselves aside into two parts, leaving space for the great ordnance which was placed behind them, to play in the middle betweene them. On the contrary part Hylmael, who by the Turkes fugitives understood all the devices of his enemies, calling to him the chief Commanders of his army, thewed wnto them, that there was no doubt of victory, so that they could shunthe sury of the great Artillery: which heassured H them would eafily be done, if when they faw the Turkish footmen divide themselves, they would also in like manner withdraw themselves into two parts, and give place to the fury of the great ordnance : for which purpose he caused two great ensignes to be displaid, wherunto they should at the time appointed retyre; the one for himself and those whom he conducted. the other for V fla ogli and the rest of his army.

Hyfmad (as lovius reporteth) had in his army about thirty thousand horsemen, without any footmen, among whom were ten thousand men at Arms, resolute gennlemen of great expericharacteristic ence, all gallantly mounted upon couragious barbed horses, and themselves brauely armed. both for the shew, and the terror of the enemy, their weapons were a good lance, a sure seimitar, and a horimans mace; the rest were armed with strong cuirasses and head-pieces, & were I either archers on horseback, or els vsed light horsmens staues made of Ash after the Spanish fathion, wher with they fetued at the half staf; as for guns they had none, in which thing only and number of men they were inferior to the Turks. But such was the inuincible courage and noble minds of the Persians, that contemning the huge multitude of their enemies (being in number about 300000) and making no reckoning of their great Artillery, they doubted not with fo few to give them battel.

Hylmael having given the fignal of battel, came on with his Army, exhorting his fouldiors then to remember the honor they had long before gotten in many bartels, and couragiously to follow him their Soueraign, whom they by their worthy feruice and many victories had made the greatest Monarch of the East: telling them, that they should have now to doe but K with naked men, whose weapons were but weak staues and light targets, and their horses little poor jades almost dead with hunger, neuer able to abide the first charge of his valiant men at

On the other fide, Selymus perceiving the comming of his enemies, by the rifing of the dust, caused knowledge to be given through his army by his captains and officers, that the time of battel which they had fo long wished for, was now come; wherin if they would worthily acquit themselues against those their proud enemies, they should to their immortal fame extend the Turkith empire from the Persian sea to the mountain Caucasus. But if they cowardly forgetting their antient prowes, thould faint in time of battel, they were not then to thinke by any means to escape by flight back again thorow those great plains & desolat countries, L where they should by the way either shamefully perish, or els to their perpetual infamy be teken prisoners, and as base slaues, during their lives be inforced to serve the Persian womens for a fmuch as befides the great diffance of place, both the great river Euphrates, and the huge mountain Taurus, and the faithleffe King Aladeules (who had fut yp, all the pallages) did cut off all hope from them if they should be ouercome, by any means possible to escape backet

When Hyfmael was come neer with his Army, and the Afani vnom figne given dividing themselues, made place for the great artillery to play, as was before appointed, hee also no fently dividing his horfmen, charged the right wing of the Turks army with fuch force, that aftera most terrible fight betwixt the half armed Turks, and the valiant Persian men at arms, M Chafan Baffa the great commander of the Europian horimen, with the formost of that Wing being flam, and many more after them, he inforced all that wing to retyre to that place where Selymus himself with the Ianizaries stood. In this hard diffresse Selymus in two places opened his Cartifages wherewith he wood as it were intrenched, and prefently sene our part of his horsmen. And by aid by thirling while see unto his lantzaries lately this dates weltery is referhed (most worthy seldieles) with origin with this later bor : wher ford now validately let forward and as fresh and courne lous men'affaile four weare defeniles theinhorles we all on a water with freat; and the men them felues faint under the both he by he fraither But yet for all that Solomes could fay; the lanigaries were not very forward, but from Mill; as men willing in so great a danger to keep themselves safe within the lafegard of the mithiel on. Wherefore whilefelber at their leffure fet forward, the Perfians in the Midfl of Meheat of this victory, compassing in the Europeian horsmen, slew them downing he still mile in the theath time looking on, and withing in vain to help them. Fabriting Carretting Mafter of the Rhodes, D whoof all thefe things had certain intelligence, writ to Lee the tenth then Biffield of Rome; that the lanizaries refused to be commanded by Selymus, and were not by ally perflassion or infl treaty to be induced to relieue the distressed Europeian horsmen, but as men districting the euent of the battel, chose rather in their strength to expect the succes thereof, than with most manifold danger to expore themselves to the violence of the Persian hotsinen, which had as a tempelt overborn the vantgard of the Turkilly footmen.

The Rossians were now ready on every side to have affailed Selymid in his greatest Atengelis. when siam Baffa, although the wing he led was fore rent and weakned, yet following the Per-flans through the midst of the heaps of the flain footmen, came in, in good time to selyming and with certain fresh troups which had escaped the fury of Pfa Ogli, estored the Warrell, before almost lost : but especially by the inuincible courage of Alis neg and Maliball dis bro! ther, delocated of the honorable family of the Molcozzij, which for nobility among the Turks is accounted next to the othomalist both of them for courage resembling their warlike farher Malcozzius, famous for that wofull expedition hee made into Friuli against the Venetians iff the reign of Bajazer. Selymus also not yet discouraged, but still in hope; commanded all the great ordnance wherewith he was inuironed, which he had referued as his last reftige, to bee discharged : by the violence wherof such slaughter was made as well of his own men as of his enemies, mingled together, that what for deft, what for froke, and thundring of the artillery, having on both fides almost lost the vse of fight and hearing, & their horses being fo terrified with the thundring report of the great ordinance that they were not now to be fuled; the battel was broken off, the victory yet doubtful. Hyfmael in this furious battel having received a wound under the left shoulder with a small and Hyfmael, shot, by persuasion of his friend's withdrew himself to have his wound searched : which thing vadoubtedly was the fafegard both of Selymn & his army: for the Persians by and by following their King, left the victory, now in all mens opinion almost gotten. But after that Hylmad G perceived the wound was not deep, for that the strength of his armor had so broken the force of the shot, that it pierced not far into his body, he was about to have charged the Turkes afresh:but vaderstanding of the death of Vsta Ogli, in whom for his singular experience in mar. tial affaire he had repoted his greatest confidence; and his captains also persuading him, not to make to light seckoning of his wound, the grief wherof he yet felt not, being warm, but to have regard to his own health; he in feemly order foftly marched away in fuch fort, that his departure had no refemblance of flight, And passing by the city of Tauris, willed the chiefof the citilens to exemple gates of the city to Selymus, if he should come thither, and to receive his garrisons, rather than by vain confiancie to fal into etter deftruction and so marched him. felfines the confines of Media, it

But the Turks imangled with many difficulties, having no hearts for fear, nor firength for wearines to purfue their enquies, yet comming to the Perfuen tents took them without refu-Stance; where beside the rich paulions wrought with needle-work of silk and gold, & much other pretions surpicure, many noble Ladies and gentlewomen were found, which after the maner of the Persiane had followed their husbands in those wars, whom Selymus cauled to be all let at liberty votquehad excepting one of the wives of Hylmael, whom he detained & gave her in managerto one of his Baffe's. Some which were prefent at this battel, reported, That among it the heaps of them that were flaine, were found the dead bodies of divers Perlian women, who being armed, and following their husbands, died with them in the battel whom Se-Ismus caused to be honorably buried.

This was that notable battel fought in the Galderan fields, neer to the city of Coy, betwixt thele two great princes, the feuenth day of August, An. Dom. 1514. Inwhich battell Selymus lost aboute 30000 men amongst whom was Chalan Bassa his great Lieutenant in Europ, seuen Sanzacks, in which rege the two Malcozzian brethren, who labouring the one to refeue the other, were both together flain. Beside his common sootmen, of whom he made least account, he loftmoft part of his Illyrian, Macedonian, Servian, Epirot, Theffalian and Thracian horsemen, the vadoubted flour and firength of his army, which were in that mortall battell almost all flain or gricuoully wounded.

selymus for all this great losse, by the confession of his enemies having gotten the victory, and receiving embaffadors from Coy and the Cities therabouts, and the great City Tauris, K promiting to relieue him with what foeuer he needed, and to do what els he should command marched directly to Tauris, defiring both to see and possesse himselfe of that City, as one of the chief palaces of the Persian Kings. This city is two dates journy distant from Coy where the bacted was fought, & is verily thought to be the famous pity called antiently Ethatana, about 150 miles diffant from the Caspian sea. The citisens were ready at the comming of the Turks, and brought them great flore of victuals out of the gity, where Selymus had ladged his army in the fuburbs, thinking it no fafety to lodge within that great and populous City, contenting himself to have the gates therof deliugred vnto him, which he kept with free gard. Some report, That Selgmen durft not truft the Perfians, and therfore neuer went into the City but difguifed in the habit of a common fouldier. Yet some others say, that he did with great L magnificence banquet in the stately palace of the Persian King, and there had great discourse with them of Tauris, concerning his late victory. But whilft be thus flayed at Touris, and with himself purposed to spend that Winter in Armenia, he called together his great Captains and Commanders of his army, to know how they liked therof twho fearing his displeafure, referred themselves to his owne resolution. Onely Affapha his chiefe Baffa chanced to fay, That it were good that the minds of the Janizaries and the other fouldiers of the court should therin be known. Which his speech Selynge took in such euill part, that he presently commanded him out of his fight, and deprined him of his greatest honour. And the more to diferace him, sent one of his jeasters after him, who in great scorne and derision comming behinde him, cut off part of his Tulipant that Jung down as the fashion was. But the Ia- M. nizaries understanding the matter, and much offended with the indignitie which was offered to the preat Baffa, whom they dearly loued, rose, yp all together in arms, and told their empethe self-min flatly, That they would not in any cafe Winter for far from home in the enemies country; and therfore that it ware best for him betime to consider of the matter, for that they

A were resolutely set down to for sake him, if he would needs stay, and not with speed return. Selamus much troubled with this infolencie of the Ianizaries, and hearing daily. That Hylmael withnew supplies out of Iberia, Albania, and Parthia, was comming upon him with greater nower than before, and confidering with all, with what difficulty and danger he had efcaped in the late battel, preserved tather by his good sortune and sorce of his artillery, than the valour and proweffe of his foldiers; and withall suspecting the multitude and strength of the Taurihans, of whose fidelitie he could make no reckoning; he changed his former determination, and refolued again to return into Capadocia. Wherupon having contrary to his promife exaced a great masse of mony from them of Tauris, he departed thence, carying away with him 2000 families, the best artificers in that city, especially such as were skilful in making of Armorand weapons, and so with speed retyred towards the river Euphrates, a longer way than that wherby he came; fearing to return again by the head of Araxis and the mountaines Periardes, for meeting the Iberian and Albanian horsemen, who were reported to be then comming against him.

Hulmael understanding of his departure, followed after with as much speed as hee could, leauing behind him for hast his cariages and such of his soldiers as were not able to endure so long and speedy a march. Yet for all his hast (for a smuch as Selymus was gon a great way before him)he could not ouertake any part of his army until he was come to the great river Euphrates: where Selymus staying two daies, and having made divers little boats, was passing over his footmen: which because they were not sufficient for the speedy transportation of so great a multitude, many for hast swam ouer the river with bladders, and some adventured to get ouer voon the broken pieces of their cariages, which they had for that purpose burst in sunder Selymus himself got ouer to the farther banke in a little boat, having before caused his horsemen with their horses at once to take the river, of purpose to breake the violence of the streame, wherby his footmen and Camels with their burdens got over with leffe danger, and some of his field pieces were also with lesse difficulty transported yet for all his speed, the Georgian borimen, the forerunners of Hyfmaels army, being come within fight before the Turks were al selymum in sofgot over, raised such a sear and stirall alongs that side of the River, that 2000 of the Turkes for the side of the River, that 2000 of the Turkes for the side of the River were in their hasty passage there drowned, divers field pieces lest sticking in the mud, and sineth great much of the baggage caried away with the force of the river. The Georgians contented with 16%. D fuch things were left, pursued them no further : for the wheels of the Turks cariages intan-

gled together with the violence of the stream, had staied a great part of the Turkish trash, floting in the river, and much more was in divers places driven vpon the shore; all which the Georgian hortifien easily drew out. Hyfmael in the mean time rejoicing at nothing more, than that having chased away his enemies, he had also recovered much of the great Ordnance, by which he had before received fo great hurt.

Selymus by speedy flight thus got out of the hands of the Persians, found his passage much more dangerous at the mountain Antitaurus than he had before thought of: for Aladeules the mountain King having now his fortune in contempt, and diligently waiting for his prey, had with his fauage people before taken all the streit passages of the mountain country; who eue-E rynight in theeuish maner affailed the Turks, as they with their weake and weary companies passed through those rough and broken waies, and robbing their earinges, presently fled into their haunts and places of refuge in the thick woods and rocky mountains. Aladules himself in the mean time (by whose fraud all this was don) every day excusing himself, as if it had bin donagainst his wil, by the rude mountain people, inured to such desperat roberies; whom ne uertheles he said he would in short time seuerely chastise, so soone as hee could finde she authors therof. In the meanwhile for fashion fake sending a little spare provision for certaine daies, did cuery night rob and spoil the Turkes by his fouldiers, as they could rake them in places of aduantage. Against which mischiefs selymus could neither by polcie, neither his fouldiers by industry prouide any sufficient remedy. Wherfore diffembling the injuries he F daily received, purposing to be therof in time renenged, together with the foul & trecherous dealing of the faithles king; holding on his way, hewith niuch ado came at length to Trapezond, and from thence to Amasia, where hee spent that winter in repairing his soreweakened response somes army; purposing with the first of the spring to make war voon Aladules and the mountain ped to Amalia.

In this fort tonius, one of the great historiographers of that time, reporteth the aforesaid G wars betwirt Hy (mael and Selymus; whose credit in that matter other Writers have fince for most part followed. Howbeit Io. Ant. Mananinus a Genoay who served in those wars, dothin his book concerning Turkish affaires, dedicated to the French King, much otherwise report of the same. Which to satisfie the desirous reader, I have thought good here in few words to fet down, as it is by himself reported.

Selymus (faith he) with his army, in number about three hundred thousand men, being come to the river Euphrates, found the bridge broken down by his nephew Amurat, and his enemies Ant. Menaulincamped in convenient place on the farther fide of the river, with their forces greatly increafed by new supplies lately sent from the Persian King; so that there was then in the Persian army about 90000 men horse & foot, the horsmen for the most part furnished with two hor. H les apiece for service. And although Selymus did what he might to know whether the Persian King were in person himself in the Camp, or els (which he most feared) was raising of greater forces in Persia; yet could he by no means learn the truth of that he defired. Wherfore repairing again the broken bridge, he first sent ouer his two great Lieutenants, of Grecia and Natolia, who passing ouer the river, incamped themselves as they thought convenient. The next morning, about two hours before the rifing of the Sunne, Amurat suddenly assailed the great Commander of Grecia, Chafan Baffa, in his trenches, and by plain force discomfitted the Turks and by good fortune took from them their tents: wherupon fuch a terror and fear came vpon the other great Commander of Natolia, that his fouldiers thrusting themselues for sear into the river, fwam over with great danger, and again joined themselves with the rest of the army. I Selymus troubled with the great losse thus received, caused all his great artillery to be placed all alongst the hithermost banke of the river Euphrates; and because the enemy should not perceive the same, ranged certain companies of his soldiers before the Ordnance, as if they should presently have passed the river: who ypon signall given should forthwith withdraw themselves and give place to the great ordnance bent vpon the enemy. But when fire was giuen to these great pieces, many of them being ouercharged burst in sunder, and slew divers of the Turks:many alfo of their rich horfes and mules being neer vato the rivers fide, and terrified with the thundring shot, leapt into the river, and were there drowned together with their riders. The Persians also receiving great losse, retyred farther off for fear of the great artillery. So selymus without refistance passing ouer the river, marched forthwith a wards the K enemy; whom the Persians as men nothing dismaid, notably incountred. The battell was of long time doubtfull, and much bloud shed on both sides; and if the approach of the night had not broke off the force of that fight, the Persian army rather ouercharged with the multitude of the enemy, than vanquished by valor, had vindoubtedly received a great overthrow: but by the benefit of the night they without further losse escaped the pursuit of the Turkes. Vpon this victory, Selymus left his cariages and baggage with his footmen; and taking with him only his horimen, fet forward with intention to have vpon the fudden furprifed the regal city Turis, before the fame of the late fought battell could be caried thither; the Persians in the mean time being no leffe carefull of their affairs. The day before, ten thousand men well appointed, which had not yet bin in the battel, were comming to Hylmael. These he craftily L laid in the Turks way, commanding them upon the approch of the enemy, to flie as if it had bin for fear. Selymus in the morning descrying these horsmen at hand, supposing them to be fuch of his enemies as being ouertaken with the darknes of the night, were not able to follow the rest of the Army, exhorted his souldiers couragiously to pursue their discouraged Enemies.

The Persians seeing the Turks, of purpose betook themselues to slight; and they suspecting no deceit, followed fast after them, vntill that about mid-day being weary of the pursuit, and comming vnto a little river that was in their way, there staid to refresh themselves; and after they had taken a short repast, againe pursued the Persians, still leaving behinde them such as were not able to fall to follow, prickt forward with hope, that before night they should fur- M prise and ransack the rich city of Tauris. The Turkish horsmen thus drawn far from the sootmen, the Persian horsmen left in ambush, in the mean time set voon the Turkes sootmen (lying as they supposed in great securitie) and with a great slaughter ouerthrew them: at which time they also took all Selymus his treasure and great Artillery. Which ouerthrow was by

A foeedy posts, about two a clocke in the night made knowne to Selymus (who now in his mind already conceived the facking of Tauris) & withall that the fierce enemy was following him at the heeles. Selymus wonderfully abashed with this vnexpected newes, and the losse of his footmen, forthwith began to retire; which the ten thousand Persians which had before of purnose fled, perceiuing, now turning themselues upon the retiring Turks, charged them hardly: in Selvmus inclosed both before and behind by his enemies, received a great overthrow; and the Turks thus hardly befet, and almost despairing of their lines, and having lost their ensigns hrake out fidewaies betwixt their enemies and fled. Selymus feeing all desperat and forlorne. hetooke himselfe to flight also with the rest and passing the river Euphrates, brake down the bridge which he had but a little before repaired, for feare the Persians should further pursue him, and with much trouble and no leffe danger comming at length to Amafia, affembled this ther the reliques of his discomfitted army. Such of the Turks as remained behind, and were not able in flight to keep way with the rest, were all slaine by the Persians.

The Genoway author thus concludeth his History, That the Persian King did not more reioice at this victory, than did he himfelfe for the ouerthrow of the Turks, hoping in that their fogreat a confusion to free himselse of his long & miserable thraldome, and to find a way vnto his natiue countrey parents; afterwards he did, flying first to Trapezond and there taking passage into Europ, he came to Hadrianople, from thence he travelled by land on foot to Salonica, and there chancing upon certaine thips of Christian Merchants which had brought come thither, he was by them transported into the Island of Chios; from whence he joy fully C teturned to Genoa his native country, after he had among it the Turks endured ten yeres captiuity:most part wherof he lived as a page in old Bajagets privy chamber, and the rest as a soldier of the court in the reigne of Selymus, and therfore well acquainted with the fashion of the

Now shall it not (as I hope) be much from our purpose, here with Ionius a little to digresse incomparing these two great Princes Hysmael and Selymus together, who in that time had filled the world with the glory of their fame: that wearied with bloudy broiles, and the wonderfullchances of war, we may a little repose our selves with matter of a milder vaine, sieither vnpleasant nor un profitable.

These two mighty Princes, as they were for royall descent, strength of body, courage of Selymus and D mind, riches, and power, equall, and had thereby obtained like fame and renowne: fo in condi-pared types in tions and qualities of mind, and martial discipline, they much differed. First of all (beside the mutual hatred of the one nation against the other delinered as it were by succession from their grandfathers and fathers) the setwo Princes, and so likewiso their subjects also, were at great ods about an idle question of their vain superstition, the one preferring & honoring Eububekir, Homari, and Ottoman, as the most true and rightful successors of their great Prophet Mahomet: the other with no leffe deuotion honouring Haly, and detecting the three former; differing otherwise in sew or no points of their most fond superstition: yet did they under the colour and zeale of their religion (as they would have it) both pretend inft causes of war, although their

cuil diffembled ambitious desires, plainly declared vnto the world, that they both shot at one E and the same mark, viz. By confirming their power & strength, to extend the bounds of their great Empires. For Hysmael of purpose affected the same and glory of Darius and Xerxes the antient Persian kings, who having subdued Asia, with great boldnes passed over into Europ: and Selymus the greatnes of Alexander of Macedon, who subuerted the Persian empire. Which their aspiring thoughts, masking under the vaile of zeale towards their religion, seemed not altogether vain; fortune with like indifference immoderatly fauoring their bold ambitious and endlesse desires. But in Hysmael appeared such a wonderful deuotion and grauity, that his hau-Hysmael maiety thoughts were with the reuerend maiesty thereof couered whereas in Selymus, his inhuman line. H. cruelty did blot and obscure all his other princely vertues: for he with reward and punishment retained the maiesty of his empire, but with greater same of security than bounty. Because it was expedient in the exact discipline of that seruile government, wherof the greatest strength of the Othoman empire confifteth, to vie all rigor and feuerity: otherwise then it stood with the state of Hysmael, who leavied alwaies his armies of his Nobilitie and men free borne, with whom temperat justice, civil courtesse, & popular elemency, are of greatest force, to win their fidelity, faith, and loyalty: for that there is no man well borne, which feareth not more the

blemith of infamy than the heavinesse of punishment : so that it was not tobe maruelled, if Q Hylmacl by fuch honorable vertues did mightily defend the glory of his maiesty & renowne. Vitto thete his rare vertues, was also inoyned a comlinesse of face (the fairest gift of nature) well beferming fo great a monarch: for he was well coloured, quick eyed, yellow bearded, and that which among the Persians is accounted the signe of antient nobility, hook nosed; & was withall exceeding eloquent: by which good gifts, he wonderfully woon to himselfe both the cies and hearts of such as beheld him. But in Selymus, his stern countenance, his sterce and pier. cing eies, his Tattar-like pale colour, his long mustacho's on his vpper lip, like bristles, frild back to his necke, with his beard cut close to his chin, did so expresse his martiall disposition and inexorable nature, that he seemed to the beholders, to have nothing in him but mischiese and cruelty. Which diverfity of countenances was also accompanied with no leffe diverfity H of affections, and fo consequently with far vnlike manner of government. For Hysmael was of nature courteous and affable, casie to be seen and spoken withall, doing nothing that beseem'd his regall function, but in the fight of all menthis manner was to dine openly in the company of his nobility, delighting much in hawking and hunting, accompanied with his noblemen and the Embassadors of forraine princes: He would oftentimes run, leap, and proue masteries with his chiefe courtiers, being himfelfe a most excellent horsman and cunning archer: in his exercises he was so popular, that he would not stick openly to bathe himselse and swim in his princely bathes: his wives, the beautifull daughters of his nobility or neighbor princes, ladies of great chastity, he neither loathed nor divorced; after the antient maner of the Persian kings, who alwaies vsed most tenderly to loue and cherish their wives, doing them all the honor postfible in court, as partakers of all their fortune, and carried them, their children, nurles, & richeft furniture into their farthest wars, to their great trouble & charge, by the presence of so deer pledges the more to incourage their minds in time of battell. Whereas Selyman contrariwise did all things in secret, eating his meat alone without any company, attended upon with his pages & cunuchs only, and fatisfying natures want with some one simple dish of meatthe seldome went abroad but to the church, vpon the friday the Turks chiefe Sabboth; and then fo befet with his pentioners and other fouldiers of the court, that although he vied to ride alone mounted upon some couragious horse, yet was it a hard matter by face to know him among so many armed men, who with great pride & infolency kept back the beholders : he was feldom feen abroad in the city, chuling rather for his recreation to passe ouer in his gally to Asia, and K there alongst the sea coast to take the aire his wives he would not suffer to come to court, neither yfed their company but for procreation fake, and that (as was thought) without any great good countenance or familiarity for that he being not greatly given to women, but more delighted with vnnaturall pleasure, thought a mans body and minde to be not a little weakened with the allurements of women wherefore he feldome reforted to the cloifter of choice paragons in the midst of Constantinople, thut in on every fide with high & blind wals: those dainty pecces, either taken from their Christian parents, or by chance surprised by pirats, are there most curiously kept by antient matrons and old eutuchs, by whom they are with all diligence instructed in the principles of the Mahometan law, and to read the Arabian tongue, and withall, cunningly and comely to fing, play, dance, and fow: but Selymus of allothers vsed seldomest L to fee their allurements, as a man not greatly delighted with women, or defirous of many (and oftentimes vnfortunat) children; having but one fon (Solyman) by the daughter of Mahamet a Tartar king, who afterwards by the sufferance of God, proued a great plague to the Christian commonweale. Such spare time as he had from his serious & weighty affairs, he vsed to spend in walking in his gardens with some of his Bassacs or other great courtiers, and in beholding and noting the Noblemens children there sporting themselves, would discourse and consult of many things of great importance. Some houres he would spend in the bathes, and in reading the Historics of his Ancestors and other forraine Princes: imitating therein his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who caused almost all the Histories of the famous Princes of the world to be translated into the Turkith language, and their lively counterfeits to be with cun-M ning hand drawne, that by their worthy examples he might be the more inflamed to extend his fame and glory. He would many times scoffe at the great busines of his father BaiaZet, who (as he faid) was fodrowned in the fludy of Auerrois (determining nothing certainly of the nature of the foule) and the motions of the heavens, that he defired rather the name of a sharp

A disputer amongst the idle professors of Philosophy, than of a renowned chiesctaine amongst his valiant foldiers and men of war.

One of the Persian embassadors finding him pleasantly disposed, demanded of him, why he did not weare his beard long, as his father Bajazer, and other great princes of that age had don, therby to feeme vnto their subjects of greater majesty: to whom he answered. That he liked not to carry about with him such an vanecessary handfull, whereby his Bassaes might at their pleasure lead him vp and downe the court, as they had done his father:noting therby, that B4jazes whilest he yet lived, had bin too much overruled by the Bassacs, which he could by no means indure, following no mans aduice but his own in what focuer he tooke in hand

But to come vnto the Persians themselves, they in their wars had great disaduantage of the Turks: for as they were strong in horimen, so were they destitute of expert trained footmen. by whose only means the Turks have atchieued their greatest victories, and performed their greatest wars. Beside this, it was a great want in the Persians, that they had not the vie of guns. against whose fury no sufficient resistance can be made, or force of man opposed : as appeared by the lamentable example of V sun Cassanes at Arrenga, and now of Hysmael in the Calderan felds, whose victorious armies of horsemen were both places put to the worse by the terror and violence of the Turks artillery. For the naked Turkish horseman is not to be compared The Persians with the Persianman at armes; who comes into the field armed with a strong cuiras, a sure better borsemen head-picce, and a good targuet: whereas the Turkish Europeian horsemen, altogether naked, vse onely a square or crooked buckler, wherewith they do scarcely couer themselves and the Afan horsemen, bucklers made of fost reeds, wound round, and covered with some kinde of filke. The Perfian horsemen also, wearing their pouldrons and gaunt lets, and bearing staues of goodsilh, armed at both ends, fight with them as occasion ferueth at the halfe staffe, after the maner of the Numidians; and with doubling and redoubling their often thrusts from on high, do eafily wound or kill the vnarmed Turks, with their horfes ; whereas the Turkish horfemen, after the manner of the Grecians, couching their staves in their rests, do at the first course most commonly breake the same, being made of light and brittle firre, and so presently come to their seimitars or horsemans maces, being in all other things far inserior to the Persian man starmes. As for the Turkish archers on horsebacke, they are in no respect to be compared with the Persians, who well mounted and furely armed, and vsing both greater and stronger D bowes, shoot more deadly arrows, and so make small account of the Turks. So that all things well confidered, the Perfian army, denoted to their King, as well for the great and firme opinionconceiued of his high courage and diuine spirit, as for that they were to him by faith obliged although it was in number far inferior, yet had it bin of the Turks inuincible, if it had not bin ouerwhelmed by the cruell, cowardly, and murthering artillery, and wonderfull multitude of men. The cause why Hysmael out of so many great and large provinces then under his The cause why Obeisance (able in antient times with their multitude to couer the face of the earth, & to drink Hysmal came the rivers dry) brought now so small an army against the Turkish Emperor, breaking into the army against heart of Armenia, was, for that Hymael to win the hearts of the people by bounty, had remit- Selimus. ted a great part of his customes and tributes, so as then stood best with his policy, having but lately aspired to the kingdome, and thrust downe his neere kinsinen, the posterity of Vsur-Caf-Jan and Iacup, the rightfull inheritors thereof: so that his coffers being empty, and wanting mony, the finewes of war, he was not able to raife fo great an army as otherwaics he might out of those populous kingdoms & countries, yeelding plentifully all things necessary for mans vie. Whereas with Selymus it was far otherwise: whose horsemen, sootmen, captaines, canoniers, both at fea and land, officers of peace and wars, received their daily wages and monthly paies in ready mony, of his treasurers and paimasters: for defraying of which charge he neuer wanted coyne, having an inestimable masse of mony alwaies in store in the scuen towers at Conflantinople: and his yerely tributes and revenues still exceeding all his charges by a fourth part. The firength of the Persian King consisted in three kind of soldiers: the first were they F which were accounted fouldiers of the court: the fecond, fuch as were by custome and duty bound to serue him in his wars : and the third, such as were fent to him from the Princes his neighbors and confederats. Those which were accounted soldiers of his court, had their certain stipends, and were altogether maintained of the kings charge; of whom, according to the

and wages, cuery one as he is in place and degree. And being attended upon with a gallant and c frong garrifon of these, he maintained the majesty of his court, especially when he rideth in progresse. The nobility and antient gentlemen of his country, who hold lands and possessions discended vnto them from their ancestors, or holden by the gift of the King, are sent for in time of wars, and are of duty bound to performe such like service as the nobility and gentlemen of Italy, France, and Spaine do vnto their foueraignes: these hardly amount to the number of twenty thousand, whereof it is well if the third part come well armed; the rest content themselves with head pieces and jacks, and vie for their weapons either horsemens stayes or bowes, which they can most cunningly handle, discharging their arrows very neere vnto than they aime at, either forward or backeward. They which come vnto him from forrein Princes, confederat or tributary, are commonly fent from the kings and princes of Iberia, Albania, and H the countries bordering vpon Media and Armenia; who being halfe Christians; beare a mor-The countries tall hatred against the Turkes. Hylmael the Persian King had then under his dominion these great and famous countries, Armenia the greater, Sulthania, Persia, Assyria, Mesopotamie, Media and Parthia: wherof Armenia is the chiefest, famous for the great city Tauris, called in antient time Ecbathana: this country yeeldeth vnto the Persian King his best sootmen; but his choice horsemen come from out of Persia, and especially from Scyras, called of old Cyripolis: the next vnto them are from Affyria; the chiefe city wherof is Bagadat, called in antient time Babylon. The Medes and Parthians are of all others accounted the best archers next year to the Scythians. ...

But now to returne againe from whence we have a little too far straied. Salymu after his I great expedition against Hysmael, wintering at Amasia, by his lieutenants and captains in Europe and Asia raised such a power, that with the first of the Spring he entered againe into the with into 41. confines of the Persian kingdome, with a greater army than before, and that somewhat somer than the extreame cold of that part of Armenia (subject to the snowie mountaine Taurus) would either well suffer, or that the enemy thought it had beene possible for him to have so done. There was voon the further fide of the river Euphrates a strong towne called Clamaffum, scituate a little aboue that place where the river Melas (much celebrated by the Grecian Poets) falleth into the river Euphrates; which towne for the commodious scituation therof, standing upon the first entrance of the passage into Armenia the great, the Persians had furnithed with a strong garrison: this towne Selymus thought good in any case to be master of $ by taking wherof, and of some other holds thereabout, he should open a faire way for himselfe into his enemies country. Hyfmael at the same time was gone with all his power against the Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and other fauage people dwelling neere unto the Caspian sea, then up in arms against him:which wished opportunity Selymus taking, and making a bridge over the river Euphrates, passed ouer with his army, came before the towne, and laid hard siege to the fame before his enemies were all aware of his comming. The Turks at their first approch compassing the city round with their huge multitude of harquebusiers and archers, braue the desendants from the wals ; and still without rest or intermission bringing on fresh men, as Selymus had before taken order, and others at the same time breaking open the gates, and in diuers places scaling the wals, enforced the defendants to forsake their standings, and to retyre I themselues into the market place, where although they were before fore spent with labor and wounds, yet did they there with wonderfull courage a great while notably with stand the multitude of their enemies still swarming in, and in desence of their country, like resolute men, fought it out vnto the last man.

Selymm having taken and ranfacked Clamassum, with two other small castles which the defendants had for feare before abandoned, although he was with a deadly hatred and ambitious defite prickt forward against Hysmael, and thirsting after nothing more than the subversion of the Persian kingdome : yet he thought it not good to enter further into Armenia, before be had out of those forrests and mountains chased the mountain king Aladeules, who but the yere before had most trecherously done him and his army so many injuries in his return from the M Persian expedition, iFor Aladeules not without cause searing his owne estate, as soone as he vnderstood that Selymus had againe taken the field, and that he was come to the river Euphrates, and fo to Clamassum. speedily assembling his forces, had in short time raised a great army for the defence of himselfe and his Kingdome : purposing that if Selymus should goe farther

A into Armenia, then after his wonted maner to looke on as a beholder, and by the cuent of the war, to take occasion of proy; and by shutting up the passages of his country, at his pleasure to tob and spoile the Turks in their returne. Wherefore Selymus leaving a garrison at Ciamasfum, retired backe againe ouer the river Euphrates vnto the mountaine Antitaurus, where it was reported that his enemies lay.

This Aladeules (as is aforefaid) ruled ouer the rude and fauage mountaine people, inhabi. Aladeules his ting the great mountaines Taurus and Antitaurus : which mountaines as it were linked together one to another, run from the moantains called Scodrisci, and the borders of Capadocia. with a perpetuall rifing, through many large provinces and countries vnto the great mountain Amanus, and vetermost bounds of Cilicia. The people of this country were by nature fierce and warlike, more famous for nothing than for the want of all things; who as men dwelling in a rough and bare country, could little or nothing profit by husbandry: yet in fuch places as would be are any pasture, they had their breed of horses and cammels, and did with all dilizence vie grafing; but the greatest part of their living confisted in hunting and stealing. These are supposed to have had their beginning from the Galatians, Capadocians, Armenians, and the old inhabitants of A sia the leffe, which by long and continual wars in sormer ages, and efpecially by the lamentable irruption of the Scithians, were inforced to for fake their cities and dwellings, and for fafegard of their lives to fly into those rough and desolat mountains. These distressed neople searching every hill and every dale, and following the opportunity of the rivers and fountains, but especially the mildest temperature of the aire, and favourable aspect C of the Sun, built in many places poore country villages, and afterwards divers faire townes: where in processe of time they growing to better estate, there rise up some among st them. which ouerruling the rest, ambitiously tooke vpon them the name of kings, defiring to be had inregard, and to be feared of their neighbours, although they commanded but over rough woods and ragged rockes. Neere vnto the confines of Aludeules kingdome is the city Orpha. which many suppose to haue bin the famous city Edessa, because that as yet there remaineth certaine monuments of Baldwin in Latine letters; who after his brother Godfrey was possessed of lerufalem, is reported to have taken Edeffa, and there reigned. Not far from thence is also theantient city Amyda, which at this day is called Caramida, joyning vpon Mesopotamia: which country lying betweene the two great rivers Euphrates and Tygris, is now called Di-D arbecha. The chiefe city of Aladeules kingdome was Maras, fo called as may be thought of the faire river Marsias running through it out of the mountaine Calene, taking the name of Mar-

sia, ouercome by Apollo, and made famous by the verses of many learned Poets. But Aladeules, after he faw that Selymus with his army was entered into the frontiers of his kingdome, and drawing neere unto him, brought downe all his horsemen, in number about fifteene thousand, from the mountaines into a faire large valley; commanding his footmen wherof he had great flore, to keepe the mountaines on the right hand and the left: where having the high rocky mountains and streit passages much for his advantage, he determined in that place which he had long before chosen and fortified to expect the comming of his enemies. Selymus considering the disaduantage of the place, although he perceived the victory could not without great

E losse of his men be obtained; and before persuaded that his enemies would never have willingly beene drawne to battell: yet made no doubt to aduenture his fortune, prefuming vpon the multitude and strength of his army. Wherefore he commanded Sinan Baffa the Eunuch (whom he had made generall of the Europeian horsmen in stead of Chasan Bassa before slaine) with a square battell to charge the enemy afront, for a smuch as the place would not suffer selymus again him to range his battell in length, nor to vie any wings: and he himselfewith his Ianizaries with atadeuter. and Asian horsemen followed after in the tereward. Neither were the soldiers of Aladeules vnmindfull of themselues and their king, who valiantly sought in the head of the battell, but ha-

uing spent their arrowes, did couragiously receive the furious assault of the Turks : and standing close to them, still keeping the advantage of the ground, did with such force repulse F them, that the old beaten foldiers of the Turks seemed little or nothing to prevaile either with their multitude or valor: for the Turks by reason of the streightnesse of the place, could not inclose them on either fide, and were beside grieuously wounded by Aladeules sootmen, who standing upon the sides of the hils, with their darts and arrowes from aboue, ouerwhelmed the Turks in the valley. When Selymus faw that Aladeules, contrary to his expectation, made strong resistance, and valiantly withstood his forces; he drew certaine companies of har- G quebusiers out of his owne squadrons, and sent them to relieue their fellowes; and at the same inflant commanded the languaries for all the danger to mount the hill. Then the mountaine people terrified with the firangeneffe of the flor, and not able to abide the force thereof, by and by turned their backs, and by knowne waies fled into their fure haunts, in the mountaines and woods fast by, yet the greatest slaughter fell amongst these footmen, who when they saw the horsemen put to flight, and the Ianizeries comming vp the hils against them, did with much difficulty, by steepe and broken waies clamber vp the high mountaines: as oftenrimes it falleth out, that both the strength of mens legs and other their wonted forces faile them the sale pass most, when surprised and ouercome with sudden seare, they defire to run and fly fastest. The Turks having them in chase, had the killing of them vntill the going downe of the Sun. The H horfmen with the King, vpon their fwift horfes, well acquainted with those rocks and rough waies, with little loffe retired themselues into the further and stronger places of the mountains,

Aladeales after this discomfiture, finding himselfe in all things far inseriour to his enemy, thought it best by protracting the war, to weary him out: wherefore as the Turks pursued him, and burnt the poore country cottages standing in their way, he still fled from mountaine to mountaine, neuer offering battell or shewing himselfe, but in places of great advantage : and therefore Selymus fearing left in that barren rough and vnknown country, he should either want victuall, or by some other means be intrapped, if he should still with the whole army follow after his strong enemies supon the seuenth day left off to pursue him any further. And encamping himfelfe in the most convenient place of that country, fent Sinan Bassa with his light I horimen, who carrying with them certaine daies victuals, should still at the heeles follow the enemy, and with all speed & policy possible hunt after the king himselfe. Selymus in the meane time curiously inquiring of the country captines after the strength of Aladeules, and what means he had to maintaine the war; found, that he had taken with him his best men both horse and foot; and had commanded the country villages to forfake the villages, of purpofeto leave all defolate to the enemy; and having furely intrenched himselse vpon a certaine strong tocke (whither he had before conneied great store of pronision) was resoluted not to give battell vuto his enemies, untill he had drawn them into the impregnable freits of the mountains, where their hugy multitude should little auaile them, but to increase their owne losse. Another cause there was also (as they said) for that he feared to be betraied by Alis Beg his kinsman, & Generall of his horsemen; who first fled in the late battell; whose vnfaithfulnesse and batied might seeme to proceed of a just ground, for that Aladeules had in former time trecherously murthered his father, vpon a jealous suspition of his aspiring vnto the kingdome.

Selymus vinderstanding all this, caused the captines to have their yons struck off, and in stead of their gyues lading them with gifts and promifes, fent them to Alis Beg with fecret letters and rewards, to persuade him in so fit a time to reuenge his fathers death; which thing if he would perform by some notable exploit vpon Aladeules, he should both purchase vnto himselse great credit with Selymus, and also the kingdome. These homely messengers according as was ginen them in charge having imparted the matter to Sinan Bassa, within a few daies had so wrought, that Alis beg (whom the desire of a Kingdome together with Selymus his rewards L prickt forward to feeke reuenge) was eafily drawne to joyne hands with Selymus. And when he could no other way hurt Aladeules, who mistrusting all things, warily looked vnto himselfe, he found the means to go ouer to Sinan Baffa, carrying after him a great part of Aladeules his best horsemen: by whose meanes the rest also which remained being with rewards corrupted, one company after another came at last all ouer vnto the Bassa. Aladeules circumuented with this vnexpected trechery, which neuer before thought it possible that his men should all so fuddenly haue forfaken him and revolted to the Turks, was now glad to repose all his hope in tecret flight. But Sinan Baffa & Alis Beg, hardly purfuing him as he fled thorow the mountains, hiding himselie in rocks and the thick woods, at last drew him out of a caue, being betraied by Assessing to the country peafants. Aladeules being brought to Selymus, was within a few daies after put to M tes cobineith death, & his head in great derision afterwards carried about thorowall Asia the lesses and afterward by way of barbarous oftentation, fent by Selymus to the Senat of Venice, as a loathfome testimony of his victory. Aladeules thus dead, Selymus reduced all his kingdom to the form of a pronince, which he divided into three parts, & after the maner of the Turkish government, appointed to enery part a Sanzacke: yet fo, that Alia Reg should be chiefe ouer the rest, with such foueraignty, as that he wanted nothing of a King but the name only. And for the better gopernment of all things in that new gained kingdome, he left Sinan Baffa there all the rest of that Summer; with commandement, that after he had fet all things in good order, he should winter at Iconium; and he himselfe with a small traine returned to Constantinople, for he had heard that whilest he was busied in his wars against Hysmacl and Aladeules in Armenia, that the Hungarians had made divers incursions into Servia, and spoiled that country. Wherfore for feare of losing Samandria (which standing neere to Danubius, for the convenient scituation thereof is reputed the bulwarke of Seruia and Thracia (he fent Ionuses Bassa, then Governour of Bolina, with eight thousand horsemen, who passing the river Savus entered into Croatia as selumin intrafaras Catinum: and at the same time transported another army ouer Danubius into Hungary, deb Hungary. to the intent that the Hungarians at one instant befet with double danger, should be inforced to feare their owne State, and withall to shew vnto the World, of what strength and power the Othoman Emperours were. Deeming it to concerne much, both for the present, and the time to come, to the daunting of the Christians; if he should by his happy attempts make it knowne, that hee could at once casily and readily maintaine so many and so puis. fantarmies, and wage fogreat warres in divers parts of the World, and so far distant one from

In the end of the yere, when he had thus with double invasion troubled the Hungarians, he frent the Winter following at Hadrianople and Constantinople, in making of greater preparation for war than euer he had before from the beginning of his reigne. For he was aduertised, that the great monarchs of the North his neighbors, namely, Maximilian the Emperour. Vlads llaus King of Hungary, and Sigismundus King of Polonia, with the Princes of Germany, had combined themselues together to make war voon him. But after he had learned by his fure intelligencers (whom he had with great charge fent into all parts of Europe, diligently to observe what was done in the courts of these great princes) that all the great meetings of the Christian Princes proued nothing but glorious words and sumptuous banquets, he being rid of that vaine feare (God so appointing) turned himselse and all those his wonderfull preparations againe toward the East, to the great quiet of Christendome in generall.

Yet lest happily in the absence of himselse and of his armies, the Christian Princes might take occasion to inuade his dominions, he strengthened the frontiers of his empire with most strong garrifons: and left his sonne Solyman (who afterwards proued the scourge of Christendome) at Hadrianople with a strong power, and Pyrrhus Bassahis tutor (a man of great wisedome and gouernment) at Constantinople. This great Bassa was of Cilicia, a natiue Turke borne, which was a thing accounted strange, for a smuch as the great Bassacs were alwaies chofen of the Christian bloud. After that, he fent Cherseogles (whom of all others he most trusted) with his army into Bythinia, and made Zafferus an Eunuch Admiral of his nauy, which he had but a little before built, and with a wonderfull labour and charge rigged forth. Then staying a few daies at Constantinople to see the young souldiers, but then chosen Ianizaries, he de 1516 parted thence and went to his old army, lying with Sinan Baffa at Iconium, purposing to have Selymus each againe inuaded the Persian.

When he was come thither, he vnderstood that Campson Gaurus Sultan of Ægypt (with a great army leuied in Ægypt and Iudea) was come into Syria; giving it out that he would aid the Persian king his confederat, & with al hostility enter into Cilicia, if Selymus should farther proceed to inuade Hysmael the Sophi his friend & ally Selymus perplexed with these news, and fearing that if he should once passe ouer the river Euphrates, Campson lying so neere in readinesse, should forthwith break in at his back into Asia by the mountain Amanus, and so indanger that part of his dominion; staied at Iconium, and sent his embassadors with great presents to Campfon to pacifie him if it might be. The chiefe men in this embassage were the Cadelescher, a man of great account among it the Turks, and of them exceedingly reverenced for the opinion they had of his great knowledge in the Mahometan superstition, who afterward wrot the commentaries of this war; and Iachis a great captaine. The scope of whose embassage was, to intreat Campion, that he would not hinder or disturbe Selymus from making war vpon the Persian King; who had so often and so forcibly inuaded his dominions in Asia, and by bringing in a new forme of fuperstition, had corrupted and altered the most certain grounds of the Mahometan religion. And if they found him resolutely set downe and not to be by any con. G ditions remoued, then with all possible diligence to learne his strength and farther designes. fo far as by any meanes they could, and with all foeed to make their returne.

Mamainter.

But Camplou now far spent with age, and living in the height of worldly bliffe, although ha and campion knew it fitter for him at those yeres to give himselfe to ease and quietnesse, than to thrush him felfe into wars and other princes quarrels; yet thought this expedition to be for many cathlet both goo! and necessary. First, he deadly hated the man for his inhumane cruelty, and there. fore could never be perfuaded to renew the league with him which he had in former time made with his father Bajazet: besides that, he desired to abate and represse his audacious infolency, growne already by his prosperous successe beyond the bounds of reason : for Selvenu hauing taken Yauris, ouerthrowne the Persians, and flaine Aladenles, began now to seeme terri. H ble to all the Princes that bordered voon him; and there were many which faid he was ano. ther Alexander, who whilest other Princes sate still as men asleepe, did in the meane time plot in his victorious mind, the Monarchy of the whole World. But about all things, the feare of the losing of Syria, and consequently the losse of all his kingdome (the quickest motive for flirring up of the fulpitious minds of the greatest Princes) most inforced Campson to take in hand this war: for as much as the goodly kingdomes of Ægypt, Iudea, and Syria, oppressed with the intollerable gouernment of the proud Mamalukes, and therefore leffe faithfull to the Agyptian kings, were in danger to revolt to the Turks, if the Persians should by any mif. chance or fortune of war be of the Turks vanquished. For which cause Campson in the beginning of this war, folicited by the Persian Embassadors, had made a firme league and confedera. I tion with Hyfmacl; and also moved with the misery of the wofull yong Prince Aladin the son of Achomates, was in mind persuaded, that the cruel Turkish tyrant might by his and the Perfian kings forces, easily be thrust out of his empire in Asia and Europe. For Aladin, who after the death of Achomates his father, fled to Campfon the Sultan of Ægypt (as is before declared) had lived three yeres as a forlorne and distressed Prince in the Agyptians court, and by all means he could deuise incited the Mamalukes to reuenge the injuries and cruelty of his vnele Sclymus. The eldest son also of the late King Aladenles, a goodly yong Prince, having at once lost his father, his kingdome, and whatsoeuer he had else, was in good time fled to the Ægyptian king, and had so filled the minds of all men with the indignation and detestation of se-Ismus his exceeding cruelty, that the Princes of the Mamalukes of their owne accord came to K Campion, humbly befeeching him to take vpon him to just a war : and if by reason of his great yeres he should thinke himselfe vnable to indure the trauell thereof, it would then please him yet to give them leave of themselves to take the matter in hand, for the repressing of the infolency of that great and wicked tyrant.

These Mamalukes far excelled the Turks, not onely in strength of body, skilfull riding, and be order of the goodly armor, but also in courage and wealth. Beside that, they had not forgotten with what small power they had under the leading of Caitbeius their great Sultan, ouerthrown the Turks great armies in Cilicia, first at Adena, and afterward at Tarsus, where they tooke prisoners, Atefites Paleologus the great Baffa, and Cherfeogles, Bajazet his fon in law : by which victory they grew into such a proud and vaine conceit of themselues, as if they had bin the onely souldiers L of the World, able of themselves to vanquish and overcome whomseever they should set vpon. These so valiant soldiers, were for most part of the poore people called in antient time Geta, Zinchi, and Bastarna, borne neere vnto the Euxine sea and the sens of Moeotis, especially on that side where the river Corax falleth into the Euxine sea: which Country is of later time called Circassia, of the people called Cercitæ neerevnto Cholchis. These miserable and wretched people, the Valachians, Podolians, Polonians, Roxolanes and Tartars, dwelling by Taurica (pulled from their mothers breasts, or by other violent meanes surprised) were sold to Merchants; who culling out the best for strength of body, or aptnesse of wit, conneied them by fea to Alexandria, from whence they were continually fent to the great Sultanof Ægypt: & by his appointment were at Caire (after the old maner of that people) deliuered to M Masters of sence and such other teachers, who carefully instructed them, being thut up in their schooles, in all manner of seats of activity: where after they were become able to bend a strong bow, and taught cunningly to shoot, leape, run, vault, ride, and skilfully to vie all manner of weapons, they were then taken into pay, and received into the number of the Kings

A horsemen or Mamalukes; and such of them as proued cowardly or vnapt, were made slaues vnrotherest. So that they seeing all honor, credit, and preferment, laied up in martiall prowesse. did with all diligence and courage imploy themselves to military affaires, and therin so well profited, that oftentimes they which at the first were but bare and base slaves, of the meanest of the Mamalukes, by many degrees of service rise at length to the highest degrees of honour. All these Mamalukes were the children of Christian parents, from the time of their captiuity instructed in the Mahometan superstition: for no man borne of a Mahometan father, or of a lew, could be admitted into the number of the Mamaluke horsemen: which was so streitly observed, that the honor of a Mamaluke horseman neue descended vnto the sons of the Mamalukes, yet might they by law inherit their fathers lands, possessions, and goods: by which reason the sonnes of the Sultans themselves never succeeded their fathers in the kingdome. Hereby also it came to passe, that many Christians of loose life, or condemned for their notorious offences, flying thither, and abjuring the Christian religion, and suffering themselves to be circumcifed, being men meet for the wars, grew by degres to great honor : as did Tangarihardinus the some of a Spanish mariner, who by his forwardnesse and industry grew into such credit and authority with Campion the great Sultan, that almost all things were done by his aduice and counfell, and was divers times by him emploied in most honorable service, being fent Embaffador both to Bajazet the Turkish Emperor, and to the State of Venice, about matters of great importance. Yet his impiety escaped not the hand of God, for at length by the cany of the court he was brought into differee, thrust out of his place, and cast into prison, where he, loaded with cold yron, most milerably died. Neither was it to be maruelled if the Mamalukes were growne to that excesse of wealth, forasimuch as the Ægyptians and Syrians being miserably by them oppressed, were not suffered to have the vie either of horse or armor, neither admitted to any matters of counfell; but being impouerished and brought low with heavy impositions and daily injuries of the Mamalukes, gave themselves wholly to the trade of merchandife, husbandry, and other mechanicall occupations: ouer whom the Mamalukes had power and command, as imperious mafters ouer their feruants, and would with greater infolcincy than is to be believed abuse the country people, beating and spoiling them at their pleasure; and not so contented, rauishing their wives and daughters without redresse. The Ægyptians (a people in antient time much renowned for their valour and prowesse) were by these masterfull slaves kept in this miscrable thraldome and slavery about the space of three hundred yeres. For after the declination of the Romane Empire, that rich country falling into the government of the Constantinopolitan Emperors, the Ægyptians soone weary of the proud and auaritious fouereignty of the Greekes, called in the Sarafins, by whose helpe they expulsed the Greekes, and after chose the Generall of the Sarafins for their King, after whose name the Ægyptian Kings were of long time called Caliphes, as they had of antient time bin called by the names of Pharo and Ptolemey. The last of these Caliphes reigned at such time as the Christians under the leading of God- The imperious frey and Bohemund, passing as conquerors through Asia and Syria, crected the kingdome of Ierusalem. He being inuaded by Almericus sixt King of Ierusalem, and finding himselfe too in Egyp, suda E weake, praied aid of the Sultan of Syria, who fent him Sarraco, a valiant captaine, with a frong and Syria. power to aid him , but Sarraco no lesse vnfaithfull than couragious, trecherously slew the Caliph, in whose aid he came, and tooke vpon himselfe the kingdome. After Sarraco succeeded Saladine his brothers fon, who veterly extinguished the name and authority of the Caliphes in Egypt, whom Sarraco had yet left as high Priests. This Saladine oftentimes vanquished the Christian armies in Syria and Iudea, and at length quite ouerthrew the kingdome of Ierusalem, as is in the former part of this History to be seen. Saladine dying, left the kingdome of Ægypt to his brother, whose posterity successively reigned of long time there, vntill the time of Melechfala. This Melechfala (last of the free borne Kings, and of the posterity of Saladine) had great and mortall wars with the Christians, wherein having lost most of his best fouldiers, and reposing no great confidence in the Ægyptians, thought good to strengthen himselse with a new kinde of fouldiers, meere flaues bought for mony. For at that time the Tartars breaking into Armenia and Cappadocia, and ouerrunning the people called Comani joyning vpon Cappadocia, made generall spoile of that people, as of prisoners taken by law of armes. Of this base people, Melechsala for a little mony bought a great multitude, which he transported into Ægypt, and furnished them with armes: by whose prowesse he not only desended the G frontiers of his kingdome, but also besieged Lewis the French King in his trenches not fatte from Camiata, called in antient time Heliopolis, or Pelusium, and shortly after in plaine battell tooke him prisoner, as is long before declared. But in the pride of this victory, Melechiala was by the conspiracy of these his new soldiers slaine; in whose place they set up one Turque. minim, a desperat fellow of their owne company, honouring him with the title of the great Sultan of Ægypt. Turqueminius of a base slave now become a great Monarch (after the maner of men) forgetting his old companions which had so highly promoted him, and having them in great disdaine, was by one of them (called Clotho) suddenly slaine, for which face he was by those base soldiers, his companions, chosen Sultan in his place: who for the short time of his reigne did much for the confirming of that feruile Monarchy: yet was he at length flaine H also by Bandocader, sometimes one of his fellow servants, who also succeeded him in the kingdome. After him in long order fucceeded many valiant men of the same service state and condition, who for breuity I wittingly paffe ouer. Amongst the rest Captheius (of whom we have before spoken in the life of Bajazet) was for wealth and martiall prowesse most famous, who according to the manner of his predecessors, did with greater bounty and care maintaine that feruile gouernment, than any of them who had before him reigned in Ægypt: and was for his notable gouernment and noble acts justly accounted amongst the greatest Princes of that age, After whose death great troubles arose in that seruile Monarchy about the succession. Wherby the Mamalukes drawne into divers factions, some seeking to preser one, and some another, had in foure yeres spacewith civilewars foreweakned their estate, and slaine divers of their I greatest Princes which had aspired unto that kingdome. For appeasing of which mischieses, tending to the veter ruine of their kingdome, the great courtiers and chiefe men amongst the Mamalukes with one confent offered the kingdome to Campson Gaurus, or as the Turks call him, Canfaues Gauris, of whom we now speake; a man of great integrity and courage, and altogether free from ambition. He, terrified with the dreadfull example of fo many Kingswhom he had feene in short time miserably slaine by the ambitious aspiring of other proud competitors; when he was fore against his will hoist up upon the shoulders of the nobility and chiefe souldiers, and so carried into the court, as their manner was, began earnestly to resuse the kingdome, and to withstand their choice, excusing himselse as vnsit for so high a place; and with teares standing in his cies, befought the other great lords his friends, that they would K forbeare to thrush him (well contented with his private life) into that glorious place subject to formany dangers; and the rather, for that he neither had mony to give bountifully to the foldiers of the court, as other the Ægyptian Sultans had accustomed; neither held that sufficiency and authority as was requisite for repressing of such violent and seditious tumults as were too rife in that troublesome time and confusion of all things.

The nobility on the other fide perfuaded him, That he would not vpon a foolish obstinacy or vaine modesty refuse the offer of his present good fortune, but couragiously to take vpon him the gouernment of the state, now fore shaken with civile discord, together with the regall dignity, which was with the generall good liking of all men so frankely offered vnto him. At last they all by solemne oath promised vnto him, That they would with all their power, policy, and wealth, maintaine and defend the majefty of his ftate; and that the men of war should not demand their wonted largesse, before the same might by his receivers and treasurers be raised of his customes and other reuenewes of the crowne. By which persuasions Campson in couraged, suffered himselse to be saluted Sultan, and so tooke vpon him the government. Afterwards, when he had given vnto the men of war ten millions of duckats, by the name of a largesse, and by his moderat gouernment had caused men generally to have his prowesse and wiledome in admiration, he did with such policy and dexterity reforme the shaken state of that kingdome, before rent in funder by civile wars, taking away by poyfon and other fecret deuices, forne few, the chiefe authors of fedition, that for the space of fixteene yeares neither tumult nor noise of war was at any time heard of in all Syria or Ægypt: worthy vindoubtedly M the name of a most excellent and fortunate Prince, if when he had by singular wisedome and policyestablished the generall peace and prosperity of his kingdome, he could have there contented himselfe to haue lived in quiet, and in the winding vp of his life not rashly have thrust himselse into the dangerous quarrels of other Princes.

few daies to Campion the great Sultan, who then lay encamped neere vnto the river Orantes, at this day called Farfar. These Embassadors entertained by Campson with greater bounty than courtesie, and shortly after their comming having audience in his pavilion, did with most temperat and calme speech deliuer their Embassage. To whom Campson answered, That it was the antient custome of the Ægyptian Sultans (for a funch as they held the chiefe place in their re. Campon bit anantient cultionic of the angle of the control with all care and industry to keepe the other Mahometan Kings and people in peace bas affection of and concord among it themselves; whereof he for his part had bin alwaies most desirous; and selymus. was for no other purpose come with his army into his province of Syria, than to persuade Se. lymus to peace. Who if he would needs wilfully proceed in his intended wars against Hylmuel B the Persian king, his friend and confederat, he would then do what should stand with his honour and place, and not longer fuffer all to go to wracke, for the vaine pleafure and furth of one infolent and ambitious man. He faid alfo, That he had of long time before feene into Selymus his infatiable, fierce, and trouble fome disposition, who having most unnaturally procured the death of his good father the old Emperor Bajazet, and flaine his brethen, Princes of great valour, feuen of his nephewes, princes of no fmall hope; with many other of his best friends and hithfull counfellors; could make no end of his ambitious tyranny. Wherefore they should tell Selimus, that one and all the conditions of peace should be, if he would from thenceforth defilt from invading of Hyfmael, and reftore to Aladeules his fon, his fathers kingdome, which had of long been under the defence and protection of the Ægyptian Sultans, as of right and C reason he ought to do: he should in so doing, beside his favour and friendship which might greatly stand him in stead, reape greater fame and glory by an affured and honourable peace. than by doubtfull and dangerous war. The Embassadours, although they knew right well that Selymus would not for any threats give over his enterprise or lay downe armes, yet to the intent they might the sooner be dispatched, and so in time aduertise Selymus of the Sultans sudden comming, seemed wonderfully to like of his motion for peace, and to give good hope by their reasonable persuasions to induce Selymus to like thereof: for a fouch as they were of his fecret counfell, and men able to do much with him; whereby they trusted (as they would have had the Sultan to beleeve) it would cafily be brought to passe, that those sparks might be quenched, which all things stan-D ding vpright had not as yet kindled the fire of war. So they being by Campson rewarded, and having leave to depart, travelling day and night, returned to selymus, who was then come to Campson also removing from Orantes, came into Comagena vnto the samous city of Aleppo, which city is probably supposed to have bin built of the ruines of the antient city of Hierapolis, by Alepius the Emperor Iulianus his lieutenant; who in that province did many notable matters, and called that new built city after his owne name. It is scituate necre vnto the river Singa, which rifing out of the mountaine Pierius, with many turnings and windings runneth through Comagena, and being but a small river, falleth at length into the river Euphrates. This city Hyalon king of the Tartars tooke and burnt, at fuch time as the Christian Princes of the West made warre with the Ægyptian Kings, for the kingdomes of Syria and Ictusalem. Which calamity notwith standing, it was againe repeopled; and is at this day a samous city, for the commodious scituation thereof much frequented with Merchants from the furthest parts of the World. It is scarce sine daies journy from Tripolis and Berytus, the great ports of Syria, and is also necre vnto the Turks and Persians: so that the riches of the East are thither commodiously conucied out of Turkic, ouer the mountaine Amanus which parteth Cilicia from Syria: and so likewise out of Persia and Mesopotamia ouer the river Euphrates, where the city Byrrha of late time bounded the Kingdome of the Ægyptian Sultans, from the Perfians.

Selymus vnderstanding by his Embassadors (who had diligently noted all things in the Sus-Selymus contanscampe) both of the comming, and of the number of his enemies; and also informed of the cetter his for-Sultans proud answer, who had so peremptorily prescribed to him such unreasonable condi- Priancagainst tions as pleased himselfe: thought good to alter his purpose, and now to conuert his forces camples. another way than he had before determined. For that to enter farther into Armenia, leaving so puissant an enemy as Campson at his backe, seemed a thing too ful of danger; and to give over the enterprise he had with so great care and charge undertaken, at the appointment and plea- G. fure of another man, flood neither with his honor or flate. Wherefore in a matter so doubtfull, he resoluted upon a notable necessary point, well fitting the greatnesse of his mind He made show as if he would have gone directly against the Persian, as he had before deter mined, and that the more certaine report of this his purpose might be carried to Campson, he fent before part of his army with his carriages to the city Suaffia, in old time called Sebaffa. it standeth in the frontiers of the Persian kingdome, where the great river Euphrates pent vp with the rockes of the mountaine Taurus, breaketh againe wiolently forth into Mesopotamia: but turning himselse vpon the right hand, purposed to passe the mountaine Taurus, and breaking suddenly into Comagena, to come vpon the Sultan before he were well aware of his comming. Wherefore calling vnto him his trufty Ianizaries, with the other fouldiers of the H court, he openly with cheerefull countenance declared vnto them what he had refolued to selymus encouse do, with the reasons of the alteration of his former determination: persuading them, that the segenths four victory would easily be atchieued, if they as couragious souldiers would with all celerity gainfi the Ma- (before the Mamalukes could perceive they were returned) get up to the top of the mountaines, and recouer those difficult passages; not fearing the vaine names and titles of the Mamalukes. For why (faid he) the strength of those horsemen is long since decaied and gone : the old Mamalukes, who in the time of Caitbeius were of some fame and reputation, are all dead. You shall in battell meet but with a fort of callant horse breakers rather then souldiers, which can cumpingly manige their horses in sport, to the pleasure of the beholders, but know not how to encounter the enemy, or to andure to be wounded who as carpet Knights effeminat with long peace, and corrupted with excesse and 1 delicacy of their great Cities, never faw their foes intrenched, or armed enemies, neither have heard the found of a trumpet, but at plaies or shewes. Wherefore you are to make but small account of them, being furnished with no store of ordnance or strength of footmen. But as the reverend interpreters of our sacred Lawes and Religion, having orderly performed all their observances, do distinct unto we all happinesse: so you as men full of hope, fer forward cheerefully unto most affured victory ouer your proudenemies. For God no doubt favoureth the quarrell of men justly provoked, and offereth meanes of victory to such as take up just and necessary armes. Tet to overcome the enemy and to enjoy victory indeed, wholly consistet in the courage and valour of them which deeme nothing better or more honourable, than to frend their lines for the bonour of their Prince and Country. Here the Ianizaries shaking their weapons, forthwith cried out with cheerefull voice, That he should lead and conduct them whithersoeuer K he would: faying. That they were ready as couragious men, to ouercome all the difficulties of those hard passages, and patiently to endure all the labors and dangers incident to that

Sclymus, by the mountaine people having found out the easiest passages, resolved to passe ouer the mountaine with his army in three places: and so appointing three great companies of the common fouldiers and country people, for the opening of the fireit passages; he commanded the rough and vneuen waies to be made plaine and smooth, for the transporting of his ordnance, and the broken passages to be cast even, that so his baggage and carriages might the better passe; and the more to encourage his souldiers to take paines, he promised present reward to all such as in transporting of his ordnance, should take any extraordinary paines. L Whereby it came to passe, that the same being of the smaller fort, bearing a bullet of no great height, was in thort time by the cheerefull labour of his foldiers, drawneouer those great hils and dales: so that in flue daies all his army with his baggage and carriages were got over the mountain Taurus, and come into the plaines of Comagena. For that mountaine where it taketh the name of Amanus, which is almost in the middle where the river Euphrates parteth the mountaine Taurus, and the Bay Issicus, is neither exceeding high, or yet impassible for as it commeth neerer the fea, it is not fo rough as elsewhere, but is in many places inhabited and tilled by the mountaine Cilicians, a fierce kind of people accustomed to labor and toile, who are now called Caramanians, which is to fay, the inhabitants of the blacke mountaines; for that the burnt rocks of the mountaine seeme a far off to be blacke.

Alis Beg which betraied Aladeules, whom Selymus had a little before fent for, as soone as the army was come downe into the frontiers of the enemies country, with a strong power of his light horfmen, speedily ouerran all that country which is at the foot of Amanus and Taurus: therby to vader fland of the country people and fuch as they could take prifoners, where CampA fon lay with his army; and also by keeping the passages to doe what might possibly be done. that Selymas his comming might not be knowne to the enemy.

But Camplon, who with no leffe vanity than pride had fondly flattered himselfe, onely by the authority and greatnesse of his name to have terrified Selymus, and overruled him at his pleasure; could not be persuaded that he was come ouer the mountaine Amanus, untill certain newes was brought him, that he was encamped with a most puissant army within two daies march of him. With which vnexpected newes being fore troubled, and in the midft of that danger to feeke counfell, as one which began rightly to confider of his owne strength, and the frength of his enemy; began then to doubt what were best for him to do, & in great perplexity sometime hoped well, and by and by was as a man halfe discouraged and dismaied. And now become exceeding carefull both of his honor and himselfe, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to give place to fogreat a danger, and shunning battell to retire with his army into places of more fafety or elfe couragiously to abide the comming of his encmies, and to hazard the fortune of a battell, although it were vpon great disaduantage: foralmuch as he reputed it far more honourable, after the example of his predeceffors from whom he had received that great kingdome (both gotten and kept by martiall proweffe) to die with honor in the field, than by fhamefull and vnwonted flight, either to blemish their military glory continued aboue the space of 300 yeres, or for love of a small remainder of life, being now 77 yeres old, to seeme willing to reserve vnto obloquie and shame his last daies, deprived of all honour and reputation.

There were among it his chiefetains many, which preferred whole some counsell before that The whole some which was in thew more glorious , but about all others, one Lamburd fyrnamed Gazelles (force. complete of Gazelles) which was in the more glorious; but about all others, one samoura lyrnamed Gazettes (tometimes the follower of great Caitbeins) a valiant man of great honor, for his long experience in traffing the martiall affaires, and at that time Gouernor of Apamia, He, as he was of opinion, That to fight  with the Turks army, confishing for most part of expect foldiers, with so small a power, were a thing of desperat danger; so was he also, that it were good speedily to retire, and to chuse the city of Damasco, as the fittest place for those wars; for a smuch as the Turks army could make no haste after them, by reason of their footmen and carriages, so that they might at ease and with fafety retyre; and there calling together all the Mamalukes which were in garrison in ludea and Ægypt, and entertaining the Arabians their neighbors, to protract the war untill Winter, when as they might easily distresse the enemy for want of victuall. And that it was not to be feared, that Aleppo, if it were furnished but with a reasonable garrison, could by and by be taken of the enemy, who had but small field pieces not fit for battery. Beside that, in short time aid would come from the Persians out of Mesopotamia, yea, and Hysmael himselfe hearing of the Turks expedition into Syria, was like enough to break into Asia the lesse: neither would the Christians refuse to furnish them with great artillery from the Islands of the Rhodes and Cyprus, against that common enemy, if they were thereto in time requested. All which things being laid together, he faid, the Sultan might afterward vpon even hand go into the field, if he should thinke it so much to concerne his honor, to give his enemies bartell. But for a smuch as the greatest wars, which at the first had most violent and surious motions, by the politicke enemies delay, did most commonly in time grow calme, he should not therefore make too much hast to aduenture the fortune of battell: for that the errors of war, which many times chanced through the ouerlight or rashnesse of the chiefetaines, might well of good men be lamented and detested, but hardly or neuer be recoursed or amended.

Gazelles his grave and confiderat speech had much moved both the Sultan and others: yet the cheerfulnesse of the soldiers, and soolists hardinesse of the Mamalukes did so fill Campsons eares, that he could not hearken to fo good and whole some counsell: for as soone as they heard certainly of the comming of the Turks, they began to leape and dance, and to rejoyce among themselues, that the time was come wherin they might make proofe of their valor, and win to themselues honor. For now (as they said) was come that time they had long with t for, wherein they would by notable flaughter of their enemies, advance the honor and majesty of Campfontheir Sultan far aboue the fame of Caitbeim: and some even of the chiefe men about Campfor, vpon flattery and vaine oftentation, alledging how honorably and with what small labour they had before ouerthrown the Turks great army at Taurus; perfuading him that the victory would easily and without any great danger be gotten. But especially Cayerbeim Gouernos or Aleppo and of the prouince of Comagena (who after his war ended, was in reward of his G foule treason, by Selymus vinworthily preferred to the greatest honours of Ægypt) extolling with glorious words the faithfulnesse, courage, and valour of the Mamalukes, and extenuating the power and strength of the enemy, forced his wits to the vitermost to ouerthrow the wholefome counfell of Gezelles.

For this Cayerbeius for all his faire face bare a grudge in heart against Campson, because he had some few yeres before poisoned his brother, whom he had in jealousie, being a manner he as Governor to himself of greatest power, wealth, and authority among st the Mamalukes, and withall of an of Congression as a spiring mind. Whereupon Cayerbeim afterwards thinking it good to looke to himselfe, and doubting the like practife to be intended against himself, being, as the matter of that kingdom was, furning ned to a parliament at Caire, feigned himselfe ficke, and would not come; where, H with Campion was not a little offended, yet for a time he thought it best to diffemble the mat. te. & to wait some fitter opportunity for the taking away of that proud man, so sozgetful of his dury, and bearing himselfe against his sourraigne, as if he had bin an absolute King in his own prouince: this he thought might most couertly be brought to passe, if he should woon theorcasion of the present war (as it then fell out) or els under the color of going in person himselfe to the river Euphrates, come to Aleppo: for it was the maner of the antient Egyptian Sultans. not to account themselves worthy of the name of a Sultan or great Generall, before they had, as Cayibeins had of late done, encamped their army upon the fide of the riner Euphrates at the city Byrrha (which standing upon the banke of the river, retaineth at abisday both the antient name and fame) and there with folemne pompe had in the fight of the army forced their horfes into the river to drinke: giving to vnderstand by that ceremony, the greatnesse of their empire, and that they were ready by force of armes to proue, that all those countries were theirs which lay along it the river Euphrates, from the mountain Taurus, anto the defarts of Arabia. But the confideration of this war letted that he did not at his first comming oppresse him, because he deemed it to stand best with his present affaires; and not yet knowing the purpose of Selymus, to expect the motions of the Turks and Persians, and to defer the execution of his wrath against Cayerbeius, vntill the end of the wart for feare lest the other Mamalukes difmaied with the hainousnesse of the sudden fact, should either reuolt from him, or els raise somemutiny and rebellion in that populous city. For Gayerbeius had by his courtesic and bounty many firing companies in the army fast bound vnto him : and beside that, was of greatest credit and K authority with them of Aleppo, having in his keeping a strong citadell, built vpon the rising of an hill in the midft of the city, which he kept with a strong and sure garrison.

But whiles Campion doth thus flow ly and confideratly purpose his destruction, many of the Sultans secret friends, to him more officious than faithfull, secretly aduised Cayerbeim to beware of the Sultan, and by some good means in time to prouide for his own safety. He vnderstanding of the danger, and thinking all delay deadly, sent secret messengers unto Selymon, discovering vnto him the cause of his gricfe, and promising as occasion should serue to come ouer vnto him, and to deliuer into his power the castle with the heart of the citisens, and all the strength of his owne horsmen; thereby to prouide for his owne safety, to reuenge his brothers death, and to further his victory against Camples : and for performance of promises on L both fides, required secret hostages to be giuen. By the same messengers he also aduertised him, what strength the Sultan was of, persuading him in any case to make hast to giuchim battell before he had gathered any greater power. Selymus nothing doubted to condificend to all that the traitor had requested, promising of himselse sar greater things than ever he had required : affuring himselfe of the victory, if his enemie should lose so much of his strength by the revolt of fo great a commander.

Campion enforced by the generall consent of his fouldiers, and the violence of his ineuitable destiny, then at hand, rejecting the good and faithfull counsell of Gezelles, at such time as Selymm was reported to be at hand; resolued according to the counsell of the traitor Cayerbeino to dare him battell. He lay conveniently incamped vpon the river Singa, almost ten miles M from the city, in such fort as that his soldiers might vie the benefit of the river, and removed from the houses and pleasures of the city, might yet neuerthelesse be easily relicued with the flore and plenty thereof.

The Mamalukes were scarce in number twelve thousand, but every one of them, according

A as he was of greater place or calling, so had he attending upon him mo servants, wel surplished with horse and armor. A goodly and innincible army, if the battel might haue bin tried by true valor. The Mamalukes wearing their beards long and rough, with graue and stern countenance, having frong and able bodies, yield fuch cunning in all their fights and battels, that after they had given the first charge with their lances, they would by and by with wonderfull activitie vie their bows and arrows, casting their targets behind them; and forthwith the horfmans mace or crooked scimitar, as the maner of the battel and place required. Their horses were strong and couragious, in making and swiftnes much like vnto the Spanish Genets; and that which is of many hardly believed, fo docible, that at certain fignes or speeches of the rider, they would with their teeth reach him up from the ground, a lance, an arrow, or fuch like n thing; and as if they had known the enemy, run vpon him with open mouth, and lash at him with their heels, and had by nature and custom learned, not to be afraid of any thing. These couragious horses were commonly furnished with silver bridles, gilt trappings, rich saddles, their necks and brefts armed with plates of iron. The horsman himself was commonly contentwith a coat of male, or a brest-plate of iron : the chief and wealthiest of them yied headoleces, the rest a linnen couering of the head, curiously folded into many wreaths, wherewith they thought themselues safe enough against any handy stroke. The common souldiers yield thrumbd caps, but fo thick that no fword could pierce them.

Camplon of all his army made four battels: the first was committed to Cayerbeiss, because it Theorder of was in his own province where the battell was to be fought: the fecond was led by, Sybeim, Campion bia C who for his wonderful activity was of them called Palvano, which in their language fignifieth a numbler, or one that sheweth feats of activity: he was governour of Damasco, a man of singular faith and valor. These two great Commanders were appointed at once to charge both the wings of the Turks army." After them followed Gazelles with the third battell to fecond either the one or the other of the two formost, as need should require. Campson himself led the fourth, all glistring in gilt as mor, behind, the rest almost a mile and a half. The last was lest for defence of the camp.

But Selymus according to his wonted maner foordered his battel, that his Afian horsemen Theorete of were in the right wing, his Europeian hor timen in the left, his Ianizaries and Artillerie in the Selymus bis main battel before whom in the middle between the two wings hee placed his most valiant D and gallant Pentioners; among it whom (contrasy to his wonted custome) he chose to serve that day.

Cayerbeirs fo foon as he was come near the enemy, in roken of his braue courage gaue a hot charge upon the Europeian horimen; and by and by as if hee would have compatted in that wing, wheeled a great way about behind them, where chancing upon a great company of feullians, drudges, and other base people that followed the camp, with an infinit number of cammels and carriages, he made there a great ftir, with little flaughter, that as a valiant & cumning traitor, he might in the felf same time satisfie the expectation of his valor and of his treason together. In the other wing, the gouernor of Damasco, to enter upon the open side of the enemy, forbearing to charge him afrom, and turning about his tronpes on the left hand, entered ouerthwart their ranks, where the Mamalukes fought with fuch fury, that having made great flaughter of the Asian horsmen, they brake in among & them as if it had bin a raging floud, bearing down all before them, until they came to the enfigues in the midft of the wing. Neither could Mustapha the Beglerbeg (who was by birth an Hungarian, and Selymus his brother in law) neither the Imbrahor Baffa (or mafter of the house) though they did what they might to with fland him, after the first were overthrown, flay the rest, but that they would needs turn their backs and fly. So Sybeius as a valiant conqueror having cut in two pieces the right wing of the enemies battel, and thrusting in betwirt the battel of the footmen, and the backs of the pentioners, brought a great terror & fear vpon the whole battel. The matter was now brought to extream danger; for Selymus by the breaking in of Sybeius was almost cut off from his footmen, in whom he had reposed his greatest confidence. And now the lanizaries were hardly charged by Gazelles, who following the fortune of Sybeins, had for upon the head of the Encmies battell. The Afian horsemen also beeing put to the worse, and out in pieces, sound no means how to restore again their disordred battel.

In this extremity Sinan Bassa in good time came in with his horsmen by his comming for that he had bin but lightly charged by Cayerbeins the Traitor, and had brought with himma- G ny fresh troups of hortmen, the fury of the Mamalukes was repressed, the Turks again incouraged, and the victory thortly after wrung out of the Mamalukes hands; the great artillery being by the commandement of Solymus at the same time discharged among them, by the terrible thundring wherof the Mamaluks horses somwhat troubled, could not so wel as before be ruled:neither could the men themselves, although they were of wonderful courage, much preuall being on enery fide oppressed with the multitude of their enemies. Yet in that distresse being nothing difmaid, although they were by Cayerbeins & their good fortune for faken, they were not to feek either of courage or direction; but fetting themselves close together, they brake through the midst of their enemies, with great saughter of the Europeian horsemen. and hurt of the pentioners, and so with speed fled toward the camp and city. After whom fol. H lowed Sinan Baffa with the readiest and freshest troups of his horsmen: for Selymus (who that day in the extream heat, for his wonderful pains, courage, and direction, feemed vindoubtedly greater than himselfe) riding vp and down, called ernestly vpon his soldiers to vrge the victo. ry, and with all speed to pursue their slying enemies.

Campion had now (his deftiny to leading him) fet forward, of purpose to have come to the relief of his men fent before; or if the Turks should be ouercome, to be partaker of the victory when upon the way he understood by them that fled, that Carerbeins was revolted. his armu ouerthrown, and the terror fo great, as that the flight of his fouldiers was not now possibly to be flaicd. Beside that to augment the searite was reported, that the multitude of his enemies & force of their artillery was fo great, that they were not then to be incountred. With which I heavy news the proud old man witho in the perpenual course of his good fortune had never tafted of cuil hap, was ready for for toward grief of mind to have funke downe to the ground. And forthwith his own mentand the enemy purflying them, comming you him, who in their headlong course without regard buerthress whomfoeuenthey met, every man making shife for himfelf, without respected others harms, he being a corpulent man of great years, and befide the heavines of his armor, troubled also with a rupture, ouercome with heat and griefe of mind fainted in that great preife and fo falling downings withour regard troden to death, after he had with great majelty governed the kingdoms of Egypt, Index, and Siria, many years. The valiant Tetrarchs of Damasco and Tripolis, whilft others fled for life, either to the camp or to the city of Aleppo, laboring in the hindermost of their flying troups to represthe force g of their pursuing enemies, were both fighting honorably flain. Selymu erecting a few tents in the same field wherin the battel was fought, and keeping most part of his army in arms, slept not all that night, but flood fast are mannot yet assured of his victory or good fortune; fearing left men of to great courage as were the Mamalukes, should in the court of the night return and fet voon him in his camp. For heknew right wel, that they were ouercome and put to flight rather by the treehery of Cayerbeins, and fury of his great ordnance, than by the valor of his foldiers. But Gazelles and the other Mamalukes, after they certainly understood of the death of Camples, having given their horses a short bait, departed in hast from Aleppo to Damasco. The next day Selymus remouing with his army took the rich gents of his enemies, full of all princely store, which he gaue to his soldiers for a prey and marching thence to Aleppo L Alepsodeline- had the city peaceably delivered vnto him by Cayerbeins, where he favorably took the Citifens into his protection, and the more to win their hearts, granted vnto them greater priviledges than they had in former time injoyed.

In this battel were flain not aboue a thousand Mamalukes, but of their feruants and followers a great number; mo being flain in the flight than in the fight, when as their horses fainting for heat, and dying under them for thirst, many of them were inforced to betake themfelues to their feet, & sowerceasily slain of every base horsman. For a great number of goodly horses died there, which being foggy fat, and delicatly brought vo in cold stables, could not endure the feruency of the heat, and that vnacquainted travels for that day al things were burnt with the fcorching heat of the fun.

This famous battell was fought, the 17 of August, in the year of our Lord 1516, the very fame day (which is ftrange to tell) whereon but two years before hee had obtained the victoric against Hymael the great Sophy in the Chalderan fields. Selymus lost in this battell three thousand horsemen; whereby it may easily be gathered, That hee had there received a notaA ble ouerthrow of his horfmen, if Sinan Baffa in the left wing (who by the treason of Carerbeiss escaped with small losse) had also hapned upon his Sybeiss, as the other General did.

The dead body of Campion, found two daies after without any wound appearing therupon, campions dead was by the commandment of Selymon laid forth in open place for al men to behold; that such for all men to as beleeved him yet to live, and to be gon to repair his army at Cair, might be out of all hope view. of his return; and others that were already revolted, might thereby be the more confirmed, as now out of all fear of him. Not long after when the dead body began to putrifie & grow noifom, and to contince the fame of his escape, had lien open to the view of all men by the space of three days, it was without any funeral pomp or folemnitie simply buried in the most antient temple of Aleppo. Of the riling and fall of this great man Ianus Vitalis hath written this B Elogium or Epitaph:

te Damafso.

Selymus having received the City of Aleppo into his obeyfance, fent longes Balla before M him with a great part of his light horimen topurfue his flying enemies to Damafen whither he himself in few daies after came also, with the remainder of his Aimy, when bee vider flood that his enemies were departed thence & fled to Cair. They of the city of Damasco thinking it not to stand with their good to stay the course of his victory, and with their lives to hazard

the great wealth of that rich city; without delay presently opened unto him the gates at his comming. By whose example other cities alongst the sea coast mooned, especially Tripolis. Berytus, Sydon, and Ptolemais, sending their Embassadors, and receiving in the Turks garrifons, yeelded themselues in like maner.

Not long after, Selymus held a great councel in his camp, which then lay under the walls of Damasco: for he would not bring his foldiers into the city, for troubling the quiet and populoss state therof, together with the great trade of merchandise, which at that time was with wonderful fecurity kept there by merchants of divers countries comming from far, even from theremotest parts of the world. And in the Campe such was the military discipline of that Notable distithe remotelt parts of the world. And in the Camp the in the plant in Selymost senere commander, that the foldiers (knowing the vi Gory to give them no whit the more plant in Selymusika may be a rough. libery) suffered the fruitfull orchards and gardens of the citisens, in the most plentifull time of Autumn, to rest in safety vntouched, without any keeper, By which seuere & streit gouernment he so politically provided against all wants, that his camp was in all parts furnisht with plenty of all things necessary, and that at prices reasonable. There taking vnto him men skilfull in the laws and customs of the country, and calling before him the embassadors of all the cities of the country, he heard and decided the greatest controuers of the Syrians, appointed gouernors ouer the prouinces and cities, took view of the tributes and customs, and abrogated many cuftoms and tributes due vnto the old fultans, which feemed either vnreasonable or grieuous to the people: therby to gain the fame of a just and bountiful conquetor.

When he had thus fet all things in order in Syria, and sufficiently rested and refreshed his C army, and especially his horses, which with long and continual trauel were grown megre and kan the of nothing more defirous than of the conquest of Egypt, and the veter subuersion of the Sultans state and Mamaluks government, sent before Sinan Bassa into Iudea with 50000 horsmen, and a strong regiment of harquebusiers selected out of te l'anizaries and other soldiers, to try the passage of that country, & to open the way for him to Gaza, which was thought would be to him very troublesom, by reason of the wild Arabians roaming up and downe the Country. The City of Gaza standeth neere vnto the sea towards Egypt, not farre from the fandy defarts; wherby men with much difficulty and dangerous trauel, passe out of Syria, and fo to Cair.

In the meane time the Mamalukes, who under the conduct of Gazelles were come to Caire, with all the rest of their order which were thither assembled from all parts of the kingdom entring into counsel together (as it often fals out in time of danger and distresse) without all contention or enuy chose Tomombeius (of the Turks called Tuman bay) a Circassian born, to be Tomombeius their king. He was then the great Diadare, and by his office next in honor and power vnto the by general con-Sultan; whose prowesse & policy was such, that he only in the opinion of all the Mamalukes malutes chosen was thought able & fufficient to flay & vphold the afflicted and declining flate of their king. InternofEgipt dom. He by their general consent and good liking promoted to the state of the great Sultan, thinking (as truth was) his own majesty, and the remainder of the Mamalukes hopes, to be reposed wholly in arms and the fortune of battel; began with great care & singular industry to prouide armor, weapons, and horses from all places; he also caused great store of ordnance to be cast, and mustred great companies of such of his slaues as seemed meet for the war: besides that, he entertained for pay many of the Moors and Arabians his neighbors. He also for great reward hired men skilful in the Countries, to go thorow the defarts of the Palmyrens into Melopotamia, and so to Hysmael the Persian King with letters; earnestly requesting him to inuade the Turks dominions in Asia the lesse, or with all speed to break into Comagena, being by the departure of the enemy left bare and destitute of sufficient garrisons. And surther to aduertise him, That Selymus who then lay in the borders of Iudaa, might easily bee inclosed with their two armies, and so be vanquished, or for want of victuals distressed and the rather, for that there was no fleet of the Turks vpon that coast, able from sea to relieue their Army by land, or yet to transport them thence, in case they should by chance of War bee distressed, and fo think to return. In which doing, he should both relieue the Egyptian Sultan his friend and Confederat, for his fake brought into fo great danger; and also without any great troubleor peril, notably reuenge himself of so many shamefull injuries as hee had before received from that most capitall Enemy. Whilest Tomombeins doth these things, Sinan Bassa the forerunner of Selymus, having easily repulsed divers companies of the wild Arabians, who in maner of thecues and robbers lay upon the paffages, had now opened the way, & was come to G Gaza, where the citifens, although they were in heart faithful to the Mamalukes, yet for that to thut their gates against the Bassa, and to stand vpon their gard without a sufficient garrifon, seemed a matter both perillous and vnreasonable, forthwith yeelded their city vpon reafonable composition and with the plenty therof relieued the Turks Bassa, giving him great, but diffembled thanks, that by his meanes and the good fortune of Selymu, they were deline. red from the cruel bondage of the Mamalukes, promifing for the remembrance of fo great a benefit, for euer to remain his faithful fernants. Sinan commending their ready good will, required of them al fuch things as he wanted, or had occasion to vie, which they seemed willing to deliuer, and so lodged his army neer to the wals of the city, within the defence of the gardens, purposing in that place to expect the comming of Selymus.

In the mean time (as he was a man of great experience, and most skilful in martial affairs) he fought by all means to get knowledge of that defart and unpeopled country, not inhabited for lack of water; and especially of the nature of the great sands wherby Selymus was with his army to patte. He allowon by rewards the inhabitants of the country therabouts, by large of. fers to procure him the fauor of the chieftains and leaders of the Arabians neere vnto those places and also to spy what the Mamalukes did at Cair, and wherin they reposed their chief confidence, and forthwith to giue him knowledge therof.

On the other side, the citisens of Gaza in heart enemies vnto the Turks, as daily feeling the gricuances of the prefent army, aduertifed Tomombeius of the comming of Sinan Baffa, & that that power of the Turks army might cafily be oppressed before the comming of Selymus, if a I ftrong power of the Mamaluks were fent thirher under the conduct of skillful leaders:promifing, that if the Mamalukes would at an appointed time, vpon a fudden in the night fet vpon the fleepy Turks, they would at the same instant fally out of the city vpon the Camp, & there with fire and fword do what harm they could for the ouerthrow of the enemy,

Of this device Tomombeius and the Mamalukes liked wel, and fowithout delay sent Gazelles with 6000 choise horsmen, and a great number of the Arabians, to perform the exploit you Sinan, For Gazelles, in that his wholiom counsel had bin by Campfor and others rejected (who being straitway desirous of battel, had rashly cast themselves & the whole state into so great calamity) and afterward in the greatest danger of the battel, having performed all the parts of a politique and valiant chieftain, was grown into such credit, that all men held a great opini- K on both of his valor and direction.

But he was fearfly wel fet forth, when aduertisement was given vnto Sinan by his Syrian infed of the com- telligencers, That the Mamalukes with the Arabians were comming thorow the fandy Defarts, vpon the sudden to oppresse him; and that they would be with him before two dais were by to meet him. expired, for a finuch as they had fet forward vpon the spur, without any cariages or baggage to let them. Which ouerture in good time giuen, as it was the safegard of Sinans army, so was it of greatest importance and moment for the subduing and obtaining of the full conquest of Egypt afterward. But Sinan Baffa, although he knew nothing of the trechery of them of Gaza; yet as a man of a provident and subtil wit, suspecting that such a thing might happen, because he would not have at once to do with a double enemy, resolved to go & meet the Ma- L maluks upon the way, and to give them battel. Wherfore with great filence dislodging his army betwixt ten and twelue a clock in the night, hee fet forward and marched out of fight of the city about fifteen miles toward Egypt. There was neer unto that place a little low village wherin trauellers vsed commonly to lodge, for the commodiousnes of a lively and plenteous spring which there riseth: there by chance both Sinan Bassa had purposed to stay, and Gazalles in like maner had also determined to rest a sew hours to refresh his army, that he might by night, after he had well refreshed his horses, comevalooked for voon his enemies at Gaza. When news was brought to both the Generals almost at one instant, by the fore runners of both armies, That the enemy was at hand.

Gazelles not a little troubled with that vnexpected news, for that he perceived himself dif- M appointed of his purpose; and vnable to fight with his enemies in plain battel, especially his horses being fore wearied with trauell, was inforced upon the sudden for the safegard of him felf & his followers, to resolute vpon a new resolution: yet nothing discouraged, with cheerful countenance and lively speech exhorted his foldiers to make themselves ready for battel, &

A that which they could not by policie bring to passe, they should by plain force perform. Si. man on the other fide having fomwhat fooner fet his men in order of battel than had Gazelles. for a fouch as he had before at good leifure taken order what hee would have don if it fould come to the point of battel; with constant look and long persuasions ful of hope, incouraged his foldiers to fight. But the conclusion of all his speech was, that they should play the men. and not once think of flight, forasmuch as all places about them would be shut yo and become impaffable, if they obtained not the victory: and that about all things they should persuade themselues, that none of them could that day perish, but such as the immortal God had by the ineuitable law of destiny appointed to die; and that with like hasard valiant men found life in the midft of their enemies weapons, that cowards by immutable deftiny found death in their safest flight.

The Baffa had placed his harquebusiers in the wings of his battell, which were raunged of The battell beagreat length in thin ranks, therby to vie their pieces at more liberty, and with more case to went Sinen inclose the enemy: in the middle were placed the horsemen to receive the first charge of the Mamalukes. Gazelles approching the enemy, fent before the troups of the Arabian light horfmen to trouble the wings of his enemies battel, and with a fquare battell of his Mamalukes charged the middle battel of the Turks. The battel was a great while most terrible, & the vidory doubtfull: for although the Turks in number far exceeded, yet were they not able to indure the armed and couragious Mamalukes, but were glad to give ground; and quite difordered by the breaking in of the Mamalukes, as men discouraged, began to looke about them C which way they might fly. When by the commandement of Sinan the harquebusiers, who with the first volly of their shot had repulsed the Arabians, wheeling about, inclosed all the enemies battel. By which means both men and horse were afar off slain with the multitude of their deadly shortwhere true valor helped them not, so on every side inclosed. For where any troup of Mamalukes pressed forward voon the Turks, they quickly retyred, and in all places of the battel, as much as they could, shunned to incounter their enemies with their horsmen. laboring only to gaul them with thor. Gazelles seeing his horses spent with extream wearines, and that he was not to expect any further help, his Arabians beginning now to fal from him; and also confidering that many of his most valiant soldiers were either slain or wounded, and having also himself received a great wound in his necke: he with the rest of his Army made D way thorow the middeft of his enemies, and having lost divers of his enfignes, fled backe again to Cair through the fandy Defarts wherby he came. In this battel was loft the gouernor of Alexandria, and Orchamus Gouernour of Cair (both men of great account among the Mamalukes) and befides them a great number of the Arabians, with a thousand or more of the Mamaluke horsmen. Neither got Sinan a joyfull or vnbloudy victory, having lost aboue two thouland of his best horsmen, and among st them certain Commaunders men of great ac-

The Turks weary of this battel, which had endured from noon til night, and many of their horses fainting under them were not able to pursue their enemies, and therefore incamped in the same place where the battel was fought, neer vnto the fountain. The day following they at leifure gathered the spoile, and cutting off the heads of their enemies, which were easily known by their long and rough beards, fastned them up upon the Date trees growing therby, as wel in witnes of their worthy labour, as by that strange and horrible spectacle to seed the cies of their fierce Emperor (who was shortly after to passe that way) and so to manifest vnto him the victory of that day.

In the mean time they of Gaza vpon the rifing of the Sun, perceiuing the Turks camp left empty as men not able longer to diffemble their couert trechery; and vainly supposing that Sinan Baffa vpon some knowledge of the comming of the Mamalukes, had for seare retyred back into places of more safety; suddenly set vpon such as were lest in the Camp, which were for most part fick and weak men (yet in number many) whom they most cruelly slew, and pre-F fently fet vpon 2000 of the Turks horsmen sent from Selymus to Sinan, which by chance were come thither the same day, enquiring with great carefulnes, what was become of the Bassa and his Army; and spoyling them of their Carriages, put them to flight. Who after that discomfiture, supposing the Bassa (whom they had thought to have found at Gaza, tarrying for the comming of Selymus) by some mishap or policy of the enemy to have beene loft, with all

all his army, and therfore fearfully retyring, were by the way miferably flain by the Arabjans: G neither had any one of them escaped, if they had not met with Iuleb the Gouernor of Achaia at the city of Rama: for hewas also fent from Selymus to Sinan Baffa with a strong companie of Grecian horimen, by whole comming the fury of the Arabians was wel repreffed. Yet these pilfering people stil calling forth to the prey more and more of their leaders which dwelt in the mountains adjoining, and being grown to a great army, ouertook the Turkes at a village called Carasbara, where they inforced them to fight in a place of great disaduantage. For the Arabians having before taken certaine fireits, which closed in the passage at the further end of a large vally, shewed themselues at once before, behind, & on both sides of the Turks: their weapons were bow and arrows, and long spears armed at both sides, which they nimbly handled after the maner of the Moors. These weapons they most skilfully vied vpon their swift H horses, and both in their charge and retreit wounded their enemies deadly. So the Turkes in number few, and for their horimens staues inferior to their enemies, durst not offer to charge them; but keeping close together, hardly defended themselves, stil making way as they went: and had vindoubtedly been brought into extream danger to have been viterly loft, had not Iteleb with four pieces of artillery which he brought with him for his defence, driven them that kept the streits, from their high places, and so opening the way, with all speed brought thorow his men. Which streits once passed, and comming into the open fields, be with more safety marched forward, skirmishing afar off with the enemy, with his archers and harquebyfiers, and discharging his field pieces where he saw the greatest and thickest troupes of those wild people.

On the other part, the Arabians dispersedly houering about them in troups, were still in the rail of the army, and such as were wounded or weak, and could not follow the rest, they slew s and fought by all means to hinder their journy, not suffering them (circumuented with so many dangers) either to refresh themselues, or to take rest. This was vnto the Turks a most dismal day, for many of them tormented with thirst, and weakened with wounds and extream labor, gaue up the ghost: and now no help remained in this desperat estate, being still beset and hardly laid to with a multitude of those fierce and desperat enemies swhen suddenly a great number of other Turks came to them in the mid way valooked for being now in despaire, and cuen at the last cast. For Selymus having left the Imbrahor Bassa with a strong army vpon the borders of Persia, for the desence of Syria and Asia, and having sent for new supplies of souldiers to Constantinople, which should with a great fleet be transported into Syria, had now remoned from Damasco: and the better to prouide for victuals and forrage, which began now to grow scant in that wasted countrey; every day sent before great troupes and companies of his army, as it were at certain appointed times,

So Inleb delinered of the present danger, by the comming in of these fresh souldiers, met ting Sinan baf- with Selymus the next day, and in order told him all that had happened vnto him and his first to be the troups, at Gaza and Rama, and all the way after; and allowhat they supposed by conjectures to have chanced to Sinan Bassa and his army, for the manifold wyles of so dangerous enemies. With which which news Selymus became exceeding melancholy, and therupon thought not good to go any further, before he perfectly knew how all flood with Sinan; in whose fortune L he had reposed at the hope of his good succes in that so great an enterprise. But whils he was in this dump, suddenly came the Syrian spies, who declaring vnto him all that Sinan Baffa had don, converted that melancholy passion into no lesse ioy and gladness for he saw that by that victory Egypt was laid open to him, and his defires as good as half accomplished in les time than cuer he expected.

The next day after, he removed with his Army to Rama, and by the way as hee went (to the terror of others) burnt the dwellings, together with the wives and children of those Arabians who but a little before had don fo much harm to his men in their passage. And from thence fending before his footmen to Sinan Baffa at Gaza, he himself with his horsmen turned out of the way upon the left hand to Ierusalem, to visit that most antient and samous City, so much M renowned both for the antiquity therof, and the fame of the religion of the Iews. That unpeopled and defolat city lay then defaced with the hugy ruins of the old facred and stately buildings; not inhabited by the Iewes, the antient Inhabitants thereof (who for their inexpiable guilt, as men exiled out of the world, have no Country or resting place) but for most part by

A a few poor Christians, who to the great foorn and shame of the Christian name, payd yearely a great tribute to the Sultan of Egypt, for the possession of the facted Sepulchre : when as the Christian princes flourishing at that time with glory, power, & wealth, could not by any motiue of immortal glory and fame be incited to revenge fo great an injury; but deeming it(as should feem) better agreeing with their state to spend their time in idle vanities, or mortall war one against another, than in the quarrel of the true Christian religion.

Selamus having reverendly worthipped the antient monuments of the old prophets, & don esnecial sacrifice vnto his great prophet Mahomet, gaue vnto the Christian priests keepers of the place (as vnto good and deuout men) mony to maintain them for fix months; and flaving at Ierusalem but one night, marched in four daies to the rest of his Army at Gaza: where by R the way he had continual skirmishes both day and night with the Arabians, who after their wonted maner were desperatly at hand in energy place, and where the streitnes of the place inforced the Turks to extenuat their rankes, there would they be ready to skirmish with them. and fuddenly vnlooked for come to handy blows; and when they came into the Vallies, they tumbled down from the mountains great stones upon them, which they had for that purpose before prouided. At which time the Turks harquebuffers, in whom they had greatest confidence, ferued them to little purpose: for the weather was so tempessuous and extreame moist with continual rain, that the pouder in their flasks became wet and vnferuiceable, and hardly could they keep fire in their matches. Yet by the valour of the Ianizaries the matter was fo vsed, that neer vnto the person of the emperor no great harm was don by those naked robbers: for climing up the hils with pikes in their hands, they droue them from their Randings, and inforced them to abandon the streits and high places.

But Sinan Baffa (who after the victory returning to Gaza, had put to death the authours of the late revolt, confiscated their goods, and exacted of the people in general a great summe the late revolt, confileated their goods, and exacted of the people in general a great lumine of mony, as the just punishment of their false trechery) hearing now of the comming of Selymu, went to meet him with his victorious foldiers, furnished with the spoils of their enemies. lymu, as hee Whom Selymus most honorably received, and gaue generally to the captains, and particular. was comming by to the most valiant of the common foldiers garments of fills with a great sum of money in 18 Gaze. ly to the most valiant of the common soldiers, garments of filk, with a great sum of money in

After that, he staid but four days at Gaza, for that he thought it not good to give any long D time of breathing vnto his discouraged enemies, now twice ouerthrown, or to suffer the new Sultan (not yet wel fetled in his kingdom) to grow stronger by new preparations and supplies raised in the most populous and plentiful country of Egypt. Which to let, although it required great hast in setting forward, and served as spurs vnto him, naturally hasting to glory and renown; yet was his army to be refreshed after so long and painful trauel, and great prouision to be made for the carriage of water voon camels all the way through the dry folitary and fandy desarts. For between Gaza and Cair ly vast unpeopled and barren sands, which moued by the wind, rife vp in billows in maner of a wrought fea, fo trouble fom, that many times it is not possible to see for dust: & the light fands in many places gauled deep with the wind, wonderfully troubleth the weary passengers. But such a sudden calm insued the great rain which fel but three dayes before, that Selymus vnto his great good fortune wanted norhing that hee could with for the happy conduct of his army: for the air was becom so calm, that ther was no blaft of wind to raise the sand to trouble their sight; and withall, such plenty of water was found almost in every place, by reason of the abundant rain, which being not yet sunk far into the ground, afforded them water in such plenty, if they digged but two foot deep, that the sols diers commonly thought it needles to carry any bottle of water for fear of thirst. Yet for all that, the wild Arabians failed not in all that passage, on every side to houer about the Turks atmy (as hawks ouer their prey) and suffered none of them to straggle out of order, or stray behind the rest of the army, but they were presently snatcht vp and stain. Against whom Selymus prouided an easy remedy, by placing his field pieces in diuers parts of his army, which by the direction of the Leaders (as euery man hapned to be neerest the danger) were forthwith difcharged vpon the roaming enemy; and in the rereward of his army were placed firong companies of harquebusiers, for defence of the weak and feeble foldiers, who could but foffly follow the army, and therfore were most subject to danger.

By this means Selymus with fome small losse received from the Arabians, in eight dayes confusion in

march drew neer to Cair, Sinan Baffa going before him, who with his Europeian foldiers fill G kept one daies journy before. There is a village about 6 miles distant from the city of Caire called Matharca, famous for the plenty of most excellent Balm, with liquor of al others most fragrant and four-raigne, distilled out of low trees there planted; whose outermost rinde the people cut with ivory kniues, to give the liquor passage; which Balm for the notable vertues therof being not elswhere to be had, mens diseases and wanton desires have made of a wonderful price. Into that place neer vnto a village called Rhodania, had Tomombeius conveyed al his new and old prouision of artillery; and had drawn deep dirches ouerthwart al the field and crosse the highway, which he had closely covered over with weak hurds and earth, as if it had bin firm ground. And he with his Mamalukes (in number about twelue thousand) and a great multitude of Arabian horfmen, lay in places convenient, of purpose that when the Turks bat. H tels should approch they should first feel the force of his great Ordnance, before they came within the fliot of their arrows, & forthwith vpon great difaduantage with all his forces sud. dealy to fet upon them difordred and intrapped. All which things were fo cunningly & politickly contriued and done, that there was none in the Sultans Army which doubted of the good fucces of that day; and a great mischief had undoubtedly befallen the Turkes, had not fortune which favored Selymus and frowned upon Tomombeiss (or more truly to fay the fatall period of that kingdom for equiring) by the falfe trechery of a few, frustrated the great indeanors of the Mamalukes.

There was in the Sultans army, among the foldiers of the court, four Epirot Mamalukes. who gricued to fee Tomombeius (contrary to their defires) preferred to the kingdom by others I of a contrary faction; whether it were youn a malicious disposition, or youn hope of reward and better preferment, or for that in fo great a declination of their kingdom they thought it good to feek for new friends of more affurance, fled fecretly to Sinan Baffa, as to a most famous captain, and one of their own nation. For this great commander Sinan, Selymus his right hand, was born in a poor country village of Epirus, in the mountain of Ambracia, whoma strange mischance preserved to that height of credit and wealth : for it is reported, that a sow kept in the house wherin he was born, bit off his genitoirs, being then but a child, as he lay by chance fleeping in the shadow, and being made of greater esteem by that mishap, was by them that took up delicat minions for the Turkish emperor, brought to Constantinople, and presented to the great Emperor Mahomet, Selymus his grandfather : where fortune by the fatal direction K of his good hap, advanced him to his appointed honors, whom the had long before dismemselmus com- bred. By these sugitive Mamalukes, Selmus and Sinan were instructed of all the devices of the enemy, and especially what stratagems Tomombeius had with great cunning and policy deuised:wherinto they must needs fall if they should go directly on, and not forsake the Highway. Wherfore guided by the faid fugitiues, they fetcht a great compas on the left hand, and by an vnused way, before it was day, having escaped the front of the enemies Campe, with all the dangers prepared for them; they came and shewed themselves at their backs in order of battel, with their great artillery ready bent, because they were desirous without delay to join

Tomembeius now too late perceiuing that his plot was discouered by the treason of some of L his own people, although he was therwith aboue measure grieved, for that al that be had with to great industry and the labor of so many men brought to passe, was through spiteful fortune made frustrat, and in a moment brought to nought; yet for all that, as he was a man of an inuincible courage, presently entred into his wonted and deep dettices; and calling to him his chief commanders, quickly told them what he would have don. Now in this thort moment of time he was to do many things at once: the fignal was to be given for the foldiers to mount their horses, and to make themselves ready, the order of his camp was to be changed, his battel to be ordered, his foldiers to be incouraged, and all his great ordnance, as the cause required, quite the contray way to be turned: all which things, as they could but hardly and troublesomly by one commander be directed, so were they hastily and disorderly at once douby the many. But about all other things, the great concourse of people for turning and remooning the great artillery, most troubled the well ordering of the rest; for many of them were hugie iron pieces of great weight made fast in stocks of wood, with rings and iron Claspes, after the old and rude manner of thip Ordnance, which for their exceeding and ponderous weight could not be out of their places removed, but by the strength of many horses, and the great labor of menswith levers and rouls put vnder them; and fuch as were mounted vpon cariages, when they were drawn thorow all parts of the camp, with the great clamour of the difordered and hasty people, some drawing, some thrusting forward the same, with their tumultuous stir and doings wonderfully troubled the other foldiers, as they were mounting to horse, & repaising toward their enfignes. But two things maruelloufly helped these difficulties, the soldiers cheerfulnes and constancy, which was such as passeth credit; for they did not youn any apprehension of fear fail either in hope or courage, as oftentimes it happeneth in sudden accidents. wherin even the old approved foldiers do many times fail of their wonted valor: & although they were twice ouercome in battel, yet stil they were of greater spirit and considence, as men destitute neither of courage nor skil, but only of fortune.

Wherfore Tomombeius having with much ado ordered this battell, and his fouldiers with great cheerfulnes desiring the signal to bee given, commanded all the multitude of his Arabians to compas in the wings of the enemies battel behind, & fo to skirmith with them : that fo(if it were possible) the Turks horsemen might with the danger of the doubtfull fight with fuch an uncertain enemy, be difordred before he fet forward to charge them with his troups: and withall commanded his great Ordnance (which was now turned youn the enemy) to bee presently diseased. So did the Turkes likewise, discharging at once from a convenient distance both their greater and smaller ordnance; and speedily recharging them, brought them within an arrow shortise that for a good space they lay beating the one the other on both sides with their great artille, y only: in which maner of fight the Egyptian cannoniers were almost all flain, and many of sheir field pieces broken by force of the enemies shot. For Selymus had christian cann. inhis camp many excellent and skilful canoniers, whom he had with great entertainment allured out of Italy and Germany; and especially of those refuce Iewes, who by the zeal of king the experions. Ferdinand being driven out of Spain afterwards to the shame of the Christians disperst those rate and deadly decides through the East. The chief of these canonices was one lacobus à regio Lepidi, a cunning enginier, who but a little before ourrcome by the Turks rewards, abjuring the Christian religion, revolved vnto the Mahometan superstition.

But after that the Mamalukes had brought the matter to battelon both fides, they gaug out a most hideous and dreadful cry, and with exceeding fury assailed the Turks in three placessfor Selyman fill keeping his wonted order, approached his enemies with his battel in form Theorder of of a half moon. Mustapha. Bassa had the leading of the Asian horsemen in the right wing; and Selymus bie longles Baffa of the Europeians in the left; he himself stood in the main battel with the squadronof his trufty Ianizaries, and great flore of attillery. But Sinan Baffa the Eunuch, General wrall of the of the field, led after him a great number of most valiant horsmen, drawn out of every troup, field; to be ready against al the vncertain euents that might happen in the battel, vnto whom he joined 500 harquebusiers, Ianizaries, men of wonderfull courage and activitie, sclecked out of Selymushis own fquadron, to relieue such part of the Army as should chance to be most prest

So almost at one time, whilst Tomombius stood in the main battel against Selymus, and the wings of the Mamalukes with equall battel incountred the wings of the Turks; and the Arabians also valiantly charging them in the rereward, as they had in charge, foure sharp battels were at once made in divers places. It is reported by some that were present in that battell, that what for the clamor and cry of foldiers, what for the noise of drums and trumpets, & such, like inflruments of war, what for the thundring of ordnance, elattering of armor, and rifing of the dust all mens minds were so abashed and consounded, that running headlong as men sutious and desperat, when neither their speeches could be heard, their tokens known, their Enfigns feen, or captains understood; mistaking one another in that hurly-burly, they slew many of their friends in stead of their enemies: for neuer battels met together with greater hatred, neither did euer two great kings with leffe care of their persons and safety more resolutely or desperatly make shew of their strength & courage for both of them with like danger both of themselues and of their armies, seeing plainly that they had put both their lines & kingdoms to the hasard of a battel, promised unto themselves no other hope of safety, but what they should obtain by victory. with wonderful fury affailed Ionuses Bassa, and at the first incounter brake his first ranks, and G ouerthrew certain of his guidons, at which time the Arabians couragiously preffing in at their backs, inforced those victorious troups, which in all battels had hitherto caried away the prife (the very flour of Thracia, Theffaly, Epirus, Macedonia, & Grecia) to fly & fnew their backs. which never enemy had before that time feen. At which time Sinan Baffa carefully attending euerv accident, came speedily in with his most valiant troups of fresh men, vpon the side of the enemy, and restored again the battel, now declining and fouly disordered. But while Sie nan, who in this his last worthy labour had interrupted the manifest victory of Gazelles, was with an inuincible courage valiantly fighting in the head of his battell, hee was by the com. ming in of the couragious Captain Bidon with his Mamalukes ouercharged and flaine. His most valuant followers also laboring to rescue and catry away his dead body, wereby Gazelles H unfolding his troup (that standing thin, they might at more liberty vse their swords, in which maner of fight the Mamalukes far excelled the Turks) for the most part slaine, and thereft put to flight: and that chosen company of flue hundred of the most valiant Ianizaries, now destitute of their horsmen, when they had most couragiously don what was possible for men to do, beeing compassed round with the Mamalukes horsmen, were all in a maner cut in pies ces and trodden under foot. Thus resteth this Eunuch Bassa in the bed of same, who living had the leading of the most warlike Emperor Selymu his greatest armies in his most dange-

Mustapha in the other wing of the Turks battel, comming on couragiously with his Asian horimen, did fore presse the left wing of the Egyptians (wherof Helymus the Diadare, and Gia. 1) pal, two valiant captains, had the leading) who but a little before had received great harme by the great ordnance that was discharged out of the midst of Selymus his battel overthwart the field:which Multapha perceiving, and defirous to blot out the old infamy he had before receiving ued, did fiercely presse vpon them, so disordered, and with his whole troups overthrew their broken ranks; and gliffring in his bright armor, with a loud voice incouraged his Affan fouldiers, exhorting them that day with valiant prowesse or honorable death, to recover their an-

At the same time also Tomombeius breaking through the middle battel of the Turks horsder caribre men, was entred into the squadron of the sootmen, with his crooked scimiter gisting many a with the lift deadly wound, himself being a valiant big man, and of great strength. The Arabians had ale K fo in a ring inclosed the vttermost parts of the Turks army, and in many places inforced them to turn their battel vpon them, being fore charged with a doubtfull fight both before and behind:when Selymus fet forward with his battel of footmen, and his fquadron of Ianizaries, his last and most assured refuge in that his hard distresswhose invincible force, neither the couragious barbed horses nor their victorious riders were able to abide; for part of them with their harquebusies, and the rest with their pikes, had so strongly for the front of their battell, that nothing was able to stand wherfoeuer that firm battel, linked together as if it had bin but one whole intire body, swaied. Yet was this cruell battel continued with divers fortune on both fides, from four a clocke vntill the going down of the Sun: neither was there any part of sheir armies which had not with divers fucces and change of fortune, endured the fury of that bats E tel: for both the victors and the vanquished being inraged with an implacable harred the one against the other, fought desperatly as men prodigal of their lives : the Mamalakes disdaining to have the victory wrung out of their hands by them whom they had in so many planes discomfited; and the Turks taking it in no lesse scorn, that they whom but of late they had ouercome and vanquished in two great battels, should now the third time make fo strong resistance: fo that on both fides their fainting hands and bodies, both wearied and weak ned with wounds, supported only with anger & obstinacy of mind, seemed yet sufficient to have maintained that bloudy battel till the next day, if the darknes of the night now comming on, had not made an end of that daies flaughter.

Tomombeim vndoubtedly vanquished, and fearing to be vtterly ouerthrown, ark caused a retreit to be founded, that his Mamalukes which were not indeed able to withfrand the Ianizaries, might not feem to be put to flight, but rather as men commanded, to retyre. Which he thought to concern much both for incouraging his foldiers, and for the keeping of his owne credit and estimation with his subjects. For now the self same fortune which had deceived a his first hopes, seemed to him (as it fareth with them in distresse, still hoping for better) to promite him more professous successe, if he were not discouraged; but referring such remainders of his forget as were left; he should againe couragiously renew the war.

The barrell shumbroken off by the approach of the night, the Turks as victors enjoying the tents and great attillery of theitenamies, purfued the Mamalukes untill midnight, who held on their way to Caite, in manner as if they had fied. This great battell was fought upon a Thurseday, the 24 day of Ianuary, in the yere 1317. The Diadare was taken in the flight mortally wounded, and with him the velianneapsqued Bidon; having in the battell one of this legs brokenin the knee with a faulchiou shot, wherewith his horfe was alfo flaine under him, Selymus commanded them both the next day to be faind, either for that their wounds were fup. Selymuse cufeth posed tobe incurable on els sor that it was his pleasure, with the death of those two honorable the valiance of personages to appears the augry shoft of Sizan Bassa, whose death he wonderfully lamented; taine Bidon to The Turks although they fall prevailed, yet was their army greatly impaired even in their be flaine. prosperoya Juccesse and fortunas hactels the fourth part of their army was consumed with lickene fle and the sword and that daise labor had tyred a great number of their horses, beside the long journey they had before endured. For which causes Selymus was inforced to flacke somewhat of his acoustomed haster for as yet he had no experience of the disposition of the Egyptians which dwoltat Cairo, neither could be understand by any certaine report, where Tomombesse staied, or upon what resolution he rested. Which things nor throughly knowne, he thought it not good to commit himselfe and his army into that most populous and spacious city i but flaying foure daies at the village of Matharea and Rhodania, carefully promided for his wounded foldiers, and caused the bodies of such as were flaine to be buried; but the dead carkasses of his enomies he left to the birds of the aire and beasts of the field. And afterward removing his campe thence, that he might more commodiously water, he came to the plaines betweene old Gaire and Bulach.

In the meane while Tomombeine nothing discouraged with so many mishaps, gathering together the Mamalukga from all places, encamped his army commodiously betweene the new city of Caire and the river Nilus; he also armed eight thousand Æthyopian slaves (which kinde of menthe had not before vied, for the remembrance of their old rebellion:) beside that, he opening the old armoury, put arms into the hands of the Mamalukes fons, and Moores, this vassals) into the hands of the lewes and Arabians also, and couragiously prepared for a greater and more mortal war, than before, but for almuch as there were many difficulties in the managing thereof, having almost lost all his great artillery, with many of his most valiant horsemen slaine in the former battels; he in his troubled mind did so cast the doubtfull hopes of his last device, (which cruell necessity wrong from him) that for a smuch as he had by manly force nothing preuailed in open field, he would now altogether vse policy; as he which of late having vnfortunatly made proofe of his strength, his forces yet all whole, thought it not good againe to adventure the fortune of a battell eneither was he in hope if he should so do, to be able with his small power and desperat supplies to protract the war until the heat of Summer, as he defired. Wherefore he resoluted by night to affaile the Turks campe, and if possibly he could, to fer it on fire. For which his device he feemed to have two reasons : whereof the one confilted in the speedy execution, that he might desperatly attempt to do some notable exploit in the night, before the enemy should perceive the weakenesse of his power, which was not great, and scanabled up on the sudden; as also before he himselfe should grow into contempt with the naturall Ægyptians, who defiring nothing more, than to call off the fetuile yoke of the Mamaluke gouernment, with wattering minds expected but some fit occasion to tebell: The other was. That by the benefit of the night he might avoid the danger of the great ordnance; which in fudden accidents, and especially in the darkenesse of the night, serueth to little or no purpose: in which kind of strength he had before to his great losse learned, that his enemies were too good for him. But these his reasonable policies, when althings Were in readinesse to have put the same in execution, were in like manner as the first, ouer- Timombiusth throwne by the treason of as such as secretly revolted from him to the enemy.

For Selymus vnderstanding the whole plot by certain Mamalukes (which having the Kings euill fortune in contempt, as it commonly falleth out with men in misery, dayly forsook lrim) commanded his army to be alwaies in readinesse, and making great fires in ditters parts of his campe, kept most carefull and vigilant watch, By which his diligence it came fitty to passe that the night following, Tomombeisu approching his camp, was repulfed, with no final loffe of his first troups which vnaduisedly were gone on too fare and had no doubt that night there. by received his last overthrow, but that he wisely misdoubting the vironteed light of the fires thining in all parts of the campe, in time called backe, his halting troups, which were them. felues with more halt than good speed marching into the the very mouth of the YFunks great day, the a day of Liverney or the pere i ere artillery, bent of purpose youn them.

Tomombeiss disappointed of his purpose, by persuasion of the Chicftains retired to Caire for the Mamalukes still put to the worst in plaine field, thought it best to proceed in mother manner perfuading him with the whole firength of his army to man all the convenient plan ces of that great city, otherwise exposed to the enemies pleasure, and so to keepe the Turke from entring. For they as mon brought to this extremity, that they must now fight for their dwellings, liues, wittes, and children; thought it more honourable and better agreeing with their antient glory, fo todo in their fight, and in the entrance of their houses, than elsewhere further off. Wherefore the Mamalukes comming home to Caire furnished all their families and flat roofes of their houses, with all manner of weapons : every one of them now humbly requesting the Ægyptians their neighbours, to take up armos against the Turks their antient and mortall enemies, and not to fuffer themselves to be cowardly staine; their goods spoiled and their wives and children carried away into most miserable captivity; for almuch as the mercileffe and greedy enemy, if he should once get the victory, would no whit spare them, although they should as neuters stand looking on, and helpe neither party sfor victory (as they I faid) alwaies full of infolent pride, would know no friend but such as with resolute hand did their vetermost denoire in time of danger for the obtaining thereof.

Therewere many of the wealthiest of the Agyptians, who as they thought the change of the state would be hurtfull to their trades and wealth, so were they ready in all they could to helpe the Mamalukes their old lords: so on the other side there were many of the middle fort of the citisens, and a far greater multitude of the bases fort of the vulgar people, who having little or nothing to lofe, lived in hope now to make a gaine of other mens loffes; and withall, remembring what mifery and flauery they had endured about the space of three hundred yeares, vnder the proud gouernment of the Mamalukes, kept themselues elose in their houses, expecting the last cuent of wars; and secretly rejoycing in their hearts, that the time was come # (God so appointing) wherein their outragious and cruell masters stiould be justly and worthily punished for their oppression and hard dealing; and that which gladded them the more, was, That the reuenge should be taken by the hazard of other mens liues, with which wished spectacle they well hoped shortly to fill their desired eies.

Tomombeiss with much labour and greater care, fortified all the gates and entrances of the city, appointed vnto euery street a particular captain, in euery publike place encouraged the people, omitting nothing that could possibly be done or deuised; and that which in so great a calamity and danger was of all other things the hardest, with cheerefull countenance and undaunted courage made shew of greatest hope. The Mamalukes also, beside the necessity (which in cases of extremity is of power to encourage and make desperate the faint hearted 1 coward) provoked with emulation, straue amongst themselves, who should best performe all the duties of worthy captaines and fouldiers: for every one of them according to his conceit and deuice, caused great ditches or great timber-logs to be cast ouerthwart the Breets; some in couert trenches fet vp sharpe stakes, whereupon the enemy falling vnawares might begaged; othersome according to their store, furnished the windowes and fronts of their houses in the greatest and most open streets, with harquebusiers : all which things with many moc, were done with such celerity, that none of the best and most honourable of the Mamalukes resuled to handle a spade or a mattocke, or to puthis hand to any other base labour; so that nothing could be sooner denised, but it was forthwith performed.

This great and antient city of Caire was not compassed with any wals, yet were there diuers gates and entrances which led vnto it: whereof one broad strait freet came directly from the East gate vnto the castle and middle of the city; the rest were so narrow and crooked, that by them no great artillery could possibly be brought, or soldiers enter without great danger. Into this place especially had Tomombeim conucied his chiefest strengthsfor that he knew his

A enemies must of necessity come in that way for the largenesse of the streets the other part of the city he kept with leffe garrifons. But the innermost part where the castle stood, was kept with a very great and strong garrison of most valiant soldiers : that whithersoener the clamor of the enemy or danger of the battell should call, they might speedily from thence come with reliefe. For why, that city of all other the greatest, could not with io small a power as Tomombeiss then had, be in every place and entrance sufficiently defended: for within the circuit of Memphis (now called Caire) are contained three great cities, which joyned one to another with stragling bridges, make one city; wherof the greatest and most populous, is at this day ealled new Caire. It lieth in length fix miles, along it the river Nilus, from which it is equally distant a mile: the breadth thereof exceedeth not a mile and a quarter. In the midst thereof is a callle standing upon a little rising ground, somewhat higher than the rest of the city more notable for the beauty and greatnesse thereof, than for the manner of the fortification: for in it were many Princely gardens, a faire street with many large galleries, diners faire tilt-yards and courts, with stately chambers opening enery way the otter part thereof was garnished round about with towers, fortresses, and beautifull battlements, from whence all parts of the city, the river Nilus running by, and the high Pyramides, were most pleasantly to be scene. Not far from this Princely pallace, is a lake made by the hand of man, the water wherein deriued from the river Nilus, is on every fide inclosed with most stately buildings; and is a place of wonderfull pleasure, when as a man standing at a window may take both fish & foule, wherof there is in the lake great store. Another lake there is far greater and fairer than this, in form C of a triangle, in the vttermost part of this new city of Caire toward Bulach: it is filled at the rifing of Nilus by a great fluce made of stone with yron floudgates, and being joyned to the great river by a broad channell, is able to beare small boats and barges, wherein gentlemen for their disport yied to solace themselves both by day and night in courting their mistresses. The houses were all gallantly built afront all about the lake, with porches garnished with open galerics, and paued with smooth marble euen to the brim of the lake : there the citizens in their more prosperous times vsed to row vp and downe in boats, and with pleasant musicke to delight the listening cares of the hearers. On the East side of this lake stood a most sumptuous and stately pallace, the late work of queene Dultibe wife of the great Sultan Caytheim, for manner of the building & inward beauty far exceeding the other proud buildings of this pleafant D place for the wals glistered with red marble, and pargetting of divers colors, yea, all the house was paued with checker and teffeled worke; the windowes and gates were made of alablafter, white marble, and much other spotted marble; the posts and wickets of massie yuory, checkered with gliftering black ebony, so curiously wrought in winding knots, as might easilier stay than satisfie the eics of the wondering beholder: neither was the furniture in it inseriour to the magnificence of the building, but fuch as might fitly answer both a princes state, and a womans quaint desire. All which things shortly after (Selymus having obtained the victory) carried to Constantinople; not sparing the very wals, but plucking them down, so to take out the curious stones whole. Beside the goodly buildings about that lake, in enery place of New Caire was to be seene the faire houses of the chiefe Mamalukes, more commended for their E commodiousnesse, than for the manner of their building. The rest of the buildings of the city was but low, teplenished with the common fort of base people. There are yet extant in divers places of the city, three churches of the Christians, wherof one is holden in greater reuerence than the rest, for the same of a low vault in the ground, where it is reported the Virgin Mary flying the fury of Herod, to have reposed her selfe with her child Christ Iesus the Sautour of the World: another dedicated to the Virgin Barbara: and the third to S. George, which among it thosenations are of great same. Vnto the city of New Caire, the city of Bulacha is joyned almost with continual buildings. It is of an high and stately building, lying close vnto the river Nilus, and was in Summer time frequented by the Mamalukes and other noble men, that they might at their pleasure from their high places behold the inundation of that famous riuer. There land all the ships which come vo the river; yet the great meeting of the Merchants is at New Caire. On the other side of the river over against Bulach, are many cottages made of hurdles and leaves of Date trees, the dwellings of poore fishermen and watermen. A little aboue Bulach is old Caire, which is also joyned vnto the new city with continual buildings; yet distant from it about two miles and a halfe, and standeth also fast by the river Nilus. Oueragainst it in the midst of the river is an Island, notable for the pleasantnesse of the gare G dens and banqueting houses therinin it is an antient temple, famous for the love of king Pha. rans daughter, and the danger of Moses (a most antient history, yet every where there still fresh in memory.) But most part of the buildings of old Caire, are now grown into gardens and rude ruins. It is supposed by many probable conjectures, that there sometime stood the antient city. of Memphis. Voon the banke of the river, the late Sultan Campfon built a fumptuous tower. ouertopping the castle in new Caire, to conucy water thither out of Nilus, which being by many wheeles and ingenious deuifes forced into the top thereof, and there received into great cisterns, was from thence by pipes of stone and lead, conucied into all places of the kings great palace at new Caire. About fine miles distant from old Caire on Affricke side, stand the Pyramides, monuments of the barbarous Ægyptian kings vanity; whose proud names and titles H Time bath wome out of those huge and wonderfull buildings, of purpose made for the vaine eternifing of their fame and endlesse wealth; so that of them it may now well be said.

> Miramur periffe homines? monumenta fatiscunt : Interitiv fax is nominibufaue venit.

What wonder we that men do die? the stately tomes do weare: The very stones consume to nought, with titles they did beare.

Within them are the sepulchres of the old Ægyptian Kings, divided into chappels, garni- 1 fhed with stone of great price curiously wrought. Yet are those places loathsome of smell and for darkenesse thereof, dreadfull to behold: for as men go downe to come into them by a narrow way, almost iwarued vp with rubbish, their lights are oftentimes put out with the dampe of the earth and swarmes of remise flying about their eares. Some having got to the tops of them, report, that the watch tower of Alexandria, and the mouth of the river Nilus where it talleth into the sea, is from thence well to be seene; and that for the great height of them, a man cannot thoot an arrow to high as the midft of the lower tower wheron the spire standeth. Of these outragious buildings are written many strange and almost incredible things, as that an hundred thouland men should be occupied continually by the space of twenty yeares, in building of one of them; during which time, the charges for roots, garlike, and onions onely, K amounted to 1600 talents of filter. These wonderfull Pyramides only excepted, nothing is in the three cities more to be wondred at than the multitule of the people, who in number almost incredible go vp and downe energy street; but for most part ragged and torne, for that they which held any wealth, durst not make any shew thereof for seare of the Mamalukes. The common people did then generally line with mutton, hens, and rife, whereof the country yeeldeth plenty: neither had they as yet the knowledge of the curious but vnwholesome forced diffies, and prouocations of glottony, which other nations had to their great cost and hurt inuented. But againe to our purpose.

When Salymus understood affuredly, that Tomombeius was retired into Caire, and that the Mamalukes having thither affembled all their strength, were resolved there to prove the vt- L termost of their fortune: he with his army drew neerer vnto the city, exhorting his foldiers to fet downe themselue that day for euer to vanquish and subdue their enemies, whom they had fo many times before ouerthrowne; and now a little to force themselves for the gaining of the rewards due to their former labors and victories : which (as he faid) would be fo many and fo great, as they had not the full thereof before in their immoderat defires imagined. Telling them moreouer, that there was but a few good foldiers left with the defolat Sultan, who already wounded and terrified, and not able longer to keep the field, had made choice to end their daies in the fight & arms of their wives and children. Beside that, he made them beleeue, that he was voluntarily fent for by the Ægyptians, deadly enemies vnto the very name of the Mamalukes, whose vtter destruction they earnestly expected : and had therfore promised him for M the rooting vp of that wicked and cruell kind of men, to affaile them as occasion served out of their houses, and so to further his victory: yet neuertheles he said, that the accomplishment of the whole matter, and to make a full conquest, consisted in the subduing of those weak remainders of the vanquithed and scattered army; sorasmuch as they were not to be accounted as men quite ouercome, which did yet line in hope, with weapons in their hands, possessed of the chiefe city and seate of their Empire. Wherfore that they should thinke, That in the fortune of that day, rested the good or bad estate and condition of all their lines, honours, and fortunes. Asfuring them, that it would be a matter but of finall labour and travell, to bring it to a wished end, if they would in that new kind of fight (as they had alwaies valiantly in other battels vnder his conduct) but refolue with themselves, that they would overcome.

This is speech much inflamed the minds of his fouldiers, but the hope of so great a prev much more: fo that being in good order and ready, they expected but the figne of the affault. When Selymus entering by the gate called Basuela, did at one instant thrust in his horsemen at diners places of the great city; but his lanizaries he brought in by the greatest and largest freet. At the first entrance of the City, horsemen encountred with horsemen, and made a bloudy fight in the narrow fireets and lanes: but the footmen placing their culurins and falconsbefore, and fuddenly discharging them where they saw the thickest troups of their enemies cleered the street directly before them. But when they came to the barricado's and tren- Am A mortal ches, and were by force to remoue the timber-logs and other like things lying croffe the battet/ought in freets, and so to passe the trenches, the Mamalukes on the other side vilantly with sanding them; they fought with such force and obstinacy on both parts, that in the memory of man was neuer a more fierce and cruell battell feene. For both the Mamalukes and the Turks in that fight shewed the vttermost of their strength and power : not ignorant, that in that, as in the last, they were to fight not for honour only, but even for their lives and Empire; when as C greatest rewards, or else extreame misery, were by dallying fortune on both sides propounded both to the vanquished and vanquisher. At these barricado's the Turks received great losse, as also at the trenches; for they vnaduisedly running on, the hindermost still bearing forward the foremost, tumbled by heapes one vpon another in the couert trenches, and were there miferably impailed upon the sharpe stakes, for that purpose before set up by the Mamalukes. The women also and children, with manly courage threw downe stones and tyles, and such other things from the tops of their houses, and out at their windowes, vpon the Turks : and they on the other side as they could espy them, setcht them off from those high places with their harquebusies, or else violently brake into the houses from whence they were assailed, and there fought with divers fuccesse. But most part of the Ægyptians, diligently observing the for-D tune both of the one and of the other (accounting them both for enemies) with divers affestion assailed sometimes the Turks, and sometimes the Mamalukes, seeming still cotably to helpe that part whom they saw for the time to have the better. Many cruell and most terrible incounters were at once made in divers places of the city: for as they croffed from street to fleet, sometime the one, and sometime the other hapned upon new troups of enemies; and they which as victors pursued their enemies afront, were by others following them at the heeles, flain downe right; fo that in the victory no man could affure themselves of safety. The lanes and streets (a most horrible thing to behold) did so slow with the bloud of them which lay by heaps flaine, that the dust which at the first rose wonderfull thicke, was quite layd, as with a plentifull shoure of raine: the aire was darkned with the smoke of shor, and showers of arrows: E and such was the clamor of the people and soldiers, the clattering of armor, and report of the artillery, that the earth feemed to tremble, and the houses to fall downe.

This dreadfull and doubtfull fight endured two whole daies and nights without intermissi. Along and teron; yet fo, that the Mamalukes in number few, and not able to endure fo long labour and wat. rible fight. chings, giving ground by little and little, and forfaking their first munitions, retyred themselves further into the city. The third day, beset with the greatest danger that could be, as to lose themselues with all that they had, (which commonly enforceth mens courages in their last attempts) they renewed the battell with such resolution, that they constrained the Turks to retire a great way, and for hast to leave behind them certaine of their fiield pieces. With which repulle it is reported, that Selymus dispairing of victory, commanded to set sire upon the F houses; moved thereuntowith just displeasure against the Agyptians, for that Ionns Bassa now his greatest man of war, had even before his face received a dangerous wound in his head, by a stone cast out at a window.

Now were the houses pittifully burning, and the Ægyptians weeping and wailing cried for mercy. The Turks themselues sought but faintly, expecting the sound of the retreat: when newes was fuddenly brought by many at once, that the enemies in the other fide of the city, G were by Muftapha Baffa enforced to retire, and afterward had betaken themselues to flight, as to their last refuge. For Mullapha by the ouerture of the Ægyptians and fugitive Mamalukes. was directed to a faire broad street, where the Mamalukes had left their horses ready fadled and bridled; that if the worst should chance, they might thither retire, and taking horse, speed themselves to such places of resuge as they had before thought vpon. All these horses, reserued by the Mamalukes as their last refuge, Mustapha tooke away, having before put to flight the garrison which kept them, which was but weake, consisting for most part of horse-boies and muletors; as fafe enough in such a place of the city as was least to be suspected and feared.

This accident (as it oftentimes falleth out in great and vnexpected mischances) did not a little daunt the courage of the Mamalukes: who now feeing themselues hardly beset, and that H dereadfull battell by no other hope or helpe maintained, but only by courage; being in their own judgements ouercome, betooke themselues to flight. Most part of them hasting to the riuer of Nilus with Tomombeius (who in that battell had all invaine proued the vttermost of his proweffe and policy) being transported ouer the river in boats, fled into the country of Segeila: others of them hid themselves in the houses of the Ægyptians, and in the loathsome corners of the city. A thousand fine hundred of the better fort of the Mamalukes fled vnto the greatest Temple of their vain Prophet: where after they had a great while valianlty defended themse lues as out of a strong castle, because they would not yeeld themselues but vpon honorable conditions, at last ouercome with thirst, wearinesse, and wounds, together with the fury of the great artillery, they yeelded themselves to the pleasure of the conquerorspart of whom I the furious foldiers flew in the porch of the same Temple, and the rest within a few daies after were sent downe the river to Alexandria there to be afterwards murthered.

Selyman having thus gained the victory, forthwith fent part of his army to quench the fire then raging, and caused proclamation to be made thorow al the city. That all the Mamalukes which would yeeld themselves within twelve houres, should be taken to mercy, but vnto such as yeelded not within the appointed time, should remaine no hope of life. Vnto the Ægyptians also that should reueale the hidden Mamalukes, hee proposed rewards : but to such as should conceale them, he threatned to impaile them vpon stakes, and having fold their wives and children, to burne their houses: vpon which proclamation, many of the Mamalukes before crept into corners, came forth and yeelded themselues, & were forthwith cast into yrons. K All which were shortly after, contrary to his promise, most dishonourably murthered in prifon, (because it was given out, they fought means to have escaped. Many of the Ægyptians which would not breake the bonds of faith and fidelity with the Mamalukes their old lords, being appeached by their malitious neighbours, most constantly died for their friends, for whose sake they had vowed themselves to death.

With this victory the Turks growing infolent, ranfackt every place of the city, drew out the Mamalukes that had hid themselues, and slew them, rifled the houses of the Ægyptians, as well triends as foes, and left nothing thut vp or in fecret. And fome there were, which at one time in the fame houses raged with conetous nesses, cruelty, and lust; every man fitting his owner humour, whereunto he was by nature or custome inclined: for that in time and place of so L great liberty, most men, but especially the common souldier, flattereth himselse to the full, making confeience of nothing, but measuring all things according to his infolent and difordered appetite. The same day that Selymus tooke Caire; Gazelles (who but a little before by the commindement of Tomombeins, was gone to Thebais, to affemble the Arabians and toentertaine new (upplies) came to Caire; but finding all loft, and feeing no possibility either by force or to icy to preuaile, and therefore thinking it not good agains to proue the fortune of war, which had fo often with contrary course frustrated the endeuours both of himselfe and his partakers; he came to Selymus, vpon his faith before given for the fafety of himselse and his followers (which were three Arabian captains, and a number of good horsemen) and being admitted to his presence, in the midst of his greatest captaines boldly spake vnto him as sol- M valour) matter whereby thou mightest excell others in worthinesse of mind also. Whilest we were in arms against thee for our lines and kingdome, our wealth and state yet standing whole, we alwaies as men proudly presuming upon their owne vaine strength, made little account of thee or the name of the Turks: reasto fay the truth, we hated thee as became enemies : But now that we have to the vitermost of our nower made proofe of thy force, and have in all battels beene put to the worfe; admiring both thy wonderfull and divine proweffe, and most prosperous victories (not given thee without the providence of the immartall God) we humbly come unto thee, by thy goodnesse to better our hard and aduerse fortune : that than by Baring and pardoning thy wanqui hed and yeelding enemies (by which only werthe men come neerest unto the gods) maiest extend thy name and same about the bounds of the rest of thine immortall glory. We have faithfully serued Tomombeius, so long as he held the strength and majesty, yea, but the R name of a King or lived in any countenance : but feeing he is (his deftiny forequiring) driven out of bis country and wandreth the deserts, with uncertaine report whether he line or not; we come unto thee, rather as men of him for saken, than such as have for saken their Prince ready to thew unto thee our loyalty and valour in our better condition and state : if we may by thy goodnesse, changing our hard fortune, line and serve under thy worthy conduct.

Selymus, for that he right well knew Gazelles both for his vertue and valor, wherewith valiant men win credit euen with their greatest enemies, and also desiring to joine in league & friendship with the Arabians (or rather Alarbes) whom he knew of all others to be most to be feared, received them all courteously: appointing vnto every one of them an honourable pensi-C on, and perfuading them to forget their old estate, willed them to looke for far greater things of his bounty. Not long after, when as the Moores and wilde Arabians, with certaine Mamalukes that were fled to the city of Achasia, made incursions into the country about Caire, and oftentimes did cut off the Turks which went any thing far from the city to seeke abroad for forrage, he fent Gazelles with part of his army to represse them : who having quickly won and fackt Achasia, and slaine most part of those aduenturers, to his owne great praise, and the wonderfull contentation of Selymas, honourably returned in leffe time than was expected.

In the meane time, Tomombeius in the country of Segesta (which is on the other side of Nilus towards Cyrenaica) miserably beset with so many mischieses, began to make head againe, There were come vnto him a strong company of Mamalukes from Alexandria, which he had D by letters sent for out of the garrison of that city, and many others had followed him in his flight from Caire. And there were not wanting many great men amongst the Arabians and Moores (the inhabitants of that country) which promifed him their help and furtherance. Beside that, many of the Ægyptians whose houses and families were become a prey and booty vnto the infolent Turks, promised him, That if he would by night come to Caire, they would raise such a tumult in the city, as should easily worke the consusion of the Turks; for a smuch as they all having endured most horrible indignities and villanies, could no longer abide those most insolent men to rage and reigne ouer them. They sent him word also, that the Turks huge army was now brought to a contemptible number, most part of them being slaine in the battellat Caire; and the rest being for the greatest part brought to extreame weakenesse with E wounds and ficknesse. For which causes as Tomombeius his forces increased daily, so hope also, which neuer faileth the poore vanquished and distressed king, began now also to reviue in his inuincible heart, aboue the condition of his miserable estate. So that fawning fortune, which euen then most cruelly and despightfully went about vtterly to supplant him (of all other distreffed Princes most miserable) seemed but then first to change her frowning countenance, and to promife vnto him most happy and prosperous successe.

Whilest Tomombeius was making this preparation, one Albuchomar, an Ægyptian, for autho-Albuchomar rity and wealth the greatest man by far in all the country of Segesta, whether it were to auerr discourses the self-man by far in all the country of Segesta, whether it were to auerr discourses the self-man by far in all the country of Segesta, whether it were to auerr discourses the self-man by far in all the country of Segesta, whether it were to auerr discourses the self-man by far in all the country of Segesta, whether it were to auerr discourses the self-man by far in all the country of Segesta, whether it were to auerr discourses the self-man by far in all the country of Segesta. the misery of the present war out of his country; or else by the pleasure of his revolt to gaine power of Tothe good liking of Selymus, vpon whom all things feemed to fawne, came and certified him both mombitus, and F of Tomombeius his strength, and of the new practifes of the citizens of Caire. Whereupon Sely the treatery of the control of the citizens of Caire. mu caused strong watch and ward to be kept in all places of that great city: and such citizens as he suspected to fauour Tomombeius, he shut up in the castle; which being before abandoned by Tomombeius, was then together with the city in his possession: and placed all alongst the River, boates furnished with men and artillery, to keepe and defend the farther banke of Nilus, and to impeach Tomombeius his passage ouer. Yet considering with himselfe, with G how great danger he had so many times fought with those desperar enemies, and what a difficulty it would be to intercept Tomombeius, (protracting the war in those vast and vilknowne countries, and still preparing greater forces, without whom he could nothing affure himselfe of all his former victories) to proue if he might be won by elemency and bounty, he resolved to fend Embaffadours vnto him, to perfuade him to lay downe armes, and after fo many ouerthows, at last to acknowledge the fortune of the victor; and withall to promise him vpon the faith of a Prince. That if he would come in and submit himselfe, he should of the courtesse and bounty of the conquerour, vpon conditions reasonable repossesses that his late kingdome. which he thould neuer be able by force to regaine. But if he would needs desperatly proceed to make head againe, forgetting his offered grace, together with his owne difability, he should H afterward when the matter was againe tried by battell, by his owne just defert neuer more find at the hands of his angry enemy, any regard of his princely state or dignity.

For Selymus seeing himselfe by the course of his victories drawne into a far country, and not was times to without cause searing with so small power as he had left, to be oppressed in that so great and vorte famoir populous a city, cuen with the very multitude, men of doubtfull faith a thought it better by fome honorable composition to assure himselfe of some great part of that he had won, than by going on, to thrust himselse with his army into new dangers, with the hazard of all. Besides that, he was certainly aduertifed, That the Mamalukes before fled into divers countries, were in every place leaving new supplies of horsemen and that the fleet which gone into the Arabian gulle against the Portugals, was daily expected at the port Suezzia, wherein were three I thousand Mamalukes, under the leading of Amyrases and Ray Salomon, two expert captains. with great flore of good braffe ordnance : by which good helps Tomombeius stood in faire pollibility to recouer his former losses, and to returne againe to Caire, whither he was by his fecret friends most carnestly inuited. But aboue all things, the care he had of the Persians most induced him to thinke of peace: for feare that if the Baffa whom he had left at the mountaine Faurus, should not be able to withstand the forces of the Persian King, he should so be excluded out of Asia the lesser, and Syria also, before his sleet could from Constantinople arrive with new supply of men and victuall at Alexandria.

Wherefore he fent certaine of the most reuerend of his Turkish Religious, and with them Les um fler e some of the most honourable Ægyptians, Embassadors to Tomombeius: who passing ouer Ni- K lus, into the country Segesta, were without further hearing, with more than barbarous cruelty flame by certaine Mamalukes which chanced vpon them: thinking thereby to gratifie Tomomlems, as yet not knowing of any fuch matter, and to manifest their affection towards him, as alfo that they were not defirous of any peace with the Turks.

This proud and infolent fact veterly brake Selymus his patience, and shortly after made an end of that mortall war, together with the honour of the Mamalukes. For he being a man of an horand cruell nature, euen when he was nothing at all moued, could by no meanes brooke that his enemies, to often vanquished and put to flight, should so lightly reject his offers vnto them as the case stood, both honorable and profitable; and that worse was, violate his Embasfadors against the law of Nations, most religiously kept euen among it the most barbarous and L fauage people. Wherfore prouoked by so great an injury, he carefully provided for all things necessary for his expedition into Segesta against Tomombeius. And because it stood not with his honour (as he tooke it) nor with the good of his present service, to passe the river by boats, he gathering together all the small vessels and lighters he could possibly, made thereof a large and strong bridge ouer Nilus.

Tomonbeius vnderstanding by his espials, and from his friends at Caire, of the preparations of Seignus, and of the bridge he had made; fearing also the revolt of the country people, whom he probably suspected to be alienated from him, by the revolt of Albuchemar, a man of so great power and authority amongst them; determined once againe to proue the fortune of battell, which had to often deceived his expectation. For he justly measuring of his own strength, and M finding himselfe in all things inferior to his mighty enemy, well faw that he was neither able to protract the war, neither in open field to abide his comming with all his forces; and to fly further into the defarts, was as he deemed it, nothing else but to make shipwrack of that small remainder that was left of his honour and credit. Wherfore by the aduice of his best captains

A (which was the last indeuor both of himselfe and of the Mamalukes) he departed betime out of the province of Segesta with source thousand Mamalukes, and twice as many Moores and Arabians, and trauelled day and night without intermission to come to the river Nilus. By that desperat attempt to deceive the Turks, suspecting no such thing from their vanquished and weake enemy : as also by celerity to preuent the fame of his comming, hoping so by his fudden and vnexpected approach to ouerthrow that part of the Turks army which thould first paffe the river, before they could possibly be relieved from the other side. Neither was he deceiued in the computation of the time, which he having before exactly cast, with the maner of his trauell, fell out so fitly, that he came to the place he defired, cuen at such time as the Asian horsemen were come ouer the bridge, as he had before guessed. The harbengers and pages of Selymus his chamber, which were gone something further than the rest, to make choice of the most commodious place for the erecting of the Emperors paullion; by the rising of the dust, first perceived the comming of the enemy; and Mustapha the great Bassa advertised therof fuddenly raifed an alarum: which fo vnexpected a matter brought a great feare both on them which were already past ouer, and also on them that were on the further side of the river.

Tomombeius presently assailing his enemies, as yet but putting themselves in order, and repai- Tomombeius ring to their enfignes, at the first onset flew such as made resistance, and the rest he discomstantly red & put to flight. Neither was Multaphathe great commander (although he did what note is red). ted & put to flight. Neither was Mustapha the great commander (although he did what possible the bige bly he could, by his owne example to have incouraged them) able either by his owne inquinci- "ade one" ble courage or other persuasion, after his first ranks were ouerthrowne, to repaire his disorde-Nilus. C red battel, or stay the slight of his ment for in that so hot and sudden a skirmish all was full of tumult, flaughter, doubtfulnesse, and searc; and all alongst the banke of the river, both about and beneath the bridge, were to be feen fearfull companies of the Turks, ruthfully looking vpon the river, and crying vnto their fellowes on the other fide for helpe. Many forced by the furious enemy, tooke the river and there perished: others striving at the end of the bridge, to returne that way, and ouerborne by their fellowes or others continually fent from the further side, or else amased with seare, sell into the river, and were there drowned: the bridge was so broad, that foure horfmen abrest might easily passe over at once, and so great numbers of them in short space be conueied ouer. But when the great ordnance (the Turks chiefe strength) was also to be transported, sewer troups of horsemen were sent ouer, than either the greatnesse D of the present danger, or suddennesse of the chance required. Neither did their great artillery as then stand them in any stead, for that it could neither be so speedily conucied ouer, nor without great hurt be discharged from the hither banke to the surther, by reason of their own men standing betweene them and the enemy.

In the meane time Selymus, who in the beginning of the skirmish came downe to the rivers side, filled a great number of boats, and other small vessels with his Ianizaries with their harquebusies, and withall hasted his horsemen ouer the bridge to relieue their fellowes distresfed on the further side: in which boats the nimble watermen vsed such diligence in landing of forme, and presently in setching ouer of others, that in short time they had transported divers bands of those most ready and valiant soldiers: whose comming wonderfully comforted the Asian soldiers, euen now at the last cast, and ready to have given ouer. Canoglis also, the Tartar kings son, and Selymus his brother in law, encouraging his horsemen to take the river, with losse of some few of his men recouered the further side, to the great admiration of the beholders: which in that nation was not so much to be maruelled at, as they which by troups with their horses had oftentimes swam ouer the great rivers Taurus and Volga, no lesse dangerous than was the river Nilus.

Tomombeius at the same time, for that he saw speedy victory to consist in one thing especially, serring his troups together, ftrained himselse with might and maine, to have gained the head of the bridge, that by plucking away some few of the first boats, he might thut in his enemics already come ouer; and by cutting the cables wherby the boats were fastened to the banke, all the bridge with the Turks vpon it, might be borne away with the force and violence of that great river: whereupon rife a most cruell and deadly fight, for the resolute Mamalukes in the front of the battell fought valiantly; and Mustapha well considering the danger, had drawn to that place both his enfignes & his best foldiers: othat there was fought such a fight, as a matter of fo great confequence required: the Mamalukes plainly seeing, that if they could obtaine obraine the place, they should shortly after with little ado, ouerthrow all the former victories G of their enemies. And the Turks no lesse ignorant, that except they kept the bridge whole, they were all but lost men that were already come ouer, and that the rest of the army together with their Emperor fo far from home, and in the midft of his enemies, must of necessity thore. Iv after run the same fortune. But Mustapha well relieved by the Ianizaries and the Europeian hor men, which were now come ouer in great number, not onely received his enemies charge. but pressing vpon them, gained ground, and by little and little inforced them to retire. This is that Mustapha the Hungarian, and Bajazet his fon in law, which for his owne glory and perpetuall fame, built that notable, stately, and sumptuous stone bridge (of the spoiles of this victory) ouer the river Stremon, which at this day men passing ouer into Thracia, wonder at, as

at a worke beforming the greatnesse of the Roman Empire. Tomomberus, to give a time of breathing to his Mamalukes, who, their horses for wearines now fainting under them, were not able longer to flew their wonted courage; and defirous by them again to proue the vttermost fortune of the battell, exhorted the Moores & Arabians, a while to charge the enemy, which thing they after the maner of their fight valiantly performed; and shortly after the Mamalukes having a little breathed themselves & their horses, came in afresh and renewed the battell; with such fury that Selymus doubting the victory (although he was ox to Total by his most faithfull counsellors perfuaded to the contrary) yet doubted not to aduenture the bridge, and in person himselfe to go and relieue his distressed soldiers; who by his comming in, encouraged, and in the fight of their Emperor defiring every man for his part by some notable feruice to deserve both credit and preferment, repressed the fury of the enemy; who in I thort time after, by the comming on of certain fresh companies of Ianizaries, were notably repulled, and fo at length put to flight: whom the horimen which were not in the battell purfued all the fields ouer. At length also the Tartarians (who carried away with the force of the fiream, were formwhat long before they could recouer the farther bank and come to their enemies) were now come in also, and with their swift horses following the chase, augmented the flaughter. But Selymus aboue all things defirous of Tomombeius, presently commanded Mustapha the great Baffa, Gazelles, and Cayerheims, with certaine fresh troups of light horsemen to purfue him at the heeles, and if it were possible nor to suffer him to escape: for so long as he lived, he could not affure himselse of any thing he had yet gotten. These vigilant captains not vnmindfull of their charge, followed fast after him, ouertooke him the next day at the fluce of a K great deepe fen, where he had a little rested himselse and his followers, being then about to cut off a woodden bridge, fo to have hindered the enemies purfuit. Some of his followers being there flaine, and some taken, he was againe inforced to fly. The third day when he had almost lost all his men, and was come with some few into the territory of the Secussan Prince, these great captaines still eagerly pursuing him, and denouncing vnto the poore country people which dwelt in villages thereabout, all extremities and tortures, if they did not with most diligent watch and ward so keep the passages of those marishes, as that he should not possibly cicape; he was so beset on every side, that for safegard of his life he was glad to hide himselfe all alone in a foule deepe marish; where shortly after he the poore Sultan was by the diligent eremblisher fearch of the country peafants found out, hidden among the flags & bulrushes, standing in the L water up to the shoulders, who deliuered him miserably bound vnto the Turks. Shortly after, he with certaine captains and other of his chiefe friends taken in that flight, was brought to Caire. Selymus before resolved to put him to death, and the rather for the injury done to his Embassadors, would not suffer him to come into his presence, but commanded him to be tortured, to to have caused him to have revealed the great treasures of Campson his predecessour, which were thought to have bin by him hidden: in which most horrible and exquisit torments it is reported, that he with great constancy & sterne countenance vetered nothing but certain deep fighes and grones, ouercomming with patience the tyranny of the proud conquerors who atter that, commanded him in base and ragged apparell, with his hands bound behind him, as a theefe or murtherer condemned to die, to be fet vpon a foule leane cammell, & fo to be cari- M ed in derision through al the publike & notable places of the city; that the Ægyptians might fee him, whom they but a little before had adored for their king, by chance of fortune cast into extream milery, by most shameful death to end both his life & empire together when they had thus despightfully led him as it were in triumph, & brought him to the chiese gate of the

This mifery befell Tomombeius the 13 of Aprill in the years 15 17 youn the Munday in Fafler weeke. There were many which thed teares to behold that to cruell and amentable a misthediab spectacle, who by their wofull countenance and pitiful lamentation seemed to detest that of tomombeins. foule and vinworthy death of their late Sultan; notwithfranding that the lanizaries reproued them therefore, and threatned them with death, who like giddy brains fooles (as they termed them) enured to the flauery of the Mamalukes, joyfully and thankefully accepted not of their deliuerance; for the Egyptians were as yet vicettaine of their estate and therefore as men in fulpence (not without cause) stood in doubt what should become of themselves : fearing left the Turks, a warlike nation, and a terrour to all the Princes of Europe and Asia, nothing more courteous than the Mamalukes, should with no lesse infalency rage and cyrantific ouer them, vnder their warlike and cruell Emperor. Besides that, the wosull signs of rimmbeius hanging in the gate, as the vnworthy scorne of sortine, wonderfully wounded their hearts: for why, it was yet stell in remembrance, that he with the good sking of all ment and general sauour K of the nobility, with good fame rife vp all the degrees of honor both in field and court, vnto the height of regall dignity; and therefore gricued the more to fee him by incultable deftiny cast downe headlong, so shamefully to end his life and Empire together. A totable spectacle vindoubtedly amongst the rarest examples of worldly fragility, both to the happy and vinfortunat : the one, not to be too proud, or too much to flatter themselves in their greatest blisses and the other, to learne thereby with patience to indure the heavy and vnworthy changes and chances of this wretched and miserable World. And so much the more did Komombeius so hanging moue men to compassion, for that the majesty of his tall and strong body, and reverend countenance, with his long and hoary beard, well agreed with his imperial dignity and martiall disposition. The same fortune with Tomombeius ran also divers of the Princes of the L Mamalukes, with fome others of the common fortalfo.

Tomombeim thus taken out of the way, and all the Mamalukes almost slaine, and no power of the enemy to be heard of in all Ægypt to renew the war: Selymus dividing his forces, fent them forth with his captaines, to take in the countries and provinces of Ægypt lying further off. They of Alexandria after the battel at Caire having thrust out the garrison, and easily in prised the castle of Pharus (which the weake defendants chose rather vpon the hope of present reward to deliuer, than with doubtfull euent to defend) yeelded themselves many daies before vnto the Turks. Damiata also, called in antient time Pelusium, opened their gates, and submitted themselues to the victors. There was no city betwixt the river of Nilus and the borders of ludea and Arabia, which yeelded not to the obedience of Salymus. The Kings also of M Affricke bordering vpon Cyrenaica, tributaries or confederats of the Rgyptian Sultans, fent their Embassadors with presents to Selymus.

There remained none now but the wild Arabians (a people neuer to be tamed) and especially they of Affricke, who having lost many of their friends and kinfmen in aiding Tomombeisus, would not (as it was thought) submit themselves vnto the Turkish obedience. This wandring kind of people, liuing for most part by thest, had filled the countries from Euphrates, where it numeth by the Palmyrens, with all the inner parts of Ægypt and Affrick vnto the Atlanticke fea, with huge multitudes of men : and being divided into many companies under divers leaders have no certain dwelling places, but live an hard and frugall kind of life in tents & waggons, after the manner of the Tartats: their greatest wealth is a good serviceable horse with a launce or a bundle of darts; they were alway at discord and variance among st themselves, by reason whereof they could neuer agree for the expulsing of the Mamalukes, who otherwise had not bin able to have stood against them, if they should have joined their forces together. So that the late Ægyptian Sultans seemed to hold their state and empire among so populous B anation, rather by their discord than their owne strength : wherefore Selymus having now by fit men, vyon has faith before given, allured many of their chieftaines and great commanders selsmutenn. to Cair, honorably both entertained and rewarded them. By whose example others modued. mingly reduces came also in daily, and having received their rewards, gave their Oath of Allegeance to Sely. the arabiant www. Others which could by no fair promifes or words be won, being cunningly intercepted by other captains, and delinered to Selymus, indured the pains of their vain obstinacy and malice. The other remote Nations toward Ethiopia, as they had in former time rather acknowledged the friendship than the command of the Egyptian Sultans to now induced with the fame of the victory, eafily joined in like amity with the Turks.

About the same time Selymus sent certain troups of horsmen to Suezzia, a port of the red C fee (of old called Arfinoë) about three days journey from Cair; in which port Camplon the great Sultan (a little before the comming of the Turks) had with infinit charge and 4 yeares tranel built a frong floer against the Portugals, who by their conquests in India had taken away all the rich trade of the Indian merchandife into the Gulf of Arabia, to the great hinderance of the Egyptian Kings customs : ouer which fleet (a little before the beginning of the Turkish wars) Campson had appointed one Amyrases and Ray Salemon Generalls, with a strong power of Mamalukes and great flore of ordnance against the Portugals. These valiant Captains having yet don nothing in the ferdice they were appointed vnto; as they lay at Gidda, (the port of the famous city of Mecha, wherin is the temple of their great prophet Mahomet) vaderstanding of the death of Camplin, and of the comming of Selymus into Egypt, fell at vari-D ance betwire themselves, one of them beeing willing to continue his obedience towards the new Sultan, and the other no leffe defirous to follow the good fortune of the victor. Wherupon a mutiny arising among the foldiers, Amyrases, who fauoted Tomombeius, was inforced to fly to Mecha; but shortly after, Ray Salomon requiring to have him, and threatning all hostility except he were forthwith delivered, he was apprehended by them of Mecha (fearing to have Gidda their port spoiled) and so sent back again to the fleet. Ray Salomon, that he might be Admirall alone, his affociat being taken out of the way, and by some notable fact to infimust himself into the favor of the Conqueror, caused Amyrases in the night to be cast ouerbord, and giving to the foldiers two months pay, and swearing them to the obedience of Selymu, in few days failing came back again to Arfinoë, where leaving the fleet, he came directly L himself to Selymus at Cair. of whom he was gratiously received. After that, all the Princes that were before tributaries or confederats to the late Sultans of Egypt, even to the confines of David the most mighty King of Ethiopia (whom some call Presbyter Iohn) without delay entred into the like subjection or confederation with the Turks.

Egypt with al the prouinces therunto belonging, thus brought into subjection, Selymun about the beginning of July failed down the river of Nilus to Alexandria (Cortug Ogli a fa- Ofibic cortug mons pyrat of Halicarnaffus fitting at the helm of his gally) there to take view of his Fleet, Ogli fit more mons pyrat of Halicarnaffus fitting at the helm of his gally) there to take view of his Fleet, ogli fit more from in the life of but lately come from Constantinople with new supplies both of men and victuals, sent from Solyman. Pyrrhus Baffa and his fon Solyman: which after he had wel furueyed, and diligently viewed the wals of the city, and of the cattle of Pharos, he returned again to Cair. In the mean time the Mamalukes in durance at Alexandria, were by his commandement murthred every mothers fon, in the entrance of the prison. At which time also aboue five hundred families of the noblest & richest of the Egyptians were commanded to remove from Cair to Constantinople, and a great number of women and children, of the race of the Manialukes, were transported thitheralfo in ships hired for that purpose. Into this fleet besides the Kings treasure and Bbb riches, he conveyed all the privat and publique ornaments of that most rich and famous city, G with such a couetous and greedy desire of spoil, that the very marble stones, commended either for the excellencie of the workmanship, or beauty of the stone, were violently rent on of the main walls, to his great reproch and infamy. Lying at Cair, he with great pleasure be held the rifing of the river Nilus, which had then overflowed the Countrey next vnto it; and that with such a desire, that he most curiously inquired of the old Countrymen the measure and nature of the rivers for by the divertitie of the rifing therof (which they by certain marks and measures wel find out) they prognosticat sometime abundant plenty, sometime extreame dearth, and sometime reasonable store; when as the violent river moderately or furiously breaking out, somtime so drownes the greatest part of the country, that all the seed season it lieth under water; and at another time floweth fo sparingly, that in many places it scarfe layeth the H dust, therby foreshewing an undoubted dearth. So that the Egyptians then affore themselves of plenty, when as Nilus keeping a mean, pleasantly riseth neither to the highest nor lowest

The Mamaluke kingdom, together with the name of the Mamalukes thus ouerthrown and the conquest of Egypt so happily atchieued, Seljmus resolued to make his return into Syria; and the rather, for that it was reported, That Hysmael the Persian King was comming with his army into Mesopotamia, and so like enough to break into Comagena. Wherfore having as he thought good disposed of all things, he left a garrison of his best souldiers at Calt, and appointed Caperbeius that notable traitor his Deputy and great Commander ouer all that great and new gotten kingdom of Egypt, now converted into the form of a province, as it remains 1 made governor of calculate. at this day. Which honorable preferment so vinworthily bestowed, exceedingly both griened and troubled the great Bassa longer, before inflamed with the hope and infl desire therof : for now that Sinan Baffa was dead, hee puffed up with the estimation of his ownworth and valous, and proud of the wound hee had lately received in the presence of Selymon at the entring of Cair, and to the vtmost of his power suffering no man to grow neer him in credit and estimation, thought himself the only man now lest, to whom of all others that especial and honorsble charge should in the judgment of Selymus and of the whole Army of right be committed. Neither wanted he the general good liking of the men of war, for immediatly after he was recouered of his wound, when he in the most magnificent house of the Diadare at Cair (which he in the victory had rather of himselsevsurped, than by the gift of Selymus obtained) daily & kept princely cheer for all commers (no small means to gain the loue of the common fouldiers) and gaue frankly to them all ; to some horses, to some beautiful slaues, to some money, plate, jewels, rich garments, fair armor, and such like; he won vnto himself such fauor and credit, that wher focuer he should (as the maner was) go to the castle vnto the Emperour, he was brought thither with a great and goodly train of his fauorits and followers, as a man in all mens judgements assigned vnto the gouernment of that great and rich kingdom. All which things highly offended the mind of Selymus, who as he was apt to suspect, and cruel where he feared, so did he also in secret enuy great vertues, accompanied with too much honour and

Ionnses seeing Cayerbeins the Traitor thus vnworthily promoted, ouercome with griefe and indignation (who as a man of a proud and haughty mind took it as don to his owne diffrace) yet colouring his inward discontentment by counterseiting himself sieke, for certaine dayes came not abroad : neuertheles still more and more tormented both with the injurry (as hee took it) don vnto himself, and the vnworthy preferment of the Traitor, hee could not so well contain himself, but that in his choler some words fel from him, wherby his discontentment was perceived. It hapned that Cayerbeim comming in curtesie to visit him, and in the heat of the day familiarly calling for drink (which was water and sugar after the maner of the Egyptians) immediatly after he had drunke, felt such grieuous and unwoonted gripings and tormentings in his stomack and belly, that many supposed him to hauebin polsoned by the Basfa: yet was he by the power and vertue of a more foueraign and effectuall remedy preferued. M Which report, whether it were true or no was uncertain, but certain it is that it did finke further into the mind of Selymus than any man would have thought. He had also but a little before been informed, That many of those rich Egyptian Families which hee had before commanded to be removued to Constantinople, had for great sums of money obtained of Ionuses

A (who had the whole ordering of the matter) that they might quietly and in safety remain fill in their own country. Of which his couert dealing great probabilitie was alledged by such as repined at his honor; and secretly accused him, that those princelike and excessive charges and expences, which he was not able possibly to maintain of his ordinary pension, were royally supported with the imbeselled spoil and revenues of that new gotten kingdom. Which malicious suggestions, as they tended to the lightening of his credit, so also another crime. (whether it were of fraudulent dealing or negligence, or other further respect, is vncertaine) comming in the neck of another, wrought his vtter difgrace and finall confusion: for Selymus after the manner of great princes (who more severely to punish the former offences, notably dissembling their present anger, expect but the occasion of some new crime) with vigilantein h waiting voon his words and deeds, profecuted him with a mortall and deadly hatred, with full purpose to destroy him.

A few daies before it was certainly reported, that Selymus would again returne into Syria, Selymus comthe foldiers appointed to be left in garrifon at Cair, alledging the great diffance of the place, mends the waand the greater dangers they were to expe &, with the labor by them already endured, reque. cristo be left in Red of the bounty of their most fortunat Emperour, that they might have their wages aug. garifon at care mented. Which thing Selymus (neuer spare handed to his men of war) easily granted; commanding Ionuses the stately Bassa, that the sum they required might be added to their accustomed wages, and so entred into his accounts for the wars. But he caried headlong with discontent,made neither the treasurers nor pay-masters acquainted with any such matter as Selymus (1 had before commanded : of purpose that the garrison souldiers deceived of their greater wages promifed them by their Emperor, might even at the first begin to hate and contemn Carmbeim, as author of fo great an injury, that fo the state of Cair, and of that new gotten Kingdom, disquieted by the mutinie of the garison soldiers, Selymm inscreed to change his former surpose, should in stead of that strange gouernor (hated of the Egyptians for his late treason, and not beloued of the garrison souldiers, because he was ento them a stranger) of necessity fead some of his own Bassa's, a Turke, for the better stay and assurance of that wavering and mighty prouince. But al these things (as commonly wicked purposes have their soul events) felout in fine far otherwise than he had in his troubled mind before conceiued. For Selyment being departed out of Egypt, and now on his way almost as far as Ierusalemethegarrison sol-D diers of Cair, the pay day being now come, and receiving no more but their old accustomed wages, moved with that evil dealing (as contrary to the Emperors promise, and their generall expectation) began with more fury and rage than euer Ionuses had before imagined, openly and infolently to infult and threaten the treasurer and pay-masters, and with open mouth to mil vpon Cayerbeim their gouernor. With which fo infolent and opprobrious speeches he astonied (as one not yet acquainted with the fashions of the Turks garisons) together with the pay-masters, in best maner they could excused themselves vnto the soldiers, requesting them not to think fo hardly of them, who were altogether innocent in the matter, but with patience to understand the truth of the cause; wherin if they should on their part finde any fraudulent or euil dealing, they craued no fauor, either refused any punishment. Thus Cayerbeim and the E pay-masters seeking by all means to avoid both the suspition and the present danger, and the mutinous fouldiers no leffe hastning to find out by whom they were so abused, and to be therof reuenged, it was at last with much ado agreed, that trusty messengers should forthwith be feat vato Selymus (who was not yet gon out of Iudæa) to vaderstand of him the truth of the

These speedy messengers having with wonderfull celerity dispatched their journey, ouertook Selymus with his Army a little from Lariffa in Iudaea: and admitted to his prefence, orderly declared vnto him both the complaints of the fouldiers, and the carefulnes of Cayerbeius and the pay-masters to excuse the matter, together with the danger they were in, with energy other accident what soeuer which had hapned since the time of his departure from the City F of Cair. Which complaint so insenced the mind of Selymus with new passions of anger and choler, being already fore alienated with former displeasures, that he without further delay commanded sonuses Bassa to be brought before him to answer the matter. Who although he were inwardly fricken with the guilt of his own conscience, and surprised with a deadly feare, which appeared in his colour as pale as aftes, feeing in the angry face and countenance of his fourraign the most certain tokens of his heavy displeasure: yet as he was a man of great G foirit answered boldly, That he had forbidden the foldiers wages to be augmented, contrary to his Majesties command, not vpon any euil meaning to haue inuerted that mony to his own vic. neither therby to haue drawn any man of purpose into disgrace, as was by some his mali. cious enemies suggested; but for great reason, thereby to prouide for his Majesties Coffee wonderfully emptied with those late wars : beside that, the constant report of new troubles like to arise out of Persia, gaue good occasion for him to spare vnnecessary charges. Wheras on the other side, as he said, the garrison souldiers were already inriched with the plentiful fpoils of Egypt, and in a most goodly city possessed the houses and lands of the Mamalukes, feeding upon the goods of the Egyptians, and had already received both greater pay & more bountiful rewards from him, than cuer any fouldiers had from any his predeceffors the Orba- H man Kings: in which case if they were not past all modesty, they might well enough take it in good part, if they were fornthing restrained in their vnreasonable requests. Hee alledged moreouer. That great Princes which retain their foldiers in reasonable pay in time of peace and war, ought somtime for warlike discipline to require of them a moderation of their defires; lest whilest they all striue with greedines for their privat gaine, there want money afterwards in the common treasurie to maintain a greater and more necessary charge, wars still rifing voon wars: seeing no Commander, were he neuer so valiant or fortunat, euer did any great matter in wars, if he wanted coin, the most proper instrument and very sinues of War, answer ring to his other most heroical parts and sufficiencie. But as he was yet thus speaking, Selymus full of wrath and indignation interrupted him (for if he should have suffered him in longer I discourse to have recounted his former deserts and worthy service don, as wel in the time of his father Bajazet, as of late euen in his own presence, he was like enough to have had of them who were able to do most with him, intercessors for him) and so without further delay caused him even there in his own presence to be executed : saying moreover, that others who would arrogantly prefume to preferibe vnto their Soueraigns what they had to do, should for ever after by the example of that most insolent servant be admonished of their duty and condition on. It is reported, that the foldiers in despight of Selyman wonderfully lamented the unworthy death of this so worthy a man. For he, beside his notable, and rare valour, so many timesto his great honour in fundry battels approued, had by the dexterity of his Grecian wit, comelines of personage, military eloquence, and gallant maner of living, so won the love and sayour & of all men, that there was few or none in all the Army which did not acknowledge himselfe fome way indebted and beholden to him; and did therefore condemn the Emperors cruelty. They then began to tell, how Mustapha fyrnamed Caloger, a man of wonderfull credit and authority both with BajaZet and himfelf, was in the heat of his fury flain without hearing. And in like maner of rage, old Chendemus, a man of greatest honor and integrity of life, and of althe chieftains which came out of the great Emperor Mahomets nursery the most skilful, had bin for his graue and wholfom counsel without cause murthred. Neither was then Bostanges his fon in law forgotten; neither Cherfeogles (the most honourable for the great place he held in court, and the mariage of Bajazets daughter; and the other a man of no lesse marke, being his great Admiral, and bearing himself high voon his infinit wealth, but more voon his wife, one L' of the daughters of Selymus) both which two noble Gentlemen, about two yeares before had their heads struck off, no man well knowing wherefore; and their dead bodies cast out at the Court gate, to the terror of the beholders, as a miserable specacle of their own misery & the Emperors cruelty. Yea, the remembrance of his old tyrannie (renued as it were with this late outrage) presented asresh vnto all mens eies the reuerend old Emperour Bajazet his father, with his two brethren Achomates and Corentus, by right both called vnto the Empire before himself; with many other yong princes of the bloud, of great hope and expectation, who as all men knew, perished through the vnnaturall and execrable cruelty of this most mercilesse man. So that men generally did both feare him and hate him; for a fmuch as he without all fear of God, or regard of worldly shame, accounted no practife wicked, or deuise detestable, M that might serue for the better establishing of his kingdom : and had set down in his minde, (long before corrupted with ambition and tiranny) That it was far better for the assurance of his chare, to be feared of all, than beloued of many: and therfore spared no mans life of whom he had but the least suspition. Howbeit the seuerity by him vsed against this so great a man,

A and fo gratious with the people, may in some fort be excused, as justly mooued thereunto by the prelumptuous & malicious dealing of the proud Bassa vnder hand, contrary to the charge given him by his lord, to the perill of those his great but late conquests both in Ægypt and

This great Bassa whilst he yet lived and flourished in the court, in nothing so much offended the minds of the people (who generally both loued and honoured him) as by the cruelty by him shewed vpon the person of the fair lady Manto his best beloued wife. Who beging a Greek born, and adorned with all the good gifts of nature, whereunto her louely conditions were also answerable, was by Zebalia her first husband (a man of great honor) carried with him into the wars, as his greatest treasure and chief delight. But he slain, and shee by misfortune B falling into the hands of the Turks her enemies, remained to prisoner with them for a time; until that this great Bassa Ionuses shortly after (seeing her among the other Captines there ta. ken, so far to exceed the rest as doth the Sun the lesser stars) surprised with her incomparable beauty, became of her amorous; and in too curious viewing of the captiue Lady, was by her himself taken prisoner. Where finding her outward persections no lesse graced with inward vertues, and her honorable mind answerable vnto her rare feature, took her vnto his wife, honoring her far about all the rest of his wives and concubins; and she again in all dutiful lovalty feeking to please him, for a time liued in all worldly felicity and blis, not much inferior toone of the great Sultaneffes. But long lafteth not the fummer fruit of wanton loue, blafted most time in the blossom, and rotten before it be wel gathered: for in short time the Bassa Jonases nasses.

C more amorous of her person, than secured in her vertues, and after the maner of sensual men, fair vise Man. fill fearing lest that which so much pleased himself, gaue no lesse contentment to others also; in began to haue her in distrust, although he saw no great cause why, more than his own conceit not grounded upon any her euil demeanor, but upon the excesse of his owne liking. Which mad humor (hardly to be euer purged) still more and more in him increasing, he became so froward and imperious, that nothing the could fay or do, could now fo pleafe or content him, but that he stil thought some one or other, although he wist not who, to bee therein partakers with him; fo fearful was the jealous man of his owne conceits. Yet could he not chuse but love those persections, wherat he could not enough wonder, although hee found no contentment therin, tormenting himfelf, and her whom he so dearly loued, with his own passionat dip frust. Vntil at length, the fair lady grieued to see her felf thus without cause to be suspected. and wearied with the infolent pride of her pecuish husband, together with his imperious commands, determined fecretly to depart from him, & fo to return again into her own coun. try. Which her purpose she discouered to one of her Eunuchs, to whom she had also delinered certain letters to be by him conucied to fuch of her friends, as whose helpe the was to yie. in her intended flight: which letters the false eunuch opened, and for the more manifesting of the matter, deliuered them vnto the Bassa his master. Who therwith inraged, and calling her vnto him, forthwith in his fury, with a dagger stabd her to the heart and slew her: so together The faire Lady with the death of his Loue, having cured his tormenting jealoufies. The lively counterfeits Mante cruelly of these two notable personages thus vnworthily slain, the one by the imperious command of som bushard. E his Sourraign and the other by the cruel hand of her husband, thou maift in the pages following behold, as they are by Boifardus expressed.

Rejice Sultani titulos, Nilotica Memphis Quos confert : erit hic invidiosus honos. Regna Tomombeo, Campson, cum rege reliquit : Virtutis Sclymus dicitid esse tue.

Reject the Sultans titles which proud Memphis doth thee show:
From such great honors oftentimes doth greatest dangers grow.
That Campson with great Tomombey lost both their state and same,
Vnto thy valor Selymus doth yet ascribe the same.

Formam si spectes, withilest formosius iste, Pectoris & casti gratia rara suit. Sed dum dissimuli vixit male juncta marito, Infelix misera morte perempta jacet.

Nor in whose chast and constant brest could greater graces lie.
But whilst mismatcht, she liv'd to mourn, inthras'd to jelous brain, Vnbappy she, with cruel hand was by her husband slain.

But leaving this great Bassa with sair Manto vnto their rest; his course thus run, to return again to Selymu, who now come into Syria, was by letters from the Himbracor Bassa or Master of his horse (whom he had lest upon the frontiers of his Kingdom, to attend the motions of the Persians) advertised. That the Persian preparations which had raised such a hor rumor of wars in the beginning of Winter, was grown cold in the heat of summer; and that hee had seen in all the time of his abode in those quarters, none but certaine stragling Companies, who made shew as if some greater power had been comming, which had many times made studden roads into the Countrey, with whom he had sundry times prosperously encountered:

and it was generally reported by such prisoners as hee had taken, and by his owne espialls al. G fo. That Hyfmael troubled with the Hyrcanians and Tartars, had converted the greatest part of his forces against those nations: so that winter drawing fast on, and deep snows already fallen vion mount Taurus, he could not though he would that yeare look after Afia the leffe, or Syria. There were that reported, That the Tartars which dwel betwixt the two rivers Tanais and Volga, were by Selymus his procurement and mony fet awork to keep Hysmael busied, by inuading the Iberians & Albanians which were under his protection; which thing he wrought by means of Mahomet his father in law, the Bosphoran King, who being of the same language and nation, by rewards eafily induced the needy captains of the Tartars his friends and Confederats, to take vp arms against their neighbors.

Many maruelled that Hysmael the Pertian king neglected so fair an opportunity, whereby H he might (as most men thought) have thrust Selymus quite out of Asia and Siria, whilst he was thus bussed in Egypt, yea and easily have destroied him, shut vp with all his power, especially at fuch time as the Egyptian Sultans Campson and Tomombeius made so great resistance. But they which could better judge of the matter, faw that Hy small was not of so great power and firength abroad as at home: for his army for most part consisted of gentlemen, or such as were by custom bound to serue him in his defensive wars, voluntary men, and such as serued without pay. These, as they were the most valiant horsemen of the East, so did they with singular valor worthily defend the kingdom of Perfia, and also as occasion required, make Warwith their neer neighbors : but if any longer expedition were to be taken in hand, that they could by no means away withall, accounting it a grieuous thing to depart from their Wiues; vnto I whom they are so addicted, that oftentimes they carry them with them into the wars; and being a wanton & fine kind of people, are not able without wages to draw after them, according to their accustomed maner, so many carriages and horses as might serue both for their necesfary and wanton vies. With which difficulty the great King Viun Cassanes, Hysmaels Grandfather by the mother, was much troubled in his wars against Mahomet the great. But was now much harder for Hysmael to do, for that he having obtained his grandfathers kingdom by the meer good wil of the people, eafing them forthwith of their heavy impositions, did alwaies think the love of his subjects (which is easily gotten by bounty and justice) the surest riches of his kingdom; and that to commaund only ouer the bodies and goods of his people, their hearts altogether alienated and loft by most heavy and gricuous exactions, seemed not the part of a gratious and natural prince, but of an outragious and momentary tyrant. Wheras Selymus on the contrary part, who had by force, mischiese, and most detestable practises, stept vp into his fathers feat, had after the maner of the Otheman kings, reposed his greatest & most affured frength, in a feruile and mercinary kind of men, whom he might for pay, as his owne Creatures at his pleasure draw far from home, and as hee best liked lead them from place to place, and country to country, for the inlarging of his empire, and eternifing of his name; and therfore according to the quality of his people, deemed true and ready power to confift only in mony, and the scuerity of his own command : wherby he had learned with most happy succes, in a flort time to obscure all the victories of the former Othoman kings, with the greatnes of his own.

All the winter following, Selymus staied with his army in Syria, spending his time in visiting the ports and cities of that province, and fetting things in order for the better assurance therof. But vpon the approch of the fpring, when he certainly understood that by the procurement of Pope Lee the tenth, the Christian Princes were entered into consultation to make war upon him, and that supplications with great solemnity were made for that purpose, and honourable Embassadours sent into all provinces to stir vp the greatest kings of Christendome against him; he (leaving Gazelles his Lieutenant in Syria) by great journies returned to Constantinople: from thence as at hand to behold the devices & motions of the Christian princes his enemics. In the mean time, fearing no alteration to arise in the provinces of Syria and Egypt, for a finuch as he wel faw, that Cayerbeius and Gazelles his Lieutenants, beeing at M deadly hatred betwixt themselues, as wel for old grudges, as for the late treason of Cayerbeins (the greatest cause of the ruine of the Mamalukes Kingdome) would neuer agree together against him, but rather with a certaine emulation strine betwixt themselues with diligence, faithfulnes, and moderation, who should deserue best in wel governing the provinces by him

A committed to their charge; as indeed they did during the short time of his reign. Selymus being arrived at Constantinople, and purposing from thenceforth to turne all his selymuspurps. forces vpon the Christians, caused wonderfull preparation to be made for his wars; but espe fing to insude cially at fea; wherby it was thought that he would have either attempted the strong Island of the christians, the Rhodes (a great moat in his eye) or els some part of Italy, But whilst he was hatching this serves of his mischies, or some other of no lesse importance, and in the mean time delighted himself with backe with a visiting the cities of Græcia and Thrace, and solaced himselse in the pleasant country about Hadrianople, he was suddenly attached with the hand of God, and strucken in the reins of his back with a canker: which melancholy and denouring malady contemning all cure, did by little and little fo car and corrupt his body, as that he, before fo much honoured, became now B leathforme and odious both to himselfe and others.

As he lay thus languithing, his incurable disease still increasing, leaning his head in the lap of Pyrrhus the Bassa, whom of all others hee most loued, said, O Pyrrhus, I see I must shortly die without remedie. Whereupon the great Baffa tooke occasion to discourse with him of many matters: and among st others, that it would please him to give order for the well bestowing of the great wealth taken from the Persian merchants in divers places of his empire; persuading him to bestow the fame upon some motable Hospitall for reliefe of the poore. To whom Selymusteplyed, Wouldft thou Fyrrhus, that I should bestow other mens goods, wrongfully taken from them, vponworks of charity and deuotion, for mine owne vaine glory and praife affuredly I will neuer do it:nay, rather fee they be againe restored vnto the right owners. Which C was forthwith done accordingly: to the great shame of many Christians, who minding nothing leffe than restitution, but making ex rapina belocaustum, do out of a world of euill gotten goods cull out fome small fragments, to build some poore Hospital, or mend some blind ways

appore testimony of their hor charity. Selymus lying thus ficke to death, and rotting about the ground in his tent, as he was vpon theway going to Hadrianople, fent before Pyrrhus and Achmetes, two of his greatest Bassaes, to provide for the folemnising of the great feast, which the Turks call Bairam (and as it were their Easter) purposing to come after himselfe at leasure, as his weake body would give him leaue : and kept with him onely Ferhates, the third of his greatest Bassaes and priny Counsellors. But such was the sury of his foule disease, continually attainting him with intollerable D paines, that shortly after the departure of the other two Bassaes, he breathed out his cruell The deathlost ghost, in the month of September in the yeare 1520: neere vnto the city Chiurli, in the selfe selymus. fame place where he had fomtime most vnnaturally assailed his aged father Bajazet, with purpose to have slaine him, had not the fortune of the old Emperour in a great battell prevailed both against his force and the treason of his owne people. Thus intending the mischiese he could not performe, cut off by a lothfome and untimely death, he to the great ioy of all Chri. The infludge. stendome ended his dayes, when he had lived fix and forty yeares, and thereof reigned eight; ment of Gid. which time of his reigne was nothing else but a most horrible and dreadfull time of bloudshed. His dead body was afterwards solemnly by his son Solyman buried in a new temple at Constantinople, which he to the imitation of his father and grandfather, had for that purpose

E before built. Vpon his tombe is ingrauen in the Greeke, Turkish, and Sclauonian Tongues, this short Epitaph.

> Hic maximus adsum Selymus, qui orbem domui. Nonbella relinquo sed pergo inquirere, Nonvllame fortuna potuit enerterere : Licet offajacent, animus quarit.

Philon Tur.

In English thus :

Lo here I lie, great Selymus, which held the World in feare: The World I leave, but not the wars, which I feeke, though not here. No fortunes force, or victors hand, could take from me the spoiles: And though my bones lie buried here, my ghost seeks bloudy broiles.

The Inscription of the Table.

Sultan Selymus Othoman, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Prince of all Princes; the Sonne and Nephew of God.

> On the right hand of the Table were written Greek Verses to this sence :

The Prince that safely seeks to reign, and hold his state in quiet rest, Must never suffer troubled care to harbor in his princely brest: Nor think it fin to spil the bloud of his most neer and dearest kin. Not of his brother, so therby assured safety he may win. Law, Faith, Deuotion, and fuch like, to break them all he must not spare. Nor conscience make of any thing, to rid him from aspiring care, This is the way and only mean that may protect a princes state. And fet him fafe without all fear, whilst none may live whom he doth hate;

Of him that feeks to work thy wo, deferue not to be counted kind; But take him for thy mortal foe, and plague him with reuenging mind. The rotten lym is cut away for fear of doing further harm: The gentle Prince doth bear small sway, if no abuse can make him warm. Forbearance makes men more offend, and to presume of further grace; It doth but strength to Rebels lend, to thrust their Soueraign out of place.

> At the lower end of the same Table was written in Turkilb Verle :

What Prince in person dareth not in open field to meet his soe, And there with vnappalled heart his deadly darts himself to throw But hides his head for fear of harm, and shuns the danger of the field, When martial minds with courage bold with stand their foes with spear & shield: Let him wel know, how that in vain he beareth arms but for a show, And that the honor of the field wil neuer fuch a coward know. Ne let him hope to gain the spoil by any wars he takes in hand, That feareth with couragious mind his enemies forces to with sand.

Impery Solyman patri moderatur habenas, Regnaque Christianum cladibus vique metit. Antiquam capit ille Rhodon, Nexumque Parumque Tyrrbeni infastat Littora curuamaris. Pannonios multo populatur milite fines, Et cineit muros clara Viennatuos. Inclyta Sigethi dum mænia concutit armis. Cogitur, hinc Stygiam nudus adire domum.

His fathers Empire Solyman doth rule with mighty power, And Christian kingdomes ceaseth not with slaughter to deuour. The antiant Rhodes, with Naxos Isle, and Paros he did take: And on the coasts of Italy did wofull hauocke make. Faire Hungary with armies great he often did annoy, And with a world of men had thought Vienna to destroy. But whilest to Sigeth he layd siege, in hope the same to haue, Cut off by death in his great pride, went naked to his graue.

THE LIFE OF SOLYMAN, THE FOURTH AND MOST MAGNIFI-

CENTLEMPEROVE OF THE TVRKS.

He death of Selymus was with all carefulnesse concealed by Ferhates the onely Baffa then prefent, for feare left the Ianizaries and fouldiers of the court getting knowledge thereof, should after their wonted manner in the time of the vacancy of the Empire, spoile the Merchants and strangers in places where they lay in garrison, and especially in the imperial city; and not so contented after their accustomed infolency prescribe vnto the greatest Baffacs at their pleafure. For preuenting whereof, Ferhates difpatched a trusty messenger with letters in post to Solyman the only fon of Selymus, then lying at Magnefia; certifying him of the death of his father; and that he should deserve well of his peaceable subjects by haftening his comming to Constantinople, whilest all things were yet in good order, in time to represse with his presence the feared disordered proecedings of his men of war.

Solyman having to his great content perused the Bassaes letters, as one desirous enough of solymanhardly the empire yet confidering the cruell disposition of his father (who vpon a micere jealous conceit of his afpiring mind, and for certainwords by him let fall in diflike of his fathers extream dealing, had practifed most vnnaturally to have taken away him by poison: which danger he escaped only by the carefulnesse of his mother, who misdoubting the worst, caused the poisoned rich shirt fent to him from his father, to be first worne by one of his chamber, whereof he inshort time after died) and also that the letters were figned only by Ferhates, and the newes not seconded by any of the other Baffaes: fearing some hidden and secret plot of his father tending to his destruction, durit not adventure ed remoue from his charge, but returned the messenger as one to whom he gaue little or no credit. Tendaies thus spent, and the death of

E Selymus nothing as yet suspected; Ferhates understanding by his messenger the warinesse of Solyman, and that he expected more affured advertisement, fent presently unto the other great Baffa's Pyrrhus and Mustapha at Hadrianople, that they should without delay repaire vino the court : vnto whom at their comming he declared the death of the Emperour. Which after they had seene to be true, they by another secret and speedy messenger adurreised Solyman againtherof confirming those letters with all their hands and seals : whereby Solyman now a stured of his fathers death, presently put himselfe upon the way, and by long and painfull journies in few days came to Scutarium, called in antient time Chrisopolis, ouer againsti Constantinople. Where he was met with the Aga or captain of the Ianizaries, and by him transported in a gally ouer that fireit passage to Constantinople, where at his landing the Ianizaries by F the appointment of their captain were ready to receive him, knowing as yet nothing of the death of selymus, untill that Solyman being now in the midst of them, the captaine with a loud voice faid vnto them, Behold your Emperor. Whereupon they all with great acclamation cried out, Long line the great Emperor Solyman: which consent of the men of war, is vnto the Turkish Emperours the greatest assurance of their estate. And so with much triumph he was by them brought into the roiall pallace, and placed in his fathers seat in the yeare 1520: in which yere G also Charles the fifth was chosen Emperour of Germany. The Ianizaries disappointed by the Bassacs of the spoile of the Merchants, especially Christians and Iewes, received of the bounty of Solyman a great largious, and in the beginning of his reigne had their accustomed wages fomewhat augmented also, to their wonderfull contentment.

Solyman was about twenty eight yeres old when he began to reigne, and was at the first fuppoted to have bin of a milde and peaceable disposition: so that the Princes to whom the name of Selymus was before dreadfull, were now in hope that a quiet Lambewas come in place of a raging Lyon. But in short time they found themselves in their expediation far deceived; and especially the Christian Princes bordering upon him, unto whom he became a far more dangerous enemy than was his father before him; converting his forces most part of his long H reignevpon them, which Selymus had almost altogether imploied against the Kings of Persia, and Ægypt, the greatest Princes of the Mahometan superstition.

The first that felt his heavy handwas Gazelles Gouernor of Syria: who presently upon the death of Selymus, thinking himselse now discharged of the oath of obedience which he had giuen to Selymus, but not to his fuccessors; and earnestly desiring to restore againe the kingdome of the Mamalukes lately ouerthrowne, gathered together the remainder of the difference Gazille pur- fed Mamalukes, which speedily resorted vnto him out of all parts of Asia and Africke : and and parts of said alluring with rewards the leaders of the wilde Arabians, with great numbers of the countre people of Syria, discontented with the Turkish government, entred into open rebellion, and by force of armes draue the Turks garrisons out of Byrrha, Tripolis, and diversother cities I. of Syria, taking them into his owne possession. And the better to effect that he had taken in hand, he feut Embassadors to Cairo, vnto Cayerbeins, who had of Selyman received the government of Ægypt, the vinworthy reward of his horrible treason; persuading him by my meanes to take reuenge of the injury and wrong before done to the Mamalukes, and by killing of the Turks garrison to make himselfe Sultan of Agypt, and roftore againg the kingdome of the Mamalukes, offering him therein the vttermon of his devoire and fertilee. But Caperbaimeither not trufting Gazelles his old enemy, or ashamed by new treason to augment his former dishonor, or els (which was most like) misdoubting his owne strength in performance of so great an enterprise: after he had attentiuely heard what the Embassadours had to say, caused them presently in his own sight to be put to death as traitors, and with all speed certified soly- K man thereof : who without delay fent Ferhates Baffa with a firong army into Syria. Which thing Gazelles hearing, and having in his power most of the cities of Syria, retired himself with all his army into the strong city of Damasco ; whither at length, Ferhates the great Bassa by long march came alio. Gazelles (resolued to try the fortune of the field, and so either by speedy victory or honourable death to end the matter, rather than to suffer, himselfe to be thut vp within the wals of the city) vpon the comming of the Balla, valiantly, iffued forth with all his power, and gaue him battell; which for the space of six hours was most cruelly fought, and many flaine on both fides. At length Gazelles being oppressed with the multitude of hisenemies (being eight times more in number) and hardly affailed on eigher fide, was inforced to fight in a ring, and there performing all the parts of a worthy Generall and valiant foldier, ho- L Gazeles stains. norably died together with his Mamalukes in the midst of his enemies, leaving vaso them a bloudy victory. Gazelles thus flaine, the city of Damasco with all the country of Syria withour any more ado yeelded againe vnto the Turks obedience, which the Baffa rooke in fo good part, that he would not fuffer his foldiers to enter into the city, then richly flored with commodities of all forts, brought thither by Merchants out of divers pares of the World.

Syria thus pacified, the Baffa went to Caire in Agypt, and there commended Caparbeins for his fidelity, confirmed him in his government, and enuying against the cruelty of Selymone. (to to please the Ægyptians) wished them to hope for all happinesse vnder the peaceable gonernment of the new Sultan Solyman. And fowhen he had fer all things in order in both the provinces of Syria and Ægypt, returned agains to Solyman.

The yeare next following, Solyman by the counsell of Pyrrhus Bassa his old tutor (a mortall chemy vinto the Christians) and by the persuasion of the Ianizaries, resolued to besiege the strong city of Belgrade, otherwise called Taurunum, scituat vpon the borders of Hungary. where the river Savus falleth into Danubius, Which city his great grandfather Mahomet (lyt named the Great, and before him the warlike Amurath) had with all their power, long time before to their great loffe and dishonor, vainly attempted. Wherein vntill that time were referued the enfigues, then taken from the Turks, to their no small griefe, with other trophics of the glorious victories of the worthy captaine Huniades, and the great King Matthias Corninus his ion. Wherefore Solyman fending his army before, was come as far as Sophia, a city in Scruia (the place where the Turks great lieutenant in Europe is alwaies resiant) before that the Hungarians were aware of his comming: for they living at case all the time that Vladislaus reigned and fleeping fecurely vnder the young King Lodonicus his fonne, a man of no experience: who contenting himselfe with the title of a King, suffered himself to be so pilled & poled by his nobility and great clergy men (inverting all the wealth of the land to their owne privat gaine) that he was not able to raife any sufficient power to go against his puissant enemy; especially his nobility, in whose hands rested the wealth of his kingdome, promising him much, but performing indeed nothing. Huniades with his hardy fouldiers, the feourge and terrour of the Turks, was dead long before; fo was also Matthias that fortunat warriour : after whom fucceeded others given to all pleasure and ease; to whose example the people fashioning themselues, forgot their wonted valour, and gaue themselues ouer to sensuality and voluntuous pleafure: fo that Solyman without let, presented his army before the city of Belgrade, and with Belgrade mon battery and undermining in thort time became Lord thereof, having loft few of his people in by selyman. that fiege. How much the loffe of that firong city concerned the Christian common wealth, the manifold and lamentable miseries which afterwards ensued by the opening of that gap, C not vnto the kingdome of Hungary onely, but to all that fide of Christendome, did, and vet doth most manifestly declare. It was won by the Turks the nine and twentieth day of August. in the yeare 1521.

After the taking of the strong city of Belgrade, Solyman returning to Constantinople, 1522 brake up his army and there lay stillalmost all the yeare following. During which time he caused great preparation to be made at Calipolis and other his ports, for rigging up of a great fleet: which caused the Italians, Venetians, and them of the Rhodes, to looke about them, as men carefull of their estates, searing that those forces would ere long be imploied against fome or all of them.

About the same time Philippus Villerius a man of great wisedome and courage, then follow- Philippus Vil-D ing the French court, was in his absence by the knights of the Rhodes chosen Great Master of terius chosen that honourable company: who embarking himfelfe at Marcelles, after a long and dangerous of the Rheder. journy (being not without the knowledge of Solyman hardly laied for at fea by Cortug Ogli, a famous pyrat of the Turks, whose two brethren the Knights of the Rhodes had but a little before surprised and slain, and then held the third in prison arrived in safety at the Rhodes, where he was with great joy and triumph received.

The great Bassa, by whose grave advice Solyman was contented in all his weighty affairs to be directed, confulted with the other Bassacs, of divers great exploits, which was first to be taken in hand, for the honour of their Emperour and inlarging of his Empire, were of divers opinions concerning the belieging of the Rhodes. Pyrrhus the Baffa of greatest account, dis-E suaded the taking in hand of that action, as too full of difficulty and danger: producing for proofe thereof the example of the great Emperour Mahomet, Solymans great grandfather; by whom it was unfortunatly attempted, and in fine shamefully abandoned. But Mustapha next in place and reputation to Pyrrhus, extolling the power and fortune of Solyman, faid, That the greatnesse of their Emperor was not to be concluded within the attempts of his predecessor. as well appeared by the late taking of Belgrade; from whence first Amurath, and after him, Mahomet, two of the most warlike Princes of the Turks, had with great dishonour been repulsed: and should no doubt with like good fortune preuaile against the Rhodes also, being able (if need were) to bring more men before it than were stones in the wals thereof. Which he so confidently affirmed, with extenuating the power of the Rhodians, that he seemed to make F no doubt of the good successe of that war: presumptuously affirming, that upon the first landing of Solymans great army, they of the Rhodes would without delay yeeld themselves and their city into his hands.

Amongst others of great experience, whose opinions Solyman was desirous to have, before he would take fo great a matter in hand, was the famous pyrat Cortug Ogli, a man of a mischie- G neworite take to great a master and the world take to great experience in fea matters. Who prefented to Solyman by Mullapha and Ferhates, two of the greatest Bassaes, going before him, after due reuerence done. and commanded to deliuer his opinion, spake vnto Solyman as followeth:

Cortug Oglithe

The creatnes of your deferts (most mighty and puissant Emperour) maketh me (being by you so com. manded) at this time frankly to feak what I think may be for the glory and honour both of your Maje. flie and Empire. I daily hear the pittifull lamentation of the miserable people of Mytilene, Enlora Peloponesus, Achaia, Caria, Lycia, and all along st the sea coast of Syria and Bayps, bewaiting the Spoil of their Countries, the ransacking of their Cities, the taking away of their cattell and people, with other infinit and incredible calamities which they daily suffer of the croffed Rhodian pyrats, no man with. H flanding them. Many a time have these wretched people holden up their hands to me for help, melt in-Santly requesting me to be a mean for them unto your Imperiall Majesty, whereby they might be prote-Eled from the injury rapine, and flaughter of thefe cruell Rouers. Wherfore intheir behalf I befeech your facred Majesty, by the most renerend name of the holy Prophet Mahomet, or by your own mest heroicall disposition, to deliver your afflicted subjects from these their most cruell enomies, and at length to set them free from the fury, captivity, and fear of these Pyrats, more grievous wato them than death it self: And consider with your self, That this insolence and insury tendeth not so much to the hurt of your poor subjects and oppressed people in prinat, as to the dishonour and disgrace of your Imperial name and dignity: which if any other Christian King or Prince should offer, your Majesty I know would not suffer unreuen. ged: And will you then fuffer these Robbers, Cut-throats, base people gathered out of all the corners of 1 Christendom, to wast your Countries, spoile your Cities, murther your People, and trouble all your seas? For who can passe by sea to Tripolis, Damasco, Alexandria, Caire, Chalcide, Lesbos, Chios, nay, vono this your Imperiall City of Constantinople, without most certain and manifest danger of these Rouers? What have we beard enery Spring thefe many years, but that the Rhodians had taken some one or other of your Ports, led away your people into most miserable captivity, and carried away with them the rich (poiles of your countries? And that which is of all other things most dishonourable this they doe under your no e, and in your fight, in the middest and heart of your Empire. Pardon me I befeech you most mighty Emperour, if I too plainely speake what I thinke : For what somer I say, I say it to no other end, but that you should now at length do that which should many yeares ago have beene done. We your most loyal subjects may not, nor ought not, for the increase of our Mahometan Religion, and for the inlarging of your K Empire and Honour, to refuse to adventure our goods, our bodies, our lives, to all hazard and danger without exception. If you likewise be carried with love of glory and renowne, or ranished with desire of neverdying Fame; in what wars can you more casily varie the same, or better imploy ws your servants, than in vanquishing and subduing the Rhodes, the reputed bulmarke of Christendome, which onely keepeth vs from their countries ? But some will perhaps say, your ancestors have in former times unfortunally attempted that city : so did they also Belgrade in Hungary ; yet hath your happy fortune to your immortal fame brought the same under your subjection, being farre more strongly fortified than in times past: and doe you then despaire of the Rhodes? Cast off such vaine and needlesse misdoubt. The Turkish Empire hath alwaics growne by aduentures and honourable attempts: Therefore make hast to besiege it both by sea and land. If your subjects mourning under the heavy burthen of the Christian captivity, built it L with their owne hands for the Christians , cannot they now at liberty, desirous of renenge, and fitted with opportunity, with like hands destroy the same? if it please you to wouch safe but to looke into the matter (most dread Soueraigne) you shall see that there is a divine occasion by the procurement of our great Prophet Mahomet, presented unto your most facred Majesty, now that the Christians of the We ft are at discord and mortall warre amongst themselves. Your Majesty is not ignorant, that in managing of warres, the opportunity of the time is especially to be followed; and that when occasion serueth, allremifnesse and delay is to be carefully avoided the changes of times are most tickle, and if you suffer your good hap now to passe over, you shall perhaps in vaine afterwards pursue the same when it is sted and gone.

Solyman by nature an ambitious yong prince, prickt forward thus also by the persuasions of Coring Ogly and others, feeking their further credit and preferment by fitting his ambitious humor: but most of all by the instigation of the Bassa Mustapha, resolued to go in person himA selfe against the Rhodes. And first to make some proofe of what spirit and courage Villerius the new cholen Great Master was of, in whose sufficiency the greatest part of the defence of the city was supposed to consist: to him by way of a little cold friendship, he sent a messenger with this fhort letter thus directed :

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, greatest Emperour of Constantinople and Trapezond, most mighty King of Persia, Arabia. Syria, and Ægypt; Lord of Asia and Europe; Prince of Mecha and Aleppo; Ruler of Ierusalem; and Master of the Vniuersall Sea : to the Reuerend Father, Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Master of the Rhodes, and Legat of Asia. greeting.

I am glad of thy king dome and new promotion, which I wish thou maiest long and happily enjoy, for Solyman Letter that I hope thou wilt in honour and fidelity exceed all them which before thee ruled in the Rhodes : from Great Master whom as my ancestors have withdrawne their hand, so I after their example joyne with thee in amity and of the Rhodes. friendship. Ion thou therefore, my friend, and in my behalfe rejoyce of my victory and triumph also for this last Summer passing ouer Danubins with ensignes displaced, I there expected the Hungarian King, who I thought would have given me battell; I tooke from him by strong hand Belgrade, the strongest city of his king dome, with other strong holds thereabouts: and having with fire and sword destroied much people, andcarried away many moeinto captivity, as a triumphant conqueror, breaking up mine army, am retur-C ned to my imperiall city of Constantinople, from whence farewell.

The Great Master having read these Letters, and well considered of the same, perceived forthwith Solymans meaning; and that peace was offered him in words and shew, but warre in deed and meaning. Which because he was ready by force to repulse, he rewarded the Turks messenger, and sent backe with him another of his owne, a privat person. For the Rhodians did seldome vouchsafe to send any honourable Embassadours to the Turkish Emperours (with whom they for most part lived in hostility) either the Turks to them. By this messenger he answered Solymans Letters with other of like vaine, as followeth:

Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Master of the Rhodes, to the Turke.

I right well understand your letters which your messenger brought unto me. The friendship you write the answer of of, is as pleasing to me as diffeasing to Cortug-Ogli your servant, who went about to have intercepted Vision to be a support to the answer of the server me upon the fudden, as I came out of France but failing of his purpose, stealing by night into the Rhodian Sea, he attempted to have robbed certaine Merchants ships bound from Toppe to Venice : but sending my fleet out of my hauen, I stated his fury, constra ned the pyrat to fly, and for hast to leave behind him the prifes he had before taken from the Merchants of Crete. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

By this answer Solyman perceived, that he was well met withall in his owne finenesse, and E that he should not so easily carry the Rhodes, as he had before done Belgrade. Yet being fully in himselferesolued to try his fortune therein, he called vnto him certaine of the chiefe commanders of his wars, to whom he opened the whole determination in this fort:

Although I doubt not, worthy chiefetaines, but that you are of the same mind now that you have beene solyman Oraalwaies of, in the inuading of other Nations ; yet I have thought it good in matters tending to the com. tion to bu men mon glory, and good of vs all to vse your generall advice and counsell. Since the time that my father left of war, distamonglory, and good of vs all to vie your generall aduice and counjell. Since the time that my jasher sejt ving hupurpose this World, we have made warre with divers Nations and people. The Syrians by nature unconstant, and of besseing the prone to rebellion, we have by force reduced to their former obedience. The Sophi, that mighty King, ne- Rhodel, phow unto the great King Viun-Caffancs, by his daughter the fifter of King Iacup, in heart and deed Four mortall enemy, not contented with the Kingdomes of Affria, Media, Armenia the greater, Persia, and Mesopotamia, we have with our forces sout up within the compasse of his owne dominions. The last Jeare running through Hungary, both on this fide and beyond Danubius, we tooke Belgrade the strongest fortreffein that Kingdome: And what soener else we attempted, we subdued. Tet for all that (to speake plainly of my selfe) my minde greater in conceit than my Empire, and the bloud of Othoman, findeth G no contentment in these victories. For what soener you have yet done, although it be great, yet I deemeit all but little in regard of your worth: my desire carryeth me further. This have I alwaies above all things most earnestly desired, to set upon the Rhodes, and utterly to root out all the strength and forces, yea, the vers name of those Rhodian fouldiers. And have not you also no leffe than my felfe desired the same ? How often have I heard you crying out, The Rhodes, The Rhodes ? I have expetted the sime shat being difchaocd of other warres, I might here employ my whole strength and power. That we so long desired is now come : there was never greater opportunity of good successe offered, a great part of the wals of the city of the Rhodes now lying even with the ground , which cannot in short, time be repaired, especially in their want of counc. Beside this, the garrison in the castle is but small and their aid from France far off, which will either come too late when the city is lost, or that which I rather beleeue, neuer. For neither will w the French King (being at mortall warres with the Germane Emperour, and Lord of Italy) luffer his storehouses to be dissurnished, or his Ports bared of the necessary defence of his shipping. Neither do you beleeve that the Spaniards (distressed at home with famine, war, and civil diffention) will easily come bither out of Sicilia and Campania with Supplies of men and vittuall. But you may perhaps thinks, that ereat danger is to be feared from the Venetian fleet, and the Isle of Crete, which I assure you is not so for for I know (although I will not now manifest the same) how I have prevented that mischiefe. Wherefore couragious fouldiers (borne to the subduing of all Christendome, much more of the Rhodes) with cheere. full hearts follow me your Soueraigne against these your most perfidious and cruell enemies. How long ! pray you will you fuffer that staine and differace to sticke upon the Othoman Family, and generally upon all the name of the Turks, which these Rhodians cast upon us the last time they were besieged? Which I was not so much done by their valour, as by the unfortunat counsell of my great grandfather Mahomet. calling home Mesithe's Palzologus his Generall in that war, for one valueky affault. But admit that their valour gained them victory, will you alwaies suffer these pyraticall excursions upon our Maine and Islands? The ransacking of cities and countries? The carrying away of your cattell and richest subflance? The captimity and flanchter of your wines and children? The flanery of your neerest friends and kinsmen. So helpe me great Mahomet it shall not so be: I vow in despight of Christ and John, in short sime to fet up mine ensignes with the Moone in the middle of the market place of Rhodes. Neither do I ficke any thing unto my felfe more than the honeur of the enterprise the profit I glue unto you my fellow Souldiers, their coine, plate, jewels (which is reported to be great) their riches and wealth is all yours to carry home with you unto your wines and children. Wherefore let us now with all our forces and courage fet g forward to the befieging of the Rhodes.

Solymans purpose thus made knowne, and the same with one accord of all his captains well liked of: Pyrrbus the eldest Bassa and of greatest authority, who at the first distuaded the war, Randing up in the middest of the rest, said :

I cannot but much admire the great wisedome and rare vertues of our young Emperour, who so wisely and aduisedly hath declared all the deep counsels of a worthy chiefetaine in taking the war in hand. Blefsed be Mahomet, thrice and soure times blessed is this Empire, blessed is our estate, and blessed are we with such a Prince, which carrieth with him in his wars not only men and habiliments of war, but most L deepe wisedome and policy. Which wholesome manner of proceeding, if we had alwaies before our cies, and would follow, we should in short sime bring under our subjection not the Rhodes only, but all the kingdoms of the Christians. Tet beside that which our Emperour hath most carefully and consideratly denised, mine age and experience would exhort you, by gifts, promifes, rewards, and all other means what socuer, to corrupt if it were possible the chiefe and principal citizens of the Rhodes, thereby to enter into their most fecret deuises and counsels : which how it may be wrought, I will in few words give you to understand. I as a manindifferent desirous of peace and quietnesse, will by messengers, and letters induce the great Master to fend some honourable Embassage to our dread Soueraigne, which if I can once bring him vuto, then let me alone with the reft.

This counfellof the old Fox pleafed all the hearers wel, but aboue others the emperor himon againg the felse, who gave him in charge with all diligence and speed, to proue what he could do: the other captains he commanded to prepare the greatest forces they could, both for land and sea

A service. Which preparation was so great both at Constantinople and other places, that it could not long be kept fo fecret, but that news thereof was brought to the Rhodes the fourth day of February: which newes dayly increasing and still confirmed by more certaine reports. villering the Great Master for more certaine intelligence, fent a Christian of Epidaurus, who could perfectly speake the Turkish languege, as a spy to Constantinople, who by secret lerters from thence gave him knowledge that the Turks were preparing a great fleet, and raifing a mighty army, aduertifing him allo of a wonderfull proportion of artillery prepared for battery; but against whom was not commonly known, some deeming it to be for the invasion of Iraly, some for the Rhodes, others supposing it to be for Cyprus or Corcyra: which diversity of conjectures, made many (whole conceits auerted from themselves the fortune of that war) B to be more carelesse & secure. But whilest every man was of opinion, that it was made again (t any man rather than himfelfer certaine aduertifement was given to the Rhodians, from divers places by Letters from their friends and confederates, That the Turks did with extraordinary diligence keepe streit watch and ward in all their ports thereabouts along the sea coast. otherwife than they were before accustomed which seemed to prognosticate some farther matter than the defence of their frontiers. Villeria warefull of his charge, as the marke where. Villerias proper at the enemy aimed, prouided with all possible diligenco great store of victuall, armor, wea- ghance againgt pons, (hor, powder, and what focuer elle necessary for the defence of the city)

The new wals of the City, and Auergne fortrolle, by Bufilius engineer to the Emperour Charles the fift (a worke begun in the time of Fabritius Carallism the late Grand Master, but not C set finished) was now with all diligent labour servoon, every man purting his helping hand vnto fo necessary a worke. Whilest these things were with so great endeauor and labora doing, a meffenger came from Constantinople, (fent from the old Baffa Pyrrhu) a sharpe witted and cunning fellow, who with much filed speech in most ample transpersioning his message, by the way, painted forth the great toward line fle and courteous nature of the Turkish Emocrour Solyman, with the great commendation of Pyrrhau Baffa his Master: delivering from both of them Letters vnto the Great Master of this purport.

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, &c. To the reuerend father Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Mafter of the Rhodes, and Legat of Asia, greeting.

I am certainely informed that my Letters are delivered unto thee which for that thou under stoodest Soluman terthem aright, I cannot explicate both much is pleased me. Trust to it, that I and not contented with the victory I got at Belgrade . I hope for another way I affure my felfe thereof which I will not hide from thee whom I am alwaies mindfull of. Farewell from Constantinople.

Pyrrhus, great Counsellour to the mighty Emperour Solyman, to Philippes Villerius Lilladamus, Great Master of the Rhodes and Legat of Asia, greeting.

Your Letters, greater in meaning than character, I have delivered onto our most mighty Emperour? Pyribu Bassa but the bearer thereof I would not suffer to come to his presence, lest he should be too much offended with will serve to To base a messenger. Unto whom from henceforth send men of worth commendable for their yeares and discretion, with whom his Majesty may (if he so please) conserve and conclude of matters concerning the common good which thing if you shall do it shall neither repent you of the doing thereof, nor me of my counfell. Themessenger I lend bringeth Letters unta you also from our great Emperour; to whose divine excellency how you are to answer, you are already admonished. Farquell from Constantinople.

These letters being openly read, drew the minds of the Rhodians diversly. Such as altoge-F therwished for peace, measuring others after their owne plaine meaning and integrity, commended the counsell of Pyrrhus, laying. That he being an old man of great experience, was not fodesirous of our quiet, as of the quiet of his prince and country; and therfore wished by wisedome to order that which the yong prince fought for by war, fearing the uncertainty of mans fragility, the common chance of war, the violence of fortune, which have oftentimes in a moment with a handfull of men ouerthrowne most mighty Kings with their strong armies. The G perfusion of these men took such effect, that one of the Knights of the Order called Riverse March, a Spaniard, a noble gentleman of great courage, and very eloquent, skilfull alfo in the Turkish tongue, and then Muster-master, was appointed to have been o sent sembassadour vate the Turkish Emperour. Many there were of a contrary opinion, which suspecting fraud and deceit, faid it were good to beware of the enemies counfell rasking, to what end this Ember fage were ? For should we proclaimewar (fay they) against the most mighty tyrant, not yet our professed enemy, who writeth all peace; Or should be instreat for peace, no war as yet procisimed , that he which as yet is afraid himfelfe, many now understand that he is of us feared ? He fides that, with what fecurity, with what face can our Embaffadors go, vnrequefted of the Tukith Emperor, without his fafe conduct through those countries which we daily burne and K spoile ? But they shall shew Pyrrhus the great Bassacs letters for sooth, his protection, his credit and authority shall defend them from all injury and wrong , as though the servant should prescribe lawes to his master, and such a servant as is most like vnto his master (that is) cruell, falle of faith, a hater of all Christians, but especially of vs. Rhodians : whom the mercilefle by rant having in his power, with his nauy and army in readines, shall with cruell torture inforce to discouer vnto him our provision, the secrets of our city and Order. This opinion of the wifer fort, was greatly confirmed by the two much curiofity of the meffenger which was fent who with all diligence enquired of the face and fcituation of the city, of the number and firength of the Order. Whetefore in consulution he was fent backe againe accompanied for with one privat foldier to carry the Great mafters letters unto the Turkish tyrants the tenus I whereof was thus, now to not only considered that the first the second considered was thus, and the second considered the second con

Philippus Villarius Great Master of the Rhodes witto the all to . san suon of Thirtie, greeting and the strained beaming a street

Beware you Acteue not your felfe, mens expeliations neuer deceine them more than in marges. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

The other lettes written to Pyrrhus, were to this effect.

Philippus Villerius Liladamus Great Master of the Rhodes, to

I have aduitedly considered thy letters, with the behaviour and disposition of thy messenger. As I contemme not thy counfell, so I will not follow the fame, whilest my mem of man do spoile the commindes and ports of they lord and master, which I beare withall, by reason of the injuries they have spitained of the Turkish per st. But I will call them home, and will sind Embassaver they great lord: so that them before send message they master they master they master they master they master they master great scale, for their safe comming and returne. Farewell, from the Lines and returne.

But these letters were neuer delivered to the great Turke, or the Balla; for as soone as the Turkish messenger was come ower into the maine, he presently tooke horse, which was there in readinesse for him, and posted towards Constantinople with as much speed as he could lea-uing the Christian messenger his companion behind him, who returning backe agains to the Rhodes, and relling what he had heard and feene, gaue them all great occasion to dispaire of peace: whereupon Villerius fent înto Crete to hire certaine companies of Cretenfian archers. In the meane time advertisement was given valo the Great matter by letters from the Island of Naxos, That the Turks were ready to put their fleet to sea with the first appearance of the M new Moone which thing they most superfite foully observe in the beginning of all their great actions. The same news was brought allo by certaine merchants of the Island of Pathmos, who came to the Rhodes with a great thip laded with cords from Publicat, under the colour, of the sale thereof, they (by the commandement of the Turks, to whom they were tributaries)

A ries) diligently noted all that was done in the city, shortly to be besieged. The great master with no leffe diligence, fent divers of his small gallies among ft the Islands and along ft the maine to learne what might be of the enemies doings. Ioannes Lupus one of the knights of the order, and captaine of one of these gallies, meeting with a great ship of the Turks laded with corne tooke her and brought her home to Rhodes. But Alphon [w captaine of another of the gallies, lying in harbor in one of the Islands, and fuffering his men to straggle too far into the land, was fet voon by a Turkish pirat and taken.

About the same time the Turks by often fires made upon the maine in the night season. gave figne vnto the Rhodians, that they were defirous to have fome parly with them, as their manner was. Whereupon one Meneton a French-man, one of the Knights, by commandement R of the rest of the Order, was sent with a gally well appointed to the maine to see what the matter might be; and with him was joyned lacobus Xayous a pay-master for the gallies, that he might of the inhabitants of the place, and his friends there dwelling, diligently enquire of all things concerning the intended war s for this Xagous, besides that he was a skilfull seaman and one that knew the coast well, had also good experience in civil affaires, and was wonderfully beloued and made of by the Turkish Merchants whose language he had perfectly learned. Drawing neere the shoare, he found the Turkish Merchants making merry upon the maine. with their carpets, cotten-wooll, and such like merchandise about them as they vied to exchange with the Rhodian Merchants for woollen cloathes: vnto these Merchants he gave due falurations gaging their faith for their fafety, and they likewife to him. But being requested C to come affore to make merry vntill one of his familiar and old acquaintance might be fent for, who as they faid was not far off, he answered he could not so doe, except they would first deliuer a pledge for him a (hipboord. The perfidious Turks laughing as it were at his need. lesse seare, willingly font their merchandise, and a pledge aboord the gallies. Xayem then go. ing ashore, and embracing the Turkish Merchants which met him voon a signe given, was forthwith befet on every fide and taken prisoner, and by post horses conucied with all speed to Constantinople, where he was with the most exquisit torments that could be deuised for any man to endure enforced to confesse what socue his cruell enemies could defire. After Xayous was by treachery thus loft, then began their provident wifedome to be highly commended. which were the occasion, that the decree made for fending Embassadors vnto the Turks, was D againe renoked. The hoftage given for Xayess, being brought to the Rhodes and examined, was found to be a simple country fellow whom the Turks had of purpose well apparelled to deceiue the Rhodians: who frankly and plainly according to his fimple knowledge, answered to all things that were of him demanded as that the Turks were making great preparation for leavpon the coasts of Caria and Lycia, and had taken up many foldiers in the countries thereabouts to fend into the frontiers of his dominions towards Syria, for defence of the same against the Persians. All which was true : for Solyman to put the Rhodians out of all suspition of inuation (whom he knew carefully to observe his doings) fent the souldiers whom he had leuied in the countries neerest to the Rhodes, far away against the Persian, as if he had meant nothing against the Rhodes, and so voon the sudden to set voon them with his army brought E out of Europe, before they were aware. But this his device ferued to small purpose, for the The carefulnes great Master perceluing by many circumstances, but especially by that late calamity of Xay of the Grand master. em, that the Rhodes was the place the Turkish Tyrant longed for; and fearing that delay might bring further danger, caused a cessation from all other businesse to be proclaimed, vntill all things necessary for defence of the city were accomplished watch and ward was kept in enery street, the great artillery planted upon the wals and bulwarks, companies appointed for the defence of enery place, the publike armory of all warlike provision was open, all the streets were full of men carrying weapons, some to one place, some to another. At which time agenerall muster was taken by the chiefe men of the Order, where where found about fine thousand men able to be are armes, among whom were six hundred Knights of the Order, and five hundred fouldiers of Creet; the rest were for the most partmariners, able bodies, who in the time of the fiege did great service, encouraged by their sea captaines: the Island people which repaired into the city, served to little other purpose but to dig and carry earth vnto the rampiers: and the citizens (except it were some few of the better fort) were for the most part weake and of small courage, not able to indure any labor or paines, and yet hardly to be kept in order and government, great speakers, but small doers, greater in thew chan imdeed. The a Great Matter having carefully provided and ordered all things needfull for defence of the city, and fearing nothing more than the faintheart of the citizens, caused them all to be called together; for incouragement of whom, he spake with other as followers:

Villerius bis Oration unto the Rhodians.

Valiant Gentlemen and worthy Citizens, wee beare that the Kurke our mortall enemy is comming except we defend our selues by force, one and the selfesame danger a like to be fall me, my knight, and you all. For we have with common confent and hand gricuously spoiled him both by fen and land, and you are by booties taken by strong hand out of his dominions, invicted : and in this day we keepe his people inche. H nom fornitude, and he ours but he injuriously, and we most justly: For his meessours (weary of the dight dennes and canes of the mountaine Caucafue, their naturall dwelling) without right stile or canfe incited only with concrousnesse, ambition, and the hatred of our most sacred religion, have driven the Christian out of Syria : and afterwards oppressed the Grecians in Grecia; where not contensed to have definitions people, with one simple kinde of death (as barbarisme is ener craell and mercileste) they have with might quist and horrible corments, butchered many thousands of that Mexicon. All whom, the wiched print youth (whose mischiefe exceeds the his yeares) an enill neighbour so all men; not contented with well minions of Arabia, Syrin, Boypt, the greatest part of Asia, and of many other places mee, focketh met. ranny, murther, foote, perjury, and hatred against Christ and Christians, far to extell : and foreith him. felfe to the vitermost of bu power, to take from viour I flands, and to fability the Christian Comprise, I that fo at length being Lord of all, and commander of the World, he may no his pleasure santhrow the Christian Citics, kill the Christians, and veterly root out the Obristian name; which he fo much hutch. For the repulsing of which intollerable injury, we have especially chosen this Island of the Abodes for our dwelling place, because the same seemed more commedicious than any other for the annoging of this barbarous Nation. We have done what in vs lay, holpen by you : we know by proofe your great valent and fidelity, which we now have not in any distrust. Wherefore I will not use many words to persuade you to continue in your fidelity and loyalty, neither long circumstance to encourage you to play the manifithence worthy minds are not with words either encouraged or dismaied. But concerning my felfe and my Knights of the Order, I will fpeake a few words. I with them, with whom (as I hope) the Christan Princes and other my Knights of the West will in good time joyne their forces, are most ready and & prest to defend your selves, your children, your wives, your goods, the monuments of your ancestours and Sacred Temples, dedicated to the service of our God. Which opinion that it may remaine firme and first in your minds, if nothing elfe, my faithfulnesse in your warres, my body not yet altogether frent, but able enough to endure paines and travell, the Nobility of these worthy Knights of the Order; their lone siwards you, and their hatred towards your enemies were fufficient to confirme; but beside this, the strength of this city, which this noble Order hath with infinite charges sonotably fortified with disches, wals, some ers and bulwarkes, against all the force and fury of Areillery to fuch, as that no city may worthily be compared, much leffe preferred before the same. It is wonderfully, stored wish all kinde of second and warrelike promision : we have laied up plenty of wine, sleft, and corne, in vanites to shat mither wet wear ther nor wormes can attaint the fame : of wood and wholesome water not to be taken from vis things ne. I coffary for men befieged, we have plenty, and able menynow for the defence of the Giey. All which things promise unto us affured victory, and such end of the warra as wee with for. Besider this, Necessay, which gineth courage enen unto cowards, will enforce us to fight. Tet standath on our side true Religion, Faith, Conference, Denotion, Conftancy, the loue of our Country, the lowe of our Liberty, the loutef our Parents, Wines, Children, and whatforuer elfe we hold deare . Whereas they bring with them the proud command of their captaines, Infidelity, Impiety, Vnconftancy, a wicked defire of your hondage, of your bloud, and ise bloud of your parents, wives, and children. Out of doubte beloved esticans) our good God will not fuffer fo many good vertues to be overcome by their foule vices. W herefore he gow in minds quiet and secure, and trouble not your selves with forboding feare of your enemies ; enely continue in elle fidelity and loyalty which you have alwaies kept inviolate and unspotted roward this facred and honou. M. rable fellow ship, in most dangerous warres, and hardest chances of fortune: and if need shall so require, with couragious hand frew your valour against your enemies, and make is knowne winto the Spaniards, French, Italians, Hungarians, and English, That the Rhodians are of power to down that Turkish pride, mi to anert their fleets and armies from Italy, which they have so many yeares threatened with fire and proved : and will no do her his her with will speed haften and come; if (that which my mind abhorreth to heak) they (hould here premail. Meither will his ambitious youth, in tourage, fallhood and cruelty exceeding Hannibal, imitatte him in that, that having overthrown the Romans in the great battel at Cancetains that the profession of the will preferrly with more than C. & lars celerity, bring forth the treasures his father got in Egypt, and with great flees und huge armies innade Apulla, Calabria, and Sicilia: from wheneches will forth with break into France V and afterwards into Spain and other Christian countries, raging through them with allerwelly. This cheerful freech wonderfully incouraged the hearers, especially the vulgar fort, easily caried away with pleafing words. But whill they in their folity dream of nothing but of trisumph and victory; the wifer fort possessed with care, ceased not to do what in them lay, to D procure, that the good commonly forewished, might in fine come to effect. Among st others, Clement Bishop of the Greeks, a man both for his place and deuout manner of living, had in great reputation among fithem, laboured earneftly by dayly exhortations, to perfuade the Greeks his countrymen, in that great and common danger with heart and hand to joyne with the Latines in defence of the city: for although the government was altogether in the great Master and his Knights, which were Latines, yet the people both of the Island and City were for most part Greekes, who liked not altogether so well of the Latine gouernment, but that they did many times repine therat; howbeit the matter was at that time so ordered by the good perfusion of the Bithop, and good government of the great Master, that they all agreed as one man to spend their lives in defence of the City; and were so far from fear of the com-E ming of the barbarous Enemy, that many of the Vulgar people (in whom appeareth commonly more heat than wit) withed rather for his comming than otherwife. But looke what they had fondly wished, proued afterward to their costs ouer-true: for within a few nights after, the Turks by fire made in the night time vpon the main, gaue fign of parly vnto the Rhodians. Wherupon a Gally well appointed with a long boat, was presently sent forth to see what the matter was : which drawing neer vnto the shore, was haled by a Turke, accompanied with a troup of horsmen; desiring the captain of the Gally to send some on shore, with whom they might more conveniently parley. Which thing the Captain refusing, What, said the Turk, art thou afraid of Xayem fortune. To whom the Captain in threatning maner answered again, Xayem, whom you have contrary to your faith and oath taken, troubleth me not; nei-F theram I afraid of you, whom I trust not; but if you have any thing to say, let me heare it, or els get you farther off, otherwife I wil speak to you by the mouth of a canon. Then one of the Turks comming to the waters side, laid down letters upon a stone, saying, That in them was contained that they had in charge. Which faid, he presently set spurs to his horse and departed with the rest of his company. The Captain sending out his long boat for these Letters, G found them directed in this fort:

When these letters were openly read in the counsel chamber at Rhodes, some were, of opic nion, that it was good to answer the Turkish tyrant roundly, therby to let him know that they feared not his threats. Others thought it no wifdom, with hard words to prouoke fo great an enemy to further displeasure. Thus whilst enery man would have framed an answer according to their own disposition, in conclusion it was agreed upon to give him no answer at all.

The fame day thefe letters came to the Rhodes, which was the 14 of lune, one of the Turks great commanders at sea with 30 gallies, the fore-runners of the Turkish fleet, arrived at the Island of Chos, samous in anticip time for the birth of Hippocrates the great Physicion, & the wonderful picture of Venus left there vnperfett by Apelles, which for the excellencie thereof neuer man durst afterward take in hand to perfe Q: which fruitful and pleasant Island was then at the arrival of the Turks, part of the dominion of the Rhodes. The Admirall of this Fleet here landing his Turks, began to burn the corn which was then almost ripe, with the country villages round about. With which injury Prejanes Gouernor of the Isle (a man of great courage and valor) mooned, with a chosen company of footmen, and certain troups of horse, suddenly set voon the Turks, in divers places dispersed abroad far into the countrey, with such a terrible cry of the country people, and instruments of war, that the Turks being therewith amased, ran away as if they had bin mad, and were many of them slain without resistance. And I had not the gallies lien neer the shore, to receive them that were able to fly thither, there had not one of them which landed escaped the hands of the Island people. The Turks having receiued this loffe, left the Island and put to fea again.

The Rhodiane

The Rhodians for the most part now affured and out of doubt of the Turks comming, by the perfuation of Gabriel Pomerolus Vice Mafter, and other men of great experience, plucked down the suburbs of the City, and layd them euen with the ground : their pleasant orchards also and gardens neer to the city they veterly destroyed; the great Master for examples sake pleafarconts beginning first with his own, being a place of great delicacie lying under the wals neer to the French bulwark: and taking into the city all fuch things as they thought needful for the induring of the fiege, they vtterly definoied all the reft, were it neuer fo pleasant or commodious, M within a mile of the towne, leaving all that place as even and as bare as they could possibly make it; to the intent that the enemy at his comming should find nothing neer the city, whetof 10 make vie. But whilst the pleasure and delights of the suburbs are thus defacing, another more heavy and woful fight presented wnto the cies of the citisens, filled the city with greater The searce fibe mourning and pensiuenes than did the comming of the enemy. The miserable multitude of country people. the poor country people, some bringing wood, others corn, cattel, fouls, and other necessaries that they had out of the country, into the city (for fo the great Master had commanded) lafter whom followed great numbers of women & children weeping, with dishiveled haire.scratching their faces & teating themselves after the maner of the country, wringing their hands. and casting up their eies to heaven, befeeching God with heavy countenance and flouds of tears to defend the noble city of the Rhodes, and themselves from the fury of their enemies. Which multitude of country people, with their provision, being packt vo into narrow rooms in the houses of the citisens, and their cattel starting for want of fodder, afterwards corrupted the air, wherof infued rotten agues and the flix, during the time of the flegeibut after the city was given vp, such a plague and mortalitie followed, as destroied great numbers of the Turks and poor Christians, who knowing not whether to go, chose rather there to dy, than to forsake

The General of the Turkish fleet which landed in the Island of Chos, and was of purpose fent by Solyman, to prouoke the Rhodians to battell at fea, before hee with his whole power came to befiege the Island; came daily with twenty gallies halfe those narrow seas over between Lycia and the Rhodes, leaving the rest of his fleet riding at anchor at the promontory called Gnidium (not far from the City of Rhodes) ready to aid him as need should require. This maner of brauery he vsed many daies together, hoping thereby to allure the Rhodians Cont of their hauen to give him battel: knowing, that if he should therin obtain the victory, it were at that time little leffe than the taking of the city or if he could by cruel fight but weaken the forces of the Rhodians, he should therein do his master good service, and greatly further his victory, by diminishing the number of the Defendants. When hee had many dayes without intermission in this proud maner come half seas ouer, and sometimes passing farther, came and lay at the mouth of the hauen, as it were daring them to fight: the Rhodians not wont to be so braued at their own doors, mooued with the intolerable insolency of this prodd Turk by their continual importunitie caused the great Master to call a councell, to consider whether they should fight winh this fleet of the Turks or not. The Counsellors by appointment of the great Mafter affembled; the Chancellor, a man of great authoritie and spirit, fa-D mous for his noble acts both at home and abroad, and chiefe of them which were of opinion this fleet of the Turks was to be fought with, said;

Sogreat difgrace was not longer to be fuffered, but presently revenged. For (said he) the hugy Floet The Chancellors of the Turks, I do not say at whose force and sight, but at whose very name many men do tremble & quake ding the Rho-(which for all that is unto us no great nouelty, for every year we hear of the like) is as a head to be joined dians to fight unsothese pyrasicall gallies, as members; and then will it be most expedient (which will be an easie thing with the times for us to do having the better both for strength of shipping, and number and valor of men) to give that great head such a blow and wound by custing off these limbs, that it shall ever after stagger and faint for mant of strength : or else there is no other fleet at all prepared against ws to follow this, and then this dis-E comfitedwe hall be in quiet. Which thing in my opinion (though others which fear their own hadowes and the falling of heaven say otherwise) is most like to be true : for the great Turk is not so soil to come hither, the fittest time of the year being so far spent, in the later end of Tune, to be seege this city, and such a city as he knoweth to be most strong wanting nothing that is needfull, and thorowly manned with valiant soldiers, from whence his ancestors have bin with loss and shame repulsed: when as the remainder of the Summer will be spent before he can incamp himself, and place his batteries. And Winter time you know is unfit for every siege, especially in this Island, wher in they can find no haven or harbor to rest in. Wherfore on Gods name let us let upon our proudenemies, and let us not for a few threatning words lent unto vs from a fearfull youth voon a finenes and policie lest we should follow the tail of his fleet bound for some other place, fit stillike cowards within our walls, with our hands in our besomes, as men which for feare and dread durst not show their heads. Which our cowardise and want of courage we (for sooth) call Fabius hu policy. But I would to God we were like Fabius : but I fear we shall proue more like Antiochus, the Biolians, the Vitellians; all whose courage consisted in words, vainly hoping to gain the victory by sitting fill and wishing well. But Gods help is not to be gotten with womens prayers and supplications, or these faint bearted policies, which cowards call admised counself. But victory it gained by administring and u. G.

With these and such like speeches he so mooned the multitude, who commonly conceive most courage upon the greatest uncertainties, that they desired to sight; saying, That they would wash away that foul differace with the bloud and slaughter of their enemies, for mhy, they wanted not weapons, courage, or hands (as they faid) to do stwithall.

For all this, the grauer fort of the Counsell (without whose consent the Master might in fuch cases do nothing) thought it not good in so dangerous a time to adjecture any great part of their forces, which they should afterwards want for defence of the city. The Turkish General deceived of his expectation, and perceiving that the Rhodians would not be drawn H forth to battel at sea, withdrew his fleet twelue miles off, vnto a place called Villanova, where casting anchor and landing his men, he burnt the Corn all thereabout, which was now almost ripe, but forfaken of the people as a thing desperat: as for the people themselves, they were all fled into the city of Rhodes, or els into firong caftles in other places of the Island.

At the same time certain troups of horsmen sent out to skirmish with the Turks that were burning the com, were by a messenger sent from the great Master commanded to retyre. For the prouident General fought by all means to referue his foldiers for greater dangers, which he justly feared in the expected fiege; during which time he shewed himself a most pelitique captain & braue foldier:he many times by day eat his meat with his foldiers, as one of them. and most part of the night kept watch himself, walking vp and down, & resting himself when I he was weary, upon some stone or piece of timber, or other homely feat as it chanced. In time of affault he was alwaies more forward and aduenturous than the graue Counfellors withed, fearing neither that nor enemy, yet did hee more commend diferent countell, grounded vpon reason, than prosperous actions commended but by their euents. And which was most wonderful, among ft fo many cares, in midft of fach divers and dangerous chances hee carried alwates such a grace and maiesty in his cheerful countenance, as made him to be of the soldiers both reuerenced & loued. Al the time he could spare from the necessary affairs of his weigh ty charge, from affaults, and the natural refreshing of his body, he bestowed in prayer & feeuing of God; he oftentimes spent the greatest part of the night in the church alone praying, his head piece, gorget, and gantlets lying by him : fo that it was often faid, That his desout K praiers and carefulnes would make the city inuincible.

The 26 of Iune early in the morning, news was brought into the city from the watchtower deferred a fea feanding upon S. Stephens hil almost a mile from the city, That a most huge fleet was descried at sea, making thitherwards all along st the coast of Lycia. This bad news much troubled the city, although it was not of most men vnexpected: all places were filled with tumult & hurlyburly; euery man measured the greatnes of the danger by his own fear, and such a pittifulery was in cuery place as is viual in cities prefently to be befieged. Herupon publick praiers were made throughout the city, and every man with great devotion befought the God of heaven, That as it was his pleasure, that the Rhodians should at that time be the Champions of the Christian religion, so he would give them strength and victory against their enemies, and to L turn the calamities of War vpon the enemies of his Name. Their deuotion ended, the gates of the city were shut up, and people from all places ran unto the walls, great flocks of women, children, and aged men, not able to stand without a staffe, going forth of their houses to gaze vpon the dreadful fleet (wherein was aboue two hundred failes, as is reported) filled the streets The waler of the and tops of the high towers and houses. The formost of the fleet was the Admiral of Callipolis, to whom Solyman had committed the charge of all his Navy, and to affaile the Cityby sea. The Rear-Admirall was Cara-Mahometes an arch pyrat, who was afterwards slainewith a great shot out of the city. The Vice-Admirall in the middle of the fleet with a great squadron of Gallies, having a faire Westernly winde, strook sail directly before the mouth of the hauen (which was on both fides defended with two firong towers well furnished with flore M of great artillery) and began to row toward the city; wherupon an alarm was raifed, the trumpets founded, and many hasted into the bulwark which desended the lest side of the hauen, which the enemy seemed to direct his course vnto, and was indeed more subject vnto danger than the other. But the Turk feeing himself in danger to be funk with shot from the bulwark. was glad to get himself farther off vnto the rest of the sleet: the Rhodians from the wals with loud outcries scornfully deriding him for his foolish attempt. This great fleet in exceeding hrauery & triumph passing by the city in fight of the Rhodians (standing upon the wals with enfigues displaied) did not more terrific them, than they were themselves terrified to behold the strength of the city, and cheerfulnes of the defendants. But passing on they came voto the promontory which the inhabitants cal Bo, about three miles distant from the city Eastward: which smal hauen being not able to receive so great a sleet, many of the gallies were inforced to ride it out at fea, where they were by shot out of the city oftentimes indangered, and inforced to get them further off. Whilft the enemy was there landing his great ordnance, & other infiruments of war prepared for the fiege, chufing a place for his camp, transporting his landfoldiers from the main into the Island, viewing the strength and scituation of the city, and in what place he might with most ease assault the same: the Rhodians in the mean time were not idle but funk divers deep founds in many places of the city neer to the walls, to discover the enemies mines, and fortified their bulwarks with greater rampiers; in which work every man out to his helping hand without respect of age or calling. The grand Master about that time The rest Mafent Lodovicus Andugus one of the Knights of the Order, into Spain to Charles the Emperour, Ber By embuffa-& Claudius Ducenuillus another of the Order allo, to Rome to the Cardinals, & Italian knights of the Order allo, to Rome to the Cardinals, & Italian knights of the fundion of the Order, and from thence into France vnto the French King with letters, crauing the aid Princer. of these Christian princes for relief of the city, by sea and land besieged. But all in vaine; for C they earled away with the endles grudge of one against another, or respecting only their own estates feturied the Embassadors with good words, but no relief.

At this time Preianes gouernor of Chios (of whom we have before spoken) a man comparable with any of the captains of that age, an excellent foldier both by fea and land, valiant, and therto fortunat, of an inuincible courage, brought up in the wars from his childhood when he had by the space of two or three daies hid himselfe in the rocks at sea, for fear of the Turkes great fleet, came by night in a final pinnace to the Rhodes, having deceived the Turks watch: at whose comming the Rhodians wonderfully reioyced; for the soldiers reposed greater confidence in no man than in him; and if any great exploit were to be don, him the Master trusted The comment about any other the alwaies in arms during the siege incouraged the souldiers, scarched the dation of tre-D watch, furueyed the bulwarks, repaired the breaches, and fuch labors as others accounted extream miseries, he cheerfully indured, as if they had bin but his pleasures and recreations. At the same time also Gabriel Martinings of Brixing most skilful enginier, came to the Rhodes out of Creta; by whose industry, 55 mines which the Turks did with infinit labor and charge make(by reason of the springing of the water, and hardnes of the rocks) during the siege, were all by countermines disappointed and descated.

The city of Rhodes is scituated on a plaine ground, on every side to be besieged, onely The description Northward it is defended with a goodly hauen, from whence it lieth all Westward. Betwixt of the Rhides. it and the hils round about it, lieth a stony plain ground, not very broad, but of greater length; thele hils are full of fprings, and orchards planted with olives, fig trees, Vines, and fuch other E fruits as such dry & sandy grounds wil bear. But what by mature wanted, was by the hand and industry of man supplied for it was compassed about with a most strong double wal & deep trenches, threatning the enemy with thirteen stately towers, and sure against all affaults, with 5 mighty bulwarks, with divers goodly fair gates: & that which was the greatest defence of of all, within the city was alwaies kept a most exact and streit form of War-like Discipline. The desence of the whole city was thus proportioned: From the French Tower (which with the greatnesse and height thereof seemed to mate the sky) stood the Frenchmen, with the Prench Lillies in their Ensignes, under their Commander Toannes Abbinus, a noble Knight of the Order. From thence to Saint Georges Gate lay the ftout Germanes with the Eagle in their Ensignes. In the third station were placed the French Avernois, with the Spaniards, for that the ditches in that place were neither fo deep nor broad as cliwhere. In the fift place lay the English garrison, ouer whom the grand Master himself commanded. After them succeeded they of Narbona and last of all the Italians, in valor not inscrior to any of the rest, vnder the leading of Petrus Balinus and Gregorius Morgutas. In every of these stations were diners valiant Knights of the Order, whose names (worthy of eternall memory) for breuity we passe ouer, all men of themselves sufficient to have taken vpon them, the whole charge.

The enemie was not as busic without the city in placing his battery, but traiterous minds Incentific was used as business within, to have betraied the same. A Turkish woman, saue to one of the right citifens, had conspired with certain other her complices, at such time as the Turks should as fault the town, at one instant to set on fire the houses wherin they dwelt, in divers parts of the city, that the defendants drawn from the wals to quench the fire, the Turks in the mean time might the more easily enter. But this treason was in good time remailed, and the offenders worthilvexecuted.

The Turks had not as yet placed their battery, when as they took a certaine hill whereon flood a church dedicated to Cosmus and Damianus, directly ouer against the English station. From thence (as it seemed, rather for exercising of their soldiers, than for any great harm they u could do fo far off) they began with final battering pieces to shoot into the city, & afterward they began to dig mines, and to cast up trenches for the performing of which kinde of worke and for the filling up of the towne ditches, they had brought with them twenty thousand pioners, men better acquainted with country labor and keeping of cattel, than with wars; which being inforced vnto their labor day and night, somtime with stripes, and somtime with death The pais fullets did with incredible celerity bring that to passe, which was before thought impossible. They cutwaies through the hard stony rocks, raising the plains as high as mountaines, with each brought two miles off, and laying the mountains cuen with the plains, and yet they did never work in fafety, but were miserably rent in funder by the great ordnance out of the town; and that which most of all troubled them, the Rhodians fallying our vpon those over-laboured I people, having neither courage nor skil to defend themselves, but trusting only to their beels flew great numbers of them, and not of them only, but of others also appointed for theirdefence, whom the Rhodians, taking courage of their fear, fiercely purfued and flew downtight. And when many others issuing out of the camp in great companies, thought to have relieved their fellows, the great ordnance before of purpole placed to most advantage, so thundered from the wals among the thickest of them, that the ground lay covered with the bodies and weapons of the dead Turks. With which manner of fight, after the Rhodians had twice or thrice troubled the enemy, the Turkes for more fafety wrought most voon their mounts by night, keeping most strong watch for defence of their pioners, which for more assurance they doubled in the day time, and bent their Artillery against the places which the Rhodians yield K to fally out at:which did not fo much keep them in, as the feare of weakening themselves by often fallies; knowing that one man was vnto them more loffe, than vnto the enemy an hun-The Twites de dred. Among others which in the beginning of this great siege forced the vitermost of their crited by erguage perfectly, with leave of the grand Master (difguising themselves in the habit of Turki) departed by night out of the hauen in a smal boat, loded with apples, plums, peares, mellons, grapes, and such other fruits as the time of the year afforded; and in the darknes came alongst the coast, unto that part of the Island wherunto the passage was out of the maine. There, as if they had bin Turks come from the main, they landed their commodities, which the Turkish foldiers bought greedily. When they had thus fould their fruits, and in felling thereof dili- L' gently noted the speech and talk of the soldiers and were now ready to departs certain Turks which greatly disliked the hard beginning of this siege seeing themselves if they did but stir in danger to be fet off with shotout of the Towne, earnestly requested the mariners to take them into the main which to do, at the first the mariners diffembling, refused as a thing date gerous; and besides that, their boat was too little to receive so many as would willingly have gon with them. Yet with much ado they fuffered themselves to be intreated to take in seven or eight, fuch a number as they could wel mafter : who in hope of paffing ouer into the main, were (contrary to their expectation) brought prisoners to the Rhodes, where they were by Eiro ianes brought up to the top of the highest tower of S. Johns church, from whence they might fee all about the country, and wel defery all the maner of the Turks camp, which they, fimply M discourred unto the captain, and what soeuer els they were demanded; and among other things confessed, that the soldiers were greatly discontented with the siege, having in the beginning therof lost somany men, and that they were ready to rise in mutinie against their Captaines, and would hardly by them be commanded out of their trenches and cabbins faying, That all

a they did was but loft loft labor, and that they should find it another piece of work to win the Rhodes, than they had at Belgrade: wherfore if they were wife they should in time depart, before they had received further harm both from the enemy, and for want of necessaries, wherewith the foldiers began already to be pinched. All which was then supposed to have bin spoken by the captiues to please him in whose power they now were yet it appeared asterward to be all true; for Pyrrhus Bassa considering the troubled state of the Camp, and the generall discontentment of the foldiers, whom he was gladder at that time to please than to punish, write unto Solyman at Constantinople, That if hee would the fiege should goe forward, hee should without delay come in person himself to the Camp; for that the souldiers without regard of shame, were ready to rife in mutiny, and to abandon the siege, refusing to be commaunded by B their captains.

In the mean time whilft Solyman prepareth himself to fee forward, the Tutkish Captaines understood by certain Fugitiues (wherof in all wars some are to be found) that the high seeple of S. Johns church served them of the town for a watch-tower: for which cause, and for dehight of the crosse standing upon the top therof, they labored nothing more, than with continual shot to beat down that Tower; which whilst they were doing with great diligence, Soly- Solyman comes man himself came into the camp the 28 of August in the afternoon, where finding in his Ar- into the camp, mvall the signes of cowardife and fear that could be spoken of ordenised, and nothing done according to the command of such as he had appointed for that charge, but all things out of order, he took more griefe to fee that great disorder, than he did pleasure & good hope of two hundred thousand foldiers that were then in his army. Yet, for all that he was inwardly chafed with the heat of youth and indignation, both against his owne people and the Rhodians. he moderated himself betwixthis own rage and the offence of his soldiers; and calling them together canfed them to be difarmed, not leaning among them fo much as a fword; and compassing them in with fifteen thousand harquebusiers whom he had brought with him wel appointed he kept into his royal leat, there fee on high for that purpose, where sitting down, he pauled a good while without any word speaking, as if he had considered with himselfe, whether he should only punish the authors of the mutiny, or else with the punishment of many to revenge fo foul a fedition, little differing from an open schellion. But following of himfelf the milder resolution, he thought it sufficient to correct the multirude and common fort D of soldiers with sharp and bitter words : and after generall silence made, brake out into this cholerick fpeech

Slaves (quoth ho) for I cannot find in my heart to call you foldiers, What kind of men are you now be- Solyman cho. come? are ye Turks? men wont to fight and ouercome. Verily I fee the bodies, countenances, attyre, and write Oration habit of my foldiers; but the deeds, speeches, countenances and denices of cowardly and viletraitors. Alas to bu folding. how hath my opinion deceived me? that Turkish force and courage is gon; the valor and strength both of bodies and minds wherwith the Arabians, Perlians, Syrians, Boyptians, Servians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Epirots, Macedonians, and Thracians were subdued, is lost : forgetting your countrey, your Oath, the command of your captains, your obedience, and all other warlike discipline, you have against the Majestie B of myne Empire refused to fight, like cowards betaken your selves to flight, for vain fear of death & danger, not beforming men of war. If any man should at home but have named the Rhodes, in your Feasts, among st your pots, in your affemblies and great meetings, you could then with your tongues brag to pul it down, you had much ado to hold your hands : here when I would make proof of your force and courage, it is nothing. But you thought perhaps that the Rhodians fo foon as they faw your enfigns before their gates, would firmitedy geeld themselves and their city into your power. Let all mencease so to say or thinke, and beleeve me that know the truth, This base and infamous den which you see, is ful of most cruel beasts, whose maknes we firall neuer same without much labor and bloudshed. Yet shall we tame them ; for why nothing is 6 wild but at length it may be tamed : which whiles I bring to passe, I have fully resolved and vowed to my felf, either here to die, or frend my daies. And if ever I do or fay oi herwife, let this my head, my Fleet, myne army and empire be for ever accurfed and unfortunat.

And so without further speech, desiring rather to be accounted of his soldiers gentle than feuere, he pardoned them all their former offences, and swore them al again to his obedience.

The urks

This mutiny fo appealed, all things afterward were don with better fuccesse, and greater care G both of the foldiers and commanders. First they planted in divers places twelve greatBombards, wherewith they threw up flones of hugy weight into the air, which falling down into the city, might break down the houses and what soeuer els they lighted vpon: with the fall of one of these the great Master was like to have bin slain. Howbeit this prooued a device of more terrour than danger: for with 200 such shot were but ten men slaine. Which thing amongst others Apella a traiterous fugitiue declared vnto the Enemy, with whom he had intelligence, as he himfelf confessed, being taken upon suspicion and examined : for which his treason he was infly executed.

The force of the battery was more feared, wherin the Turks had planted forty great pieces or battery, and among it them twelue Basilisks; so aprly named of the Serpent Basiliscan, who H as Pliny writeth, killeth man or beaft with his fight. With these pieces the Turks battered the wals continually, but lying formwhat far off, did no great harm.

At the same time also solyman caused battery to be laid against the tower of S. Nicolan, stan. ding voon a narrow piece of ground pointing far into the fea, defending the hauen voon the right hand, where sometime stood the great Colossus of the Sunne, accounted the greatesta. mong the feuen wonders of the world. Which Castle was both strongly and sumptuously built at the charges of the dukes of Bourgondy, as appeared by their Arms there ingaruen in marble. This tower was valiantly defended by Guido a Frenchman, who had the charge therof with 200 foldiers, among whom were 30 Knights of the Order.

The Turks artillery planted against the tower was by the skilfulnes of the Christian Cannoniers in short time dismounted with shot from the tower, and many of the Gunners slain; so that they were glad to surcease any more to batter the tower by day, but lying still all the day, they began to batter the same by night, whetin they preuailed no more than they had before don in the day time: for the defendants warlly observing such places as were likest for the enemy to place his battery in, did so aptly place their ordnance against the same, and to so good purpose, that the Turks swore their doings were by some means discouered vnto the Bnemies. Sowhen they had in vain bestowed 500 shot, and made a small breach which they durst not once attempt to enter, they shamefully abandoned that place also.

All this while Pyrrha was buffe in working of mines to undermine the City; 32 of which mines the defendants frustrated with countermines; in which kind of work many were loft g on both sides. Yet for all the carefulnes of the Christians, the English bulwark was undermined by the enemy, & vpon the fourth of September part therof blown vp, with fuch violence, that vnto them in the city it seemed at the first to be a generall earthquake ; and divers Englith men were therwith ouerwhelmed. The Turks attempting prefently to enter, were by the Grand Master and his followers with great slaughter repulsed.

But Muftapha the Baffa comming on with fresh supplies, and crying out of the cowardise of them that retyred, renued the affault, where for a while was fought a most sharp and cruell fight, the leaders cheerfully incouraging their foldiers, & they likewise doing what was polfible for men to do; all mens ears were filled with the thundring of the shot, noise of trumpets and drums, and cries of men. And unto the Turkes it seemed that it rained ouer their heads L deadly that and flones of fire: for the townsmen and women mingled with the souldiers, cast down upon the Turks fire, stones, timber, and what soeuer els came to hand; so that they wable longer to endure the courage and force of the Christians, turned their backs and ran away by heaps, not expecting any fign of retreit, every man feeking to faue one: among whom as they fled, the great ordnance shot off from the wals made wonderful slaughter. At this affault of the Turks were flain, as some write, almost 2000, and amongst them the master of the Turkes ordnance, a man whom Solyman greatly loued: which victory the Christians gained not without some losse; for besides some sew others that were stain, fifty Knights of the Order (men worthy of eternal memory) ended their daies alfo.

The fift day after (which was the ninth of September) Solyman by the perfusion of Multa- M fasti the Eng. pha the great Bassa, commanded a fresh assault to be given to the English bulwarke; which the authorized was attempted by the Turks with greater resolution than the first. Sevenensigns of the Turks and are against were broken in by the ruines of the Bulwarke, and had inforced the Defendants, oppressed with number to give ground when the graund Master comming in with the ensigne of the Order, garded with a company of most valiant Knights, draue them out againe basforce, and made good the place. Mustapha seeing his men retyre, couragiously restored the battell, by bringing on of new supply; and other captains with threats, strokes, and terror of death inforced the foldiers (who had before turned their backs) now again to fight. So that there began a more cruel fight than had before bin from the beginning of the fiege: which was vnto the Christians more dangerous, for that they were ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkish short. But in this extremity no man regarded either danger or life, only this they remembred, that those were their barbarous enemies, whom they must either victoriously vanquish. or dietherfore. With which fury the affault was continued by the space of three hours, vntil B at length Mustapha with his Turks discouraged, with the losse of 2000 of their fellows, & of three great noblemen whom Solyman especially fauored, and fore beaten by the Spaniards out of their flankers, were inforced to retyre. Few of the Christians, in respect of so many Enemies.were flain:yet had the enfigne of the Order been then loft (Ioachimus Cluys the Enfignebearer having both his eies (hot out) had not Emericus Ruiaulx an Avernois, and one of the Knights of the Order, with incredible courage rescued the same.

After this second assault, falling out so voluckily vnto the Turks, Mustapha the great Bassa Mustapha Bassa began to grow in contempt with Solyman and Pyrrhus to keep his credit by doing fomething, fafali inte difwith continual battery of 17 great pieces, did batter the mount neer unto the Italian bulwark. Iman. Atwhich time also Cassus governor of Bythinia, another of the Turks great commanders, la-

C bored by undermining to have overthrown the French bulwark: fo glad they were to attempt any thing to content their imperious great lord and master. But the indeauors of Cassus was by countermines, through the carefull diligence of Gabriel Chierus having charge of those works, frustrated; and Pyrrhus in the other place after he had by hot assault slain them which were appointed for the defence therof, and gained the mount, and brought a great feare youn the city, was again with great losse shamefully repulsed, and by Solymans commandment caused to retyre. At this assault the governor of Eubcea, Solyman's Lieutenant Generall, a man of great honor (if any of the Turks flaues are fo to be accounted) was flain, for whose death Solyman was exceeding pensive and heavy.

Must apha the Bassa finding himself in disgrace with Solyman for the two vnfortunat assaults The English D by him given at the English station, determined if it were possible, by a third to recover his third time aflost credit; and for his better succes therin, agreed with Achimetes another great commander, faulted by Muat the same time to assault the Spanish bulwark. According to this resolution, Achimetes ha. supple. uing with a mine suddenly blowneyp a great part of the Wall of the Spanish station, in the thick of the dust and smoke presently entred his men, who by the ruins of the wal recovered the top of the rampiers. Mustapha also at the same time hardly charged the English; so that in both places was made a hard and doubtful fight, Mustapha destring nothing more, than with better fucces now to redeem his former dishonor, did what he might to incourage the soldiers, calling youn them by name, and putting them in remembrance of their former victories. The Rhodians on the other fide mindfull of their former honor, with the greatnes of the prefent danger, valiantly repulsed the enemy, and forced him with shame to retyre. In this affault many Englishmen were slain, and Presanes also fore hurt, having before slain many of the Turks. Mustapha beside the losse of his men, had also two of his ensignes taken by Christopho-Two Vaulderick Commendator of the German Knights. Achimetes having won the top of the walls, had there fet up the Turkish ensignes; but by the valor of the defendants, and by means The Turkish . of certain pieces of ordnance, by Martiningus aptly placed in the houses before the new made figuradus and breach, and by force of shot out of the stankers on both sides the breach, whereof some fell in to the top of the mit, area. vain, he was again inforced to forfake the wals, and to retyre.

The 23 of September, the Turkish captains hoping by meanes of a mine which they had made against the Avergnbulwark, to enter and win the City; approching the wals with multitudes of foldiers, ready to have entred youn the blowing up of the mine: it being met with a countermine out of the city, wrought not such effect as was by them expected ! fo that hauing received some harm, standing in a place of great disaduantage, and don nothing, they resurned again to the camp. Yet all the expert captains probably conic curing that the Walk might bee inwardly shaken by the mine, though it were not by them outwardly perceived. caused that part of the wal to be most violently battered al the rest of that day and night follows lowing, and by the fury of their artillery made a fair & large breach. Al that night was beard in the Turks camp an vinwonted elattering of weapons, and of men running to and from the there bin fome great matter a doing : which the Rhodians coniectured (as the truth was to be a fign of some great affault to be shortly given.

Solyman resoluting the next day with all his force to assault the new made breach; afterhed had by himself in a melancholy mood walked up & down in his tent a great part of the night. fent for the chief commanders of his army, to whom he declared his mind as followeth.

Your valor and wisdom (worthy Captains) needeth not any exhortation 3 yet the desperat muduesse of H our enemies maketh me to freak unto you thefe few words : who which they yet do, as from the beginning, as men without reason desperately defend their City rent with our artillery, shaken with our mines their Churches and houses beaten downe about their eares, wearied and worne out with flanghter, labour, and wounds, which must needs befall men so often assaulted; they worshily seem unsoon foldiers men of inuincible force and courage : which opinion to have removed, mach concerneth the happy and wifeed facces of our asfault. Wherfore I would have you with effectual persuasions and bournisful promises to heaven on our men to the winning of this city. Besides this you shall open wnto them my purpose and encous, and that they should not think that they are brought bither to besiege one city, but that in taking this one, they shall upon the matter make a way into all the dominions of the Christians. Here be the kinfmen, allance, and friends of all the Kings, Princes, and Potentats of Christendom : here is all our enemies treasures he I Spoil wherof promised unto our soldiers, may serve to great purpose to incounage them forward: berow the store of ordnance, armor, and other warlike provision, which shall both furnish us, and in sime to come miserably confound the rest of the Christians. We shall beside this enion a most goodly and rich sity, with a hanen of all others most commodious, from whence all things necessary for war may at all times as accas sion shall require, by land and sea be supplied : which as they shall be so us things of great importance, fo shall we despoil our enemies of far greater. This is their castle, forehouse, treasury, and armory : this is the very receptacle and place of refuge for all such as trouble the Turks by Sea : from bence shall wee have free scope and passage into Apulia, Calabria, Sicilia, and many other Christian countries. But as for your schues, valiant Captains, when as I consider how shat you have within these few months by your valor and wisdom subdued unto my empire the firong city of Belgrade, which my great graundfather Mahomet Ki that mighty Emperor could not with all his power get; I rest in great hope, that these fierce and obstinat Christians shall not long be able to de fend themselves in the stheir, dens and lurking places.

Having ended this speech, the captains every one vnto his company made known what the great Emperors wil and pleasure was; and open proclamation made thorow all she sampe, by which the spoil of that rich city was all granted vinto the foldiers, as a prey and reward for the pains they were to take.

Solyman heavy with fleep and care, lay downvpon a palat to take his rest sbut the great Mafler (to whom the vnaccustomed stirof the enemy portended some great matter) at that night in arms painfully viewed enery part of the cityscherfully incouraging his foldiers to remember, That they did watch for the fafety of their Country, their lines and liberty. It fortuned the same night, that a poor Christian seruing a Turk in the camp, calling secretly to the watch vpon the wals, gaue them warning that the Turks prepared the next day to give a generall acfault vnto the city. Which thing when the great Mafter certainely understood, because bee would have nothing don rashly or fearfully (as it commonly hapneth in things don vpor the fulden) called together his Knights, and spake vnto them as followeth:

I am glad (sucred Companions and Fellowes in Armes) that the time is come when in one batforestation to tell, getting unto your selves great honour, and defending your Countrey, you may be tuftly accomme ted the worthy Defenders and Renemgers of the Christian Commonweal and Name. The people against M. whom we are to fight tomorrow, affaile vs onely as profaming upon their multitude : But if we measure Falour not by number, but by courage and promeffe, undoubtedly a few resolute men will easily our some a great multitude of cowards, I'on know your enemy and the manner of bit fight : you are to field a (most worthy K nights) with them whom you have alwaies vanquished at sea, and in full battel somtimes auercome by land, at fuch time as with wheir whole power they affaulted your walls : omitting in the mean time many bot skirme flee, wherein you ever put them to the worft. Wherfore you and they in the affault comorrow thall have fuch courage, as conquerors and men conquered we to hane. Neither wil they fight because they dare fight; but because the great Tyrant and violent commaund of their Captaines inforceth them therumia. Wherfore remembring what you are by birth, what opinion the Christian commonwealth hat beonceined of you where you are and what you have taken upon you stake up your arms with infl fury and indignation, and fight against them, following one frantick youth, as if you faw your slaves bearing arms ar ainst you. Wherunte you are inforced not only by the indignity of the wrong by them offered, but allo by necessity, which of it felf is of power to make cowards valiant and hardy. For here wee arein an A Illand from whence we cannot escape, and in a city whose rent and battered walls do not so much protect and defend us, as our weapons: wher fore tomorrow we must here either vanquish them, or die ther fore tomorrow shall give unto us either toyfull victory or a most honorable death.

As he was yet thus speaking, news of the enemies approch caused him to make an end, and every man hasted with speed to the place of his charge. The enemy comming fast on, with a most horrible cry, as their maner is, fiercely assailed the city in five places, where the English, The Turks of Spaniards, Italians, Narbonenses, and Avergnois had their stations. To the assault of every of fault the city which places Solyman had appointed ten thousand Turks. Mustapha the Bassa calling vpon once. the name of his great Prophet Mahomet, and promifing vnto the fouldiers the rich spoil of C the City, fiercely affailed the English station, from whence he had bin three times before shamefully repulsed. Pyrrhus the other great Bassa with like fury assaulted the Italian station. In both places was maintained a cruell and deadly fight; the Turks fighting for the prey, and the Rhodians for their lives and liberty. Neither was there any, of what degree or order The Rhodians soeuer, which did not that day fight for desence of the City. The priests and religious men villes by dewere not then exempted, but fought among other foldiers : women, children, and with them find the stig. the aged fathers, beyond the strength of their bodies, & courage of their minds, brought weapons vnto the defendants, fome Rones which they had digged out of the Rreets, fome burning pitch barrels, some hoops with wild-fire, some scalding oil, some boyling pitch, which being cast down vpon the enemies, troubled them so, as nothing was more seared for vpon D whomsoeuer it fel, it stuck fast, and so scalded their bodies, that they were glad to cast downe their weapons, to tear off their cloaths, wher with many of them rent off the skin and flesh alfo. All which things fel fo thick upon the Turks as if it had rained fire and stones: besides the deadly shot, which among such a multitude of enemies neuer fell in vain. The great Master having a careful eye ouer every part of the city, after he had well relieved the Italian station, which was the first hardly distressed by Pyrrhus, left there Antonius Monterollus a Knight of the Order, with such company as hee thought convenient for the safety of that place; and went himself with the rest vnto the English station, which was then hardly laid to by the Bassa Mustapha. But whilst he was there busied in repulsing the enemy, and had now well relieved the place, a fudden cry ran along the wals, that the Spanish bulwark was already possessed by the E enemy: with which heavy news he was not a little troubled; but leaving there Emericus Gombasission of the Knights of the Order, with a chosen company of soldiers for defence of that place; he with his gard hasted to the Spanish station, which he found by a wonderfull chance already taken by the enemy. In the beginning of the affault, certain Turks to shun the dan- The Spanish ger of the fhot, had for fear hidden themselues at the soot of this bulwarke, among the stones bulwarke lagen. which had before bin beaten downe with the battery : in the mean time other Turkes of the by the Turki. same regiment, under the leading of the valiant Captain Achimetes, hotly charged the Spaniards on the right hand of the bulwark, not medling with the bulwark it felf, as a thing of greatest strength and the valiant souldiers appointed for the desence of the bulwark, seeing their fellowes and Countreymen distressed fast by them on the right hand, could not endure to fland fill as lookers on, but left the Bulwark, and went to the place fo hardly affaulted where whilft they were valiantly incountring the enemy, the cowardly Turkes who had before for fear hid themselues, hearing all stil ouer their heads, and therby ghessing (as the truth was) that the defendants were drawn thence to another place more diffressed, to color their sear, &

proue their good fortune, like tall fellows crept out of the holes wherein they had before for a fear hid themselves, and secretly crauling up the battered walk of the Bolwark, got into it be fore they were discouered where finding none but a few foldiers (who buffed in remoning of a great piece to a place more convenient for annoying the enemy, had faid downe their wes pons) they fuddenly fet upon them, flew them, ouerthrew the Christian ensign, and fobecand mafters of that firong fort. The Turks without, feeing that, wonderfully commended theval for of these men, and blaming themselves of cowardise, made great hast through the mids of the town ditch, to get up into the bulwark to help their fellowes. But in going through the ditch, they were fo cut off with thot on both fides out of the flankiers that few of them conti get up into the defired bulwark; and the Great Mafter with a crew of vallant foldiers, nothing tearing the armed enemy now in possession of the bulwarke ouer their heads, with great reso. H lution scaled the same. In the mean time Hugo Caponus a Spaniard, and Menotins a Pretichman. both Knights of the Order, with a company of Cretenfian foldiers brake into the bulwark by a gate which the Turks had not as yet bolted, and being once got in, they quickly dispatched the Turks, for whom they flew not with the fword, they inforced to mischief themselves for hast back again ouer the wals. The bulwark thus again recouered (which had bin two hours in possession of the enemy) & the city deliuered of a wonderful fearths worthy great Master leaving a sufficient number of soldiers for the keeping of that fort, went with the rest of his company vitto the place where the Spaniards with the rest of the defendants fore charged by Achimetes, and now wearied and almost spent, had much ado to hold out who incouraged with the fight of the grand Master, as if victory had attended spon him, with great cries and fignes 1 of joy, valiantly & with great flaughter repulfed their enemies as if they had binflesh men. Long it were to recount the deadly fight & hard adventures which befel at the affault of the other two stations of the Avergnois and Nathonenfes abut the Turks were in every place put to the work, and lay by heaps flain in the ditches and breaches of the town. Soliman from his standing (for that purpose made of high masts) beholding the miserable slaughter of his men, and no hope of gaining the City, caused a retreit to be sounded, a thing welcome both to the Rhodians and Turks. In this terrible affault, which indured by the space of fix hours, divers of the Knights of the Order were flain, especially of the Prench and Spanish nations, with 150 common foldiers, all men worthy of eternal fame, and of the Turks (as they which write most modestly report) 20000. The yong tyrant was so much offended with the shamefull repulse he had receiued at this last affault, that he fel into a rage against al them which had perfunded him to enter into that action; but especially against the great Bassa Mustapha, whom he accused as an vnfaithful counsellor and chief persuader of that vnlucky war who flattering him in his vain humor, by extolling his forces aboue measure; and falfly extenuating the enemics power, affuring him that vpon the first approch of his army they would yeeld themselves without refiftance, had drawn him into that dangerous expedition, like to fort to the great Signature dithonor of himself and all the Othoman family: for which doing he adjudged him worthy of death, and in great fury commaunded the executioner without further delay to put him to The man death in his presence. Which dreadful doom, so suddenly and vpon so light an occasion giplace with uenvpon a man of fogreat mark and quality, strucke such a terror into the minds of all there L present that none of them durst speak a word against the rigor of than sentence; or so much as fet a figh in pittying his case. The executioner now ready to give the fatal stroke, Pyrrhus the most antient of all the Bassa's, moued with compassion, and presuming of his great sauor with the tyrant, whom he had from his childhood had the charge and gouernment of; stept forth, and appealing vnto his mercy, earnestly requested him to spare his life. Wherwith Solyman was to filled with wrath and indignation, that for his prefumption, and for fending for him to Constantinople to come to that dangerous siege, he commanded him to be executed also The Reflection All the rest of the counsellors seeing the danger of these two great men, fell down at the seet recognise of the furning tyraut, crauing pardon; faying, That the enemies ground had already drunk too ather countil- much of the Turkish bloud, and was not to be further moistned with the bloud of two such M noble personages and worthy Counsellours. Solyman mooued with this general intercession of his great men, paufing a little vpon the matter, the heat of his fury being fomthing over, tuffered himfelf to be intreated, and granted vnto them their lines : To Pyrrhus for his great

A age and wisedome, and to Mustapha for his wives sake, who was the tyrants naturall fister some. time the wife of Bostanees.

All the time of this fiege, the Turks great fleet, furnished with men and all manner of warlike provision, lay before the enterance of the hauen without doing any thing at all: for the Admirall being no man of war, feeing the mouth of the hauen chained, and the castles voon the entrance full of ordnance, and strongly manned, durst not attempt either to enter the hamenor besiege the castle: for which his cowardise, and for that he had negligently suffered selman disprovision both of victuall and munition, to be conveied into the city during the time of the placeth his day fiege, to the great reliefe of the besieged, he was by Solyman adjudged to die a most cruell night him as death; but by the mediation of Achimetes, one of his best men of war, the seucrity of that sen. a sauc. B tence was changed into a punishment, vnto any noble mind more gricuous than death it felfe: for he was by Solymans commandement, openly fet upon the poupe of the admirall gally, and there as a flaue received at the hands of the executioner a hundred stripes with a cudgell, and fo with shame was thrust out of his office.

After that Solyman had in fo many places with all his power fo long time in vaine befreged Solyman exceethe Rhodes, his haughty courage began to quaile, fo that he was vpon point to haue raifed his with the result siege and left the Island, yeu, the griefe he had conceived, went so neere him, that he many and left receitimes fainted and lay speechlesse, as if he had been a dead man. The remembrance of so many wed at the size unfortunat affaults, the death of fo many worthy captains, the loffe of fo many valiant fouldiers (fufficient to baue subdued a whole kingdome) so much grieued him, that a great while sobaites the C after he shunned the company of men, and would not suffer himselfe to be spoken withall : untill at length he was againe by Abraham his minion, a man in whom he tooke fingular pleafure, recomforted, and perfuaded to continue the fiege; for that Time (as he faid) which workethall things would at length tame the flerceneffe of his enemies, whom the fword could not you the fudden fubdue. In the meane time Solyman for his pleasure, and to shew vnto the Rhodians, that he purposed not to depart, began to build a sumptuous castle vpon the top of the mount Philermus in the cie of the city. During which time divers letters were that into the city with Turkish arrowes out of the campe, wherein many of Solymans most secret counsels were renealed, and the revolt of a great man promised, which the Rhodians by many circumflances gathered to have beene Mustapha, who could not easily forget the injury so lately D offered vnto him by Solyman: needs it must be some of Solymans secret counsell, otherwise he could not have revealed fo great fecrets as it were out of the bosome of Solyman. But fee the chance, at the very fame time tidings came vnto Solyman, that Cayerbeius the Gouernour of Egypt was dead in whose place Solyman sent Mustapha to Caire as Gouernour of Egypt, by that honourable preferment again to please his discontented mind, after which time no more letters came into the city.

Now the Turks began to make faire wars, their terrible battery began to grow calme, and for certaine daies infeemed by the manner of their proceedings, that they purposed rather by long flege than by affault to take the rown. Neuertheleffe the enomies watching day and night in their trenches, yied all the policy they could, formetimes offering vnto the fouldiers vpon B the wals great rewards, if they would yeeld up the city, and fointlines threatning them as fast: and to breed a diflike among the defendants, they would oftentimes fay, that Solyman defired only to be reuenged upon the latines, without meaning any harme unto the Greekes.

It was now the beginning of October, and VV inter began to grow fast on, great rain, with tertible thunder and lightening, and mighty tempelts, heavens threats, then fell fo abundantly, that the Turks before wearied in body with labor and wounds, were now also in mind discouraged. And that more increased their feare, the sea was growne so rough, That the Admirall was not able in that open and dangerous fea longer to ride it out with his gallies: but was inforced to flip his ankers, and as he might to run his gallies on ground. In these troubles wher- Achimeter prowith both Solyman himleste and all his army wore at furthest of their wits, and almost quite milesto make F discouraged, Achimetes one of his most valiant and expert captains, came to comfort him and man into the promifed if he would continue the fiege, in shore time to make him an open way into the cityropon confidence whereof, Solyman to encourage his fainting fouldiers, now scarce able for cold and lacke of courage to hold their weapons in their hands, caused them to be affembled before his pavillion, where from a high place, he comforted them in this fort:

Symancomfor I am not ignorant (most valiant souldiers) what great things you indure for mine honour, and the G telebu fouldi-ers and profus glory of mine Empire. This continuall threatning of the heavens, this immoderate raine, this terrible den then with thunder and lightening, the coldnesse of the weather, the want of necessaries, with the manifold miseries patience to en- of shis long siege, doe much persuade me, to give you leave to lay downe armes and to take your rest. But first let us consider if unto men of courage it be not a dishonour, for the tediousnesse of raine and tempes, to leave unto our enemies the vittory already in our bands, and shamefully to for sake our trenches, forts, mounts, overtopping not only the wals of the city, but mating the heavens, with Such other like worker made with my infinite charge, and your great travell, all for the taking of this city. Tracly this wartest ther should not have beene taken in hand at all, or being once begun, is to be ended for the honour of the Othornan Empire. Which for somuch as it could not be accomplished in Summer sthe reputation of time Empire in common, and the regard of the commodity of energ one of youin primate, enforceth me to per. H forme it in Winter. For if we should from hence depart with our army, who doubts but the enemy, not only for defire of revenge, but alfo ftrained by necessity, having lost all he had of his owne, will prey upon your countries, bouses, and goods, and will bring you, your wines, and children, into a farre more miserable sta uery and bondage, than that wherin he himfelfe now is ? Wherefore I aduife you to continue the fire e, and mener to depart before you have attained unto the end of your desires. And admit there were noncession in the matter, yet the bonour and fame of the action ought to impose upon you are solution both of body and mind to indure the siege: For the cies and countenances of all nations, especially the Christians, are fixed upon you, whom when they shall under stand not to be able to indure the field one Winter, they will of right call you Summer-birds, which fo some as any storme ariseth, looke after your houses, and places of repose. Is is reported, that the Grecians for a strumpet besieged Troy ten yeares , and shall not the Turks, wexed and 1 oppressed with slaughters robberies inuasions both by sea and land, and that more is with the servitude of two hundred and foureteen geres, endure one Winters fiege? They will say that the terrour if your name u but vaine, and that fame hath increased the same (as many other things moe) which not seen are more feared in far countries among ft men of small experience: And that now every man man fafely enough abide your force, which make your inuations rather upon a fury and brauery than upon any good resolution, which in all kinde of war (but especially in besieging of cities) is most necessary whereof many being by natur all scituation and fortification impregnable, time hath with her handmaids, Famine and Thirle, ouer. come and vanguished, as it shall do this city of the Rhodes : against which (beloved in armes) there is a seeret mischiese prepared, which may not in this open audience be published for it is as necessary that the vulgar fort should be ignorant of some things, as to know the same.

> Many thought, that this was spoken rather of policy than vpon any good ground: and although his hot persuasion had little moued the cold courage of his despairing souldiers, yet the regard of duty in that most loyall nation, with the greedy expectation of so great a secret, ouercame all other difficulties; fo that they departed (at lestwise in shew) contented to indure whatfocuer should befall.

Achimetes win-

Achimetes author of this great expectation, and the only hope of Salymans successe, came of tentimes and affailed the Vaumures of the Auergn station, which although they were not very high, yet were they alwaies valiantly defended by the Rhodians. It fortuged, that this warlike captaine dayly attempting the Vaumures, in the end by force obtained the same, and 1 fo possessed of the place he so much desired, desperatly kept it vntill greater helpecame runbe will, and/s ning in, who with wonderfull expedition (with matter for that purpose before prepared), clapt vp a ftrong and defensible couering in manner of a penthouse against the towne wall, betwixt the wall and the Vaumure, under which they shrouded themselves from the defendants; which was an eafie matter for fuch a multitude to do, the ditches of the towne in that place being now filled up fo high, that the defendants could not out of the flankers feogre the ditch, nor yet without manifest danger come to cast any thing downe upon them from the top of the wals : for the Turks harquebusiers which lying vport their mounts, higher than the battered wals of the city, suffered none to appeare vpon them without danger. So that the Rhodians who erft thought themfelues at great quiet, were now ouertaken with a fudden M and an vnexpected mischiefe: which at the first filled the city mith searc and beaut filence, which firaitwaies after brake out into pittifull outcries and lamengarions, Albe Turks lunking under their penthouse, laboured with mattocks and pickaxes to dig up the foundation of the wall; and Prejames forward and couragious to do what might be done, threw downe viole

A the Turks, fire, scalding oyle, burning pitch, wild fire and such things. But when the misserable men which shrunke from the worke for feare of the fire, were againe beaten forward by their imperious commanders, and prefently flaine if they made any delay, and fresh men still thrust on in stead of such as were hurt or slaine : the fatall worke began the senenth day of October. went apace forward, with the great and continuall labour of these wretched slaves. A great number of the common fouldiers whom the Turks call Asapi were imploied in this worke: of whom Solyman in this fiege of the Rhodes, and other his expeditions, made not much more The militable account but as of pioners to worke in mines and to cast up trenches, and oftentimes with their fate fluctors. bodies to fill towne ditches to make a way for the Ianizaries to passe ouer vpon: they by the the Tarker and conftraint of Achimetes undermined the wall, and as they wrought, shoared up the same againg the small as-B with timber, whereunto they afterwards fet fire, hoping by that means to ouerthrow the wall; of them. which falling not out according to their expectation, for that they had not far enough undermined it, they affaied with great hooks and strong ropes to have pulled it downe. But the Rhodians with their great ordnance from the Auergn bulwarke, quickly put them from that mad worke with great flaughter, and frustrated all their long labor. Achimetes thus disappointed of his purpose, stood in great doubt whether he should give over the enterprise, for that he faw he laboured in vaine, or elfe in that dangerous place to expect fome better hap, the only means to faue him from the tyrants heavy displeasure; who as he knew measured all things by the euent. Solyman understanding by Achimetes, that the wall (although it was not ouetthrown as was expected) was yet fore shaken and weakned with undermining, caused his bat-C terv to be planted against that part of the wall so undermined which so many waies weakned, and now fore battered, fell downe dayly more and more. For remedy whereof, the Rhodians laboured day and night to raife a new wall, in stead of that which was beaten downe.

At the fame time, Solyman persuaded by the generall opinion of all his great captains, that the city was that day or neuer to be taken, determining to give another generall affault, caused proclamation to be made thorow his campe: wherein he gaue the spoile of the city vnto his foldiers, and the more to encourage them, spake vnto them in few words, as followeth:

Fortune at length valiant Coldiers Lauine notably proved your conrage and patience now offereth un. Solyman encouto you the worthy rewards of your labour and paines. The wittery and wealth of your enemies which you ragio his feet D have so much desired is now in your hands. Now is the time to make an end of this mangrell people, of alfault. whom more are flain than left aline and they not men but the shadows and a holts of men feeble and spent with hunger, wounds, wants, and labour, who will I know relift you, not because they so dare, but because of necessity they so must, enforced thereunto with all extremities. Wherefore now reucage your sclues of the falshood, cruelty, and villanies of these Christians, and make them a wofull example to all posterity, that never man hereafter presume to offer injury to a Turke, in what soever state he be. The way is already openime the city, there is a faire breach made whereby thirty horsemen may at once enter: nothing wanteth but courage in you to affaile the fame.

The fouldiers encouraged with this speech of their Emperour, made great shew of cheere-E fulnesse, and promised to do their vetermost denoire, threatning vnto the Christians most horrible death and miserable captivity.

In the meane time the great thot flying continually through the breach, did beat downe many houses in the city; but the countermure new built against the breach standing upon a lower ground, it seldome toucht, to the great good of the Rhodians. The ratling of the falling houses, the horrible noise of the enemy, with the thundering of the great artillery, wonderfully terrified the miserable citisens: in enery place was heard the lamentation of women and children, every thing shewed the heavinesse of the time, and seemed as altogether lost and forlorne. The day thus troublefornely spent, the night followed much more troublesome; and after the night, the day of affault of all others most dreadfull: for with the dawning thereof, F the gliftering enfignes of the enemy were seene flying in the wind, and the Turks cheerefull with the hope of spoile and victory, hasted towards the breach with great outcries and songs, after their country manner; and there before one of the gates of the city called S. Ambrofe gate, set downe a great number of their ensignes deckt with garlands, in token of vi Aory. The Turks great fleet also at the same time sayling too and fro before the hauen, made shew as if it would have affailed the city on that fide: who had feene the city fo befet, would have faid G that it would at one infant have bin befieged both by fea and land; and to most mens judge. ments, it seemed that the Rhodian state should that day have taken end and bin destroicd. Yet for all these extremities, the Rhodians were nothing discouraged, but looking vpon their weapons as the only remainders of their hopes, not regarding any danger, vponthe alarmeginen came running out of their houses by heaps unto the wals, like desperat men opposing their bodies in stead of their battered wals against their enemies in desence of their country. There needed neither exhortation nor command of captaine, every manwas vnto himfelfe a perfus. der to fight valiantly in defence of the city; and one of them propounded vnto another the cruell death, the miserable seruitude, the mocks and taunts they should indure, if they should chance to come into the proud enemies hand : all which was to be avoided either by honora. H blevictory or death. The Turks conducted by Achimetes, fiercely affailed the breach, which was by the Rhodians (standing vpon the ruins of their wals) valiantly defended. In the meane time the difinated mattons and maidens, some in their houses, with heavy hearts expected the wofull destruction of the city and themselves, othersom in their churches with flouds of tears and lamentable cries, poured forth their praiers vnto the Almighty, crauing his helpe in that their hard diffresse, and to protect them against their barbarous enemies. The deadly fight at the breach, was on both fides with great courage and force maintained. The Turks were in good hope forthwith to win the city, if they did but a little more straine themselues: and therfore to terrifie the Rhodiaus the more, oftentimes in their fighting gaue out most terrible outeries, and the Rhodians accounted the Turks as good as vanquished, for they being some. I ny in number, and in place of fuch indifferency, had not yet prevailed : beside that, they were greatly incouraged with the greatnesse of the common danger, and the light one of anothers valor; so that by their inuincible courage the Turks were inforced shamefully to retire. The Rhodians seeing their enemies turne their backes, gaue a great shout in derission of them: the Turks distaining that they in number many (and now victors, if they should with a little resolution maintain the affault they had begun) thould be so derided of a handfull of men as good as already vanquished; with great indignation returned again to the breach, and more furiously assailed the Rhodians than at the first. At which time the city had undoubtedly bin taken, had not they which defended the end of the wall, yet standing on both sides of the breach, out of their baricadoes with their shot ouerwhelmed the Turks thronging in at the breach, & others K with murthring shot out of the slankers of the new built wall so cut them asunder, that a greater flaughter for the time was hardly in any place feen. Achimetes beholding the wonderfull flaughter of his foldiers, and that he fought with great difaduantage and loffe, against desperat men, who refoluing to die, feared no danger, gaue ouer the affault and againe retired : lea-uing behind him in the breach and towne ditch, the carkaffes of fine thousand of his dead Turks, be fides many more which afterwards died vpon the hurts there received

This affault was given unto the towne the last day of November, a day dedicated to S. Anble the Modi-drew: after which time the captains of the Turkish army, although they despaired not of the answitchmen, victory, yet terrified with fo great flaughter of their men, resoluted with one accord to more. and by caffing to attempt the city with any notable affault, but by fundry great trenches to be made thorow L et into the midft of the ruins of the wals, to get into the city, and with matoks and pickaxes to onertrow the new made wall and another barricado which the the defendants had made within the fame; and in the meane time whilest this was in doing, so keepe the Rhodians still busied with continuall skirmithes and alarmes. This deuise put in execution by the wonderfull labour of such a multitude of people, served the enemy to greater purpose than all that he had done before: who daily ouerthrowing or destroying the new fortifications which the Rhodians made in flead of them which were before ouerthrowne, and by little and little creeping on further, draue the defendants to that extremity, that they were glad to pull downe many of their houses, therewith to make new fortifications, and to make their city leffe, by calting vp. of new trenches: fo that in short time they were brought to that point, that they could not M well tell which place to fortifie first, the enemy was now so far crept within them; for the ground which the enemy had thus gained within the city, was almost 200 paces in breadth, and 150 paces in length.

Solyman, although he did now affure himselfe of the victory, and was by nature cruell and

A defirous of reuenge; yet perfuaded by Achimetes and Cassim (two of his most valiant captains) Party offered that for the inlarging of his empire nothing was better than the fame and elemency: comman-the Rhodiants ded Pyrrhus the old Bassa to proue if the Rhodians might by parley be drawne to yeeld their city vpon reasonable conditions. Whereupon the Bassa sent one Hieronimus Monelia, a Genoway, vnto the wals, who crauing of the defendants fafe conduct, faid he had fomething to fav tending to the common good of the distressed city. Al mensminds were presently filled with expectation of some great matter, and he commanded to speake. Who answered, that he might not deliuer his message openly, but would either by speech in secret, or by letters deliuer the tame vnto ône Mathias de Via his countryman, one of the citifens of the Rhodes. When Fra. Secretaries Farnouiss, one of the Knights of the Order, a Frenchman of a chollericke disposition, whose rejetted. great courage was well feene in all that fiege (having as it is reported, with flor out of Saint Georges tower himselfe slain 500 Turks during the time of that siege) being now present, and moued with indignation to heare a motion made of privat conference with the enemy; bent his piece voon the messenger, and caused him forthwith to depart without doing his message. Many who in time of the affault feared not any danger, but were altogether become defocrat and careles of themselves, after that they had understood that the enemy had offered parley, and that they began to conceive some hope of life: reforted vnto the Great Master requesting him, that he would prouide for the fafety of his louing people, whose warlike forces was with many affaults fore weakned, the city beaten down about their eares, and most of them which were left, either wounded or ficke. They had (as they faid) now fufficiently proued both their forceand fortune: wherefore he should do well, to beware, less while he were too long in confulting, the enemy should conceine a further indignition in seeing his offers resused. With Thegreat Mathese and such speeches they inforced the Great Master to send Embassadors to Solyman. The Burat the inmen that were fent, were Anthoniau Groleus a Frenchman, enfigne bearer for the Order, a man pie fendeth em of great reputation for his wisedome and experience, and with him Robertus Barussus, a man of ballar ours to great grauity, and skilfull in the Greeke tongue: for whom was received as pledges, a kinfeman of the great captaine Achimetes, and a certaine Epirot which fled out of the city vnto the Turks, because one of the Grecian captaines had strucke him with his open hand; a man of a there wit, and one that could perfectly speake the greeke, Turkish, and Italian tongues, as anpeared to his great credit among it the enemies, being had of them in great regard although D he was not knowne whilest he dwelt in the city, that he was any such man. After that came also Solymans interpreter, for he himselfe could speake no other longuage more than his own, accounting it a difference, and against the Othoman Empire to vsc any other language. The Embaffadors admitted into Solymans presence, told him, that they were fent to know, for what cause he had sent to require parly. Who in a flaming heat, as if he had knowne nothing thereof, faid there was no fuch matter; and commanded them presently to avoid his campe, sent them away with letters to the Great Master and the citisens, to this effect:

If I had not compassion of humane infirmity, which oftentimes tumbleth headlong mens ambitious and Solymansteller hauty minds, into most dangerous & unnecestary mischieft, truly I would not have directed unto you these senten B laters at this time; but as you have well described, persecute you with death and most miserable servi-Rhodians, by inde: which how easie a thing were it for me to do, you your selves know. But having now sufficiently their embasia. tried my force, if you be wise make proofe of my elemency. You have already satisfied you be furly dors; your owne mad humour : and now aduise your selves, lay your hand upon your heart, and without delay yeeld your sclues as I command: your lives I give, I give you your wealth, and more than that your choice to tarry there fill, or to depart : Refuse not the grace frankely offered, which was of you to have been most heartily defired. It shall not alwaies be lawfull for you (as at this present) to make choice of both. From

Vpon the returne of the embassadors, the poore of all forts flockt together to the Great Ma-F ffer his house not far from the breach : where after the multitude of the common people was dismissed, and the chiefe of the burgers sent for, the imperious letter of the Turkish tyrant was openly read before the Knights of the Order, and the better fort of the citisens. Whereunto the Great Master accounting it both honour enough, and sufficient tearme of life honorably todic, answered in this fort.

You heard (sacred fellowes in armes, and valiant citizens of the Rhodes) these imperiou and sorrow. G fire bu opinion full letters: whereunto how we are to answer, requiresh no great deliberation: we must as resolutemen continuing that I me ther yeald or diesall hope of the wittery is gone, except forraine aid come. Wherefore if you will follow my counsell, let us with weapons in our hands, untill the last gaspe and the spending of the last drop of our bloud, like valiant men defendour faith and nobility received from our ancestors, and the honour which we have so long time gotten both at home and abroad: and let it never be said, that our honour died but

> This speech of the Great Master seemed vnto many, heavier than the imperious commandement of the Turkish tyrant: and a great while men stood silent, heavily looking one vpon another, many with changing of their countenance and outward gesture, more than by words H expressing what they thought in heart. At length a certaine Greeke Priest, with great compattion of mind (as it feemed) and teares trickling downe his cheekes, brake-forth into thefe

And I would also hold my peace, if I were a privat man, and not first of all in sogreat and troubled afsembly broch mine owne opinion. But for afmuch as the regard of our common preservation, can wring a perfusating the wordout of no mans mouth, and all men know, that now is the time to speake and say what every manibinketh best, which shall neither alwaies nor long be granted unto us; I will not let it now overpasse and sip away : Wherefore let ws suppose, that no command of a most mighty Prince besieging ws, were come with Us, but that I was reasoning as a privat man with his neighbour, or one friend with another by the fire side, I or in our cups without care, without any great affection to either party, as men indifferent, not liking or hating (as men do oftentimes of Princes affaires which concerne them nothing) and then (a. I bope) my speech shall be unto you neither unpleasing nor unprofitable. We Greekes and Latines with joynedarmer, hane now thefe fix moneths withstood our deadly enemies, not only abroad before our wals, but also in the very bowels of our city, without any forveine helps: which as we have of long time all vainely looked for, so are we now every one of us out of hope thereof. And yet our enemy, either moned with the feeret goodneffe of God, or elfe ignorant of our strength and forces, spent with wounds, stangbier, sickenesse, and perpetuall labour, doth voluntarily offer that unto us, which was of its most of all defired and earnefly fued for . Your publike and prinase treasures, the bodies of your selves, your wines and children, he keepeth inniclated, he taketh from us only the city, which he hath for most part already betten downe and taken. K. Worthy Great Master, and you most valiant Knights, I have knowne prowesse and valour in many batels at fea, but especially in this siege; whereof seeing there is no more rife in this our desperate estate, I doe appeale unto your wisedome and discretion. Since all is now the conquerors, in that he leaveth while us our lines and goods, that is to be accounted gaines, and the yeelding up of the city and island no losse, which the victorious enemy already commandesh: which although it be a beaug matter and griduous vinto the nobility, yet your fortune persuadeth you thereunto. Wherefore if you be to be moued with any compassion, I mecount it better to yield, than to be flaine your selves, or to see your wives and children by law of armes to be led away before your faces into miserable captimity and servitude. If any Christian tompassion remains in your warlike minds, I be feech you feeke not the viter destruction of this innocent people, who (I may with. modely jay) but h not cuill descrued of you, whom Christ lefu, whom the enemy himselfe, would have pre- L ferned. I hat I fay this which I feake unto you for Christian chavity & for no other cause feethis be a sufficient a stimony, That so long as you were able to resist by your own power, or hoped for aid of forrein Princes, I never pake word, or once thought of yeelding but now feeing the fatall ruin of all things about us our common estate brought unto the uttermost extremity, our deadly enemy in the heart of our city, no hope, and that the war cannot longer be protracted; I wish you to geeld, and for my part had rather make choice of peace than war, and to proue the enemies fanour, than his fury.

> Most of them there present, were of the same mind with the Priest. But as nothing can be forcasonably spoken as to content all men, so this speech was not of them all liked: some there were (though not many) which confidering the harmes they had done vnto the Turks, and M doubting with what safety they might yeeld themselves, into the power of that saithlesse people, had rather to have fought it out to the last mat, and so to have lest vnto them abloudy victory. Amongst these, one bold spoken fellow stept forth, and in presence of them all diffusded the yeelding up of the city, in this fort:

I have not beene with any thing more unacquainted, thanto deliver my opinion before Princes, or in Amost resolute such great and publike affemblies, being alwaies more desirous modestly to heare other mens opinions, than peech of a common foundary. impudently to thrust forth mine owne. But now, seeing extreame necessity will not longer suffer me to distudent to keepe my wonted course of filence, I will frankly speake my mind, and tell you what in my opinion is to be reliding ap of answered unto the brany message and imperious command of the most persidious tyrant. This cruell enemy bath overthrown our wall, and is entred three hundred foot and more within our city, and as a most troublesome quest lineth and converseth with vs as it were under the same roofe. Such as lift not longer to indure (uch an unwelcome guest and troublesome neighbour, persuade you because he is troublesome, to oine him all : but (worthy and facred Knights) I am of far different opinion ; neither do I thinke a pofle Bion of two hundred and foureteene yeares is to lightly to be deliuered up, and the ground fortaken: but B rather that this troublesom intrudor is in like manner to be himself troubled, and with deadly skirmilles continually vexed: whom after we had by force of armes and undanneed courage, maugre his head held out fine moneths, at length he brake into our city, not by any valour in himfelfe but holpen by time, which tamethall things : and fince his first entrance it is now almost forty daies, in which time for all his haste, he hath (careely got forward a hundred and thirty paces, hindered by the blockes we have laied in his way, and will not cease continually to lay if we be wise men and mindfull of our former valour. Destroy me you beauenly powers, before I fee with these eies these facred knights to yeeld up this famous city of the Rhodes. the antient Bulwarke of Christian religion, wato our mercilesse enemies, polluted with the infamous superfition of Mahomet who besides the unsatiable thirst they have of our blond, how faithlesse and mischieuous they are by nature, if weknow not, we need not make example of our felues, but we may take example C by the calamity of Constantinople, the late misery of Eubara, and that which later was of Acthone, as also by the Mamalukes at Caire, miserably staine contrary to the league, contrary to the faith and promise by the Turkill Emperour himfelfe before given. What, do you not remember how the death of the most noble captaine at Belgrade was of late procured by the fallhood, craft, and deceit of the same faithlesse misereants? Let us then being men of wit and understanding trust these mad beasts, let us give our selves into their power, which have no regard of right or reason, of religion, or any thing else; whose conesquinesses and cruelly it is hard to fay which is greater, which for these many yeres have plosted & laboured nothing more, than how by policy or force they may utterly root out the very name of the Rhodians, which they fo deadly hate. They keepe us flut up and befreged now the fixt moneth, feeling together with us extreame dangers and endlesse labour, flaine by heapes before our wals and forivesses, and connot be removed hence D with thunder lightenings, formes, tempelts, and all the calamities of Winter, a time which giveth intermission of all warre, both by sea and land; so desirous they are of revenge, and greedy of our bloud: and that not altogether without cause, for we have also shed theirs, and gladly would still so do if it lay in our power. But feeing it feemeth good unto God otherwife, and that we are surprised with ineuitable necesi-17, yet let us whitest we are at liberty, and have power our selves, by honourable death among & the Chriftian ensignes, eschew the torments and reproches which our cruell enemies hope to institt upon us : so shall we enjoy eternall fame and glory, prepared both in heaven and earth for fuch as honourably die in defence of their Prince and country: which honour it becommeth not them to enuy unto thy most noble name and vertue, worthy Grand Master, which having for many yeares enjoyed the commodity and profit of peace, and greatly inriched by bounty of this facred military Order, refuse now to beare this last burp den of war.

At these words an antient Greeke, for his wisedome and discretion of great reputation both with the Greekes and Latines, perceiuing his countrymen wrongfully touched, and the desperatholding out of the city vainely persuaded, tooke hold and interrupting this young gallant; in answer of that he had faid, spake as followeth :

That griefe of minde and desperation can make men rather eloquent than wife, as you have many times The former heard before this, so you might this day perceine also, most valiant gentlemen : for aduised modesty never sugarday a falleth into oblogny neither confoudeth fallehood with truth; it desireth not the slaughter of the citisens, Greek, and the F is persuadeth not fury, nor exhorteth men to madnesse : but it is by mature so engraffed in many, that persuade when they cannot by their owne wisedome and policy deliner themselnes from their troubles, they get seeke to draw others into the fellow ship of the same danger : so greedy have malice and misery alwaies beene of company. But if you (worthy Commander) will give me leave to speake, a man among st his countrymen

not of meanest place and authority, which thing both the present calamity and vergent necessity might of G you casily obtaine I would alledge such reasons, and lay downe such matter, as should not only resell the copi ous and glorious words fo this sharpe witted Orator, scrapt together of purpose to flourish out the matter, but also such as might stir your minde to that which is honest, profitable, and necessary; expulsing haired, feare, trouble, or despatre. This Gentleman, whom we all know, not only to be a vehement Orator, but some time a man most terrible, whereas for all his great words he is by nature mild, and so mild, that he never had the heart to kill, nay, not so much as lightly to wound any one of them whom he calleth barbarous, mad cruell, whose persidious dealing he detesteth, whose cruelty he accurseth, whose manner of lining he exclusi meth against, as altogether without law, without reason, without order, without regard : and now in time of truce, and whilest the showres of arrowes, gron bullets, fire and stones doth cease, creeping out of bis caue, maketh much adoc, and keepeth a great fir: and not knowing in what danger he'is, doth non B with glorious words call upon death, whereof he hath hitherto shewed himselfe too much affraid, and all for footh (as he faid) lest he should be insorced to endure the mocking and feerning of the enemy. But this u meere pride, not Christian fortitude or humility. But our enemy neither, shreateneth nor purposith any such matter, nothing so persidious or cruell as he would make him, rubbing up the slang her at Caire, Enban, Atethone, and Constantinople, cities taken either by force or warlike policy, and not yeelded by composition, upon faith ginen betwixt the besieger and the besieged: who because he would spare us, will not fuffer vs to do that whereby we should undoubtedly perish. But whereof proceedeth this new found clemency? this unwonted fauour toward the people of the Rhodes? I am not of the tyrants pring counsell, neither ener curiously sought after the reason of another mans bounty, but am glad to receive it when I needit. Tet for all that, I will not dissemble what I thinke in a matter so doubtfull : he is willing (at I suppose) in this siege and conquest of the Rhodes, to shew unto other nations whom he purposeth so innade, both his power and his patience: lest almaies satisfying his cruell nature, he should make defolation in places he would raigne ouer, and so for ever alienating the minds of men, he inforced to fight with all men with fire and sword: by which rigour he hath not so much hurt his enemy as himselfe. For this cause (as I suppose) he leaueth waso we life and goods, lest whilest be in going about to take them from we by force, and we feeking to keepe them by desperainesse, we should both fall into great destruction, no lesse lamenta. ble wate the conquerox than to the wanquished. Resides that, if he should kill all here, truly he might then enter the breaches of the city on the bodies of the dead, no men now left aline to relift him. But Lerus u Thut up, Arangia is frongly fortified, Lyndas of by scituation impregnable : here he knoweth are weapons, armour, and men; here he must begin a new war, except he will have the remainder of your warre, K the fatall plague of his Empire, to prey still upon his subjects: all which strong places he shall have without flanghter, without bloudshed (as reason is) if he should let you and us poore wretches depart in safety with a little trash. Except these worldly considerations have moved him to mercy and compassion on then out of doubt it is wrought by, divine power and the secret favour of God towards vi, and of our Saniour Christ lefus crucified. Whereunto if you be men well aduited, if religious, if mindfull of the duty of Christians, it becommet hnot you to impose any obstacle, and with the ruine of your selves to destroy this miserable people, which for this halfe yeares siege, hath scarcely had so much rest as might suffice theneeffity of nature, standing for yourn battell, induring both wounds and death for your honour and victory: by whose faithfull labour and diligence you have beene alwaies helpen both at home and abread , whether you innaded the Turke by land in Mytilene, Naupattus, Methone, Patras, or other parts of Peloponelms, L or els by sea thrust him out of the possession of the Ionian or Beeum: whereby it may appeare euen unto a blind man, how injurious it is, and far from truth, to object unto us, That injoying the fruits of peace, we refuse the charges of wars; nay, we never resused wars. But now it is come to that point, that if we would never fo faine make wars, we are not able fo to do, the floure of our youth being flain: and the small remainder that is left, not only weakened in body with wounds, ficknesse, watching, and restelfe labour, but also in mind discouraged, whilest all things fall out prosperously to our enemies, and to vs adverse : the greatest and helt part of our great artillery being broken with continuall wse, which if it were whole, we could have thereof small ve or profit, for want of pouder, which not only this city now wanteth, but also your strong holds, Lerus, Lyndas, Halicarnafits, Arangia. I was never defirous or curious to looke into other mens doings, much leffe into your manner of war but yet (Great Mafter) you cannot deny but it is fo 3 who have M caused soldiers to be brought from thence hither openly, and gunpoudder secretly : by which policy you have withfloodyour forreine enemy thefe fix moneths, and deceined the trechery of one or two domesticall traitors. But I gladly admit we have all thefethings, I fland upon the truth, I fay not what most men say, but

A I speake to please a few: and suppose we want neither armour nor courage, I would then aske you this whether they would admife you to we them to your defence, or to your destruction? For wnto both it cannot be no more than at once to be a freeman and a slave. To wfe them to your destruction, that were madnesse and sencelesse pride, hatefull to God and man you should therefore ve them to defence : but how shall we defend a city (I do not fay as the ruth is) already lost and possessed by the enemy, wherein he reigneth, ranngeth, and turneth all upfide downe ? but having the wals battered downe, a great breach in the Spanish fation, or another not like, but even now as good as made in the Italian flation, how shall we be able to keep this unfortunate towne, battered and rent at the French, English, and Auergn stations, and the tower of S. Nicolas ? Which if it were not so battered and bared of all warlike provision, but sound and thorows furnished with municion and victuall, yet necessity enforcing and reason persuading, you ought to for sake B it. for somuch as all power of further resistance w taken from you. Doc you see how easily and almost without any trouble the enemy (by meanes of the castle he hath new built upon the mount Philermo, not past two miles distant) cantake from you all manner of provision both by sea and land, and restraine you from going out or in? Truly notable Gentlemen, honourable for your martiall proweffe, you fee and have long agoe forefeene thefe things better than I, allogether ignorant in martiall affaires, allogether busied in the trade of merchandife, and caring for my family : yet suffer me to say the truth. All the powers whereby this king dome stood, are departed and gone; against the force of our enemies no policy of force remaineth; and to expect armies of angels or fouldiers from heaven, and other (uch like miracles, is in my judg. ment more and more to prouoke God to anger, although in his anger he be unto us mercifull. Where. forebeing destitute of all worldly helps, let us as we may, provide for our safety. I beseech thee (worthy C. Great Master) by these my aged teares, by the naturall piety ingrafted in thy noble nature, expose not this miferable city to the spoile of the enemy, or old and middle aged men to the sword, our wines and daughters to be rauffied, our boyes and youths to the unnaturall filthinesse of our barbarous enemies. and to be corrupted with the mad and groffe opinion of the ungodly Mahometane superstition. I would (noble Knights) you had seene with what teares, with what mourning our heavy families and children crying about their mothers, fent vs hither, and what praiers they made for vs at our departing: I would you knew with what minde and how great hope they expect their safety from your clemency and admised resolution.

This speech of the aged Greeke might have moved a heart of flint: but the Great Master, The Great Md. D who in his countenance shewed a greater courage than his present state required, comman. the related the state required comman. ding every man to his charge: after the matter had bin thus most part of the night discoursed, was not take gaue then no other answer, but, That he would be careful of all their well doing. The next morning he sent for Preianes, Martinings, and a few other of the greatest judgement and experi- counfil of all ence; by whom he was fully refolued, that the city in so many places by the enemy laid open bit angles, and and shaken, was not possibly to be long defended whereupon he caused a common counsell to the Burges of be called of all the Knights of the Order together with the burgeffes of the city: where after long debating, whether they should fight it out to the last man, or yeeld upon such conditions as was to be obtained it was by generall consent concluded, that the city should be yeelded, and thereupon a decree made which was by the Great Master pronounced. Whilest these things were thus in doing, a truce was taken with the enemy for foure daies, but full of feare A truce taken and danger. During which time, divers of the Turks prefuming vpon the truce, came by great with the Turks companies to behold the wals and rampiers of the city : wherewith Fornouiss the Frenchman for fouredales, (of whom mention is made before) being fore moved, in his choler without further command discharged a tyreof great ordnance among the thickst of them, contrary to the truce taken. At which time also the Rhodians received into the city secretly by night a ship loded with wines out of Crete, and in her Alphonfus a Spaniard, chiefe pilot of the Rhodian gallies, and with him 100 voluntary foldiers all Latines, all which went out of Crete without the knowledge of the Venetian Senatifor at that time the Venetians were in league with Solyman. The Turks justly offended with the breach of the truce, and the taking in of new supplies, which F they supposed to have bin far greater than in truth they were; without command of any captaine or enfigne displaid, in great numbers thrust in thorow the ruines of the breaches into the city as farre as the rampiers and baricadoes new made, and furiously assailed the defendants: In which conflict many were flaine and wounded on both fides. But after the Turkes had to their cost againe made proofe of the courage of their enemies, as without commandement

they began that skirmish, so of themselves they brake it off and retired. After the truce was G thus broken, the captaine of the Turks fencers, a bloudy cruell fellow, having taken three Christians prisoners, cut off their hands, eares, and nofes, and fent them so dismembred into the city with letters to the Great Master, charging him with the vajust breach of the truce, barbaroufly threatning within three or fouredaies to make like example of him to all pofes rity. Amongst others none was more troubled with this sudden and vnexpected breach of the truce, than Robertus Perufinus, Raymundus Marchet, and Raymundus Lupus, three Knights of the Order, men of fingular wisedome and grauity, Embassadours at that time in the Turker campe : whom the barbarous people in their fury had vadoubtedly flaine or put to torture. if they had not feared the like measure to have been shewed to their hostages in the city. But after that Nicholas Vergotiu, and Georgiu Sandriticus, two of the Burgeffes of the city, were H come into the campe with articles containing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians were contented to deliuer vp the city, all their fury and rage was quickly appealed. Solyman for his greater majesty and the more terror of these messengers, beset round about with his great army, and guarded about with his Ianizaries in their richest attire and glistering armour, gaue themaudience : who admitted to his presence, with great humility offered vnto him in writing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians would yeeld up vnto him the city. The chiefe points whereof were, That the Churches should remaine vnto the Christians inuiolated: That no children should be taken from their parents: That no Christian should be inforced to forfake his religion and turne Turke: That fuch Christians as would tarry still in the city, might fo doe at liberty, without paying any tribute for the space of fine yeares: That all I they which would depart might go with bag and baggage, furnished with convenient shipping and prouision as farre as Crete, and to carry with them so much great ordnance as thew pleased, and that the Christians should appoint a reasonable day for the time of their departure. All which articles Solyman condescended vnto, and solemnly swore faithfully to performe the same. But how they were indeed performed the writers of that age do much vary : it should seem they were neither altogether kept, nor broken; but so performed as pleased the conqueror: certaine it is, that many great outrages were through military infolency committed by the proud Turks vpon the poore Christians, contrary to the mind of Solyman, Iacobus Fontanus a Civilian, and at that time one of the judges of the city (out of whose writings this history is for most part collected) reporteth, that the Turks not expecting the departure of the Christians, brake into the city vpon Christenmas day, by the gate called Cosquinium, polluted the Temples, shamefully abused the Christians, and made hauocke of all things; and that he himselse falling into their hands, after he had with such mony as he had, redeemed himfelfe, having not sufficient to content all their greedy desires, was by them hardly intreated and grieuoufly beaten. The Great Master by the counsell of Achimetes, putting on such simple attire as best bescemed a vanquished man that was to humble himselfe before the conquefor, went out of the city into the campe, attended vpon with a few Knights of the Order: where after he had waited in the raine most part of the day, before Solymans tent, at last he had a rich gowne cast upon him, and so brought into the proud tyrants presence. Where after they had. a while at the first, with piercing eies one earnestly beheld the other, the Great Master L. humbling himselse before him, was in token of grace admitted to kisse his hand, and welcommed by Solyman in this fort.

Although (said he)' I might worthily and justly infringe the articles I have prescribed concerning session to the seelding of the City, with thy most wicked crossed compiers, the people of the Rhodes, and thee esternion Great Asolice cially (nch a capitall enemy, from whose deserved punishment, neither faith nor oath ought to stay a most just conquerour: yet I have determined to be not onely gratious and mercifull wnto thee so great an offender, deserving exemplary punishment, but also liberall and bountifull: who if thou will by weldoing amend the grieuous transgressions of thy former life, I promise unto thee most honourable entertainement, great preferment, and the highest places in my Empire, in my army in time of warre, M and in council in time of peace. Whereunto the Great Master answered:

e Most Mighty and gratious Emperour, your offered fauours before your other worthy sabtaines, I de- Theresolate au. feruenot; meither is my present estate and desert towards you such, as that I dare or ought to refell the sweet of the Come: get I will speake freely in the middest of your victorious army, a man vanguished in presence of the 10 solyman. conquerour, whose great mercy I never despaired of, and whose faith I never doubted: I had rather now I have lost my sourraignty, forthwith to losamy privat and unfortunate life; or else for ever hereafter to B line in obscurity, than of my people to be accounted a fugitive rather than a vanquished man : For to be vanqui hed u but chance of warre, and of fo great a conqueror, no shame to him that is conquered : but afterwards to for fake his owne people and to surne to the enemy. I account it shamefull cowardise and

Solyman maruelling at the courage and majefty of the hoary old Prince, in his fo great extremity, dismissed him, and sent him againe into the city, guarded with his owne guard, vntill hewas come into his palace: and vnto enery one of the Knights attending upon the Great Master, was given a rich garment, in token of Solymans fattor. Within a few daies after, Soly. Solyman comman comming into the city, went to visit the Great Master also, whom he found busie in pack- meth into the C ing vo his things against his departure. Here when the Great Master falling downe vpon his Great Master, knees would have worthipped him, he would in no case suffer him so to do but with his hand putting aside his vaile of majesty (which manner of reuerence the Turkish Emperors give only to God and their Great Prophet Mahomet) tooke him up and faluted him by the name of Father. To whom the Great Master for his witedome and discretion now to him no lesse admirable, than he was before in time of war for his valour and courage, spake in this fort:

If my fortune and successe had been answerable to my heart and courage, I should here be in this city, The Beech of rather as a victorious conquerour than a man conquered. But lithence the fatall Destinies would needs the Great Ma-D overthrow the Rhodiane state, I am gladthat you are the man before all other by fortune assened, of whom I shall receive both force and grace. And onto you, amongst many other your rare and worthy praises, this shall not be the least, That you variguished the Rhodes and shewed mercy. By this means you have joyned amo your dreadfull power, the fame of clemency and courtefie : an honour not of the highest to be despised by which alone we come neerest unto God. Wherefore I doubt not you will keepe the conventions of the late peace inviolate, which your owne clemency persuaded you to grant, and necessity inforcedus to take. I shall now be an eternall example of the Turkish Emperors clemency and vertue, more than if I hadby and by at the first yeelded my selfe: Obstinate wilfulnesse hath made thy glory and mercy now famous through the whole World and unto the Worlds end.

Whereunto Solyman by his interpreter answered:

It is to me a great pleasure, that God at length hath put into thy minde to make choice of pracebefore The vocable an. warre, which I would shou couldest have liked of from the begining : then truly thou shouldest at this sweet of So-time have time have received of my great and mighty Majesty, more good than thou hast indured harme. Which Great Master. that I have done unto thee, not for any hatred, but only for defire of Sourraigning thou mayfe gather by this, That I suffer thee and thine to depart hence at liberty, with all your wealth and substance : for I make not warre, thereby to heape up wealth and riches ; but for honour, fame, immortality, and enlarging of mine Empire. For it is the property of a King regally descended, by strong hand to take from others, and so inuade others; not upon a greedy and conetous minde, but for the honourable desire of rule and soneraigning; which whilest my neighbour with standeth, I count it enough by force of armes to remove him.

But the tyrant (as many supposed) spake all this by way of dissimulation, having as it was commonly bruted, given order for the rigging vp of a great ship, and certaine gallies, for the sudden transporting of the Great Master and the Knights of the Order to Constantinople, which report seemeth to have beene but feigned either of malice, or else by such as least knew G Solymans minde: for if he had so purposed, who should have let him, having them all in his power. Jouins in his little treatise Rerum Turcicarum dedicated to Charles the fifth, reporteth that he himselfe heard Lilladamm the Great Master say, That when Solyman entered into the Rhodes attended vpon with thirty thousand men, there was not any man heard to speake a word, but that the soldiers went as if they had bin observant Friers; and that when he came to aske leave of Solyman that he might depart, he was so courteously vsed of him, that turning himselse to Abraham the Bassa, whom hee aboue all men loued, said, Fruely I cannot but grieue to see this vnfortunate old man, driuen out of his owne dwelling, to depart hence so heauily.

The Great Master embarking himselsewith his Knights and such other as was willing to H depart, in vessels and gallies prepared for that purpose, departed out of the Island on New. yeares day at night: and after long and dangerous trauell by fea in that Winter weather, jian. ded at last at Messana in Silicia, from whence he afterwards failed into Italy, and so travelled to Rome where he was honorable received by Adrian the fixt of that name then Bishop there. a Hollander borne, sometime schoolemaster to Charles the fifth, and his Vicegerent in Spaine: who if he had been as forward in the short time of the Papacy to have relieved the Rhodes, as he was to maintaine Charles his quarrell against the French King, it is not volike but that famous city had been relieued, and the Island in possession of the Christians at this day. Thus Solyman, whilest the Christian Princes were at discord amongst themselves, to his great glory and no leffe griefe of all good Christians, entered the Rhodes the 52 day of December, a day 1 Biodeson Chris dedicated vnto the Nativity of our Saviour Christ, in the yeare 15224 after it had bin by the Reads on Core. Ringhts of the Order, valiantly kept and defended against the Insidels by the space of 214 it years, fince the time they by force tooke it from the Infidels in the yeare 13081 and now being fo long holden as was possible, against all the power of the Turks, was yeelded up when it had bin fix moneths befieged. At this fiege Solyman loft a great part of his army ; for befides them that were flaine at the affaults, which were many, thirty thousand died of the flix.

Whilest Solyman thus lay at the fiege of the Rhodes, Ferhates Baffa Gouernor of the Mar-Finate Buffa ches of the Turkith Empire, along the river of Euphrates, by the commandement of Solyman against slie beg went with a great army against Alis Beg, whom the Turks call Schach, Spar Ogliathat is to say, King Suar his son which P. Jouiss corrupting, calleth him by the name of Saxouar Oglis. This K Alis after he had betraied his vncle Aladeules the mountaine King, vnto Sinan Baffa, was by Selgmue left chiefe Gouernor of that large and wild country along it the borders of Armenia and Capadocia, wanting nothing of the honor of a king but the name only, as is before declared in the life of Selymun, Solyman jealous of his honour, and fearing left he should take upon him the absolute government of that country (which indeed of right belonged vato him, the children of Aladeules the late King, being now all dead) and fo to make himselfe King; especially if he should joyne in friendship with the Persian King: after the manner of ambitious men, purpofed by any means to have him taken out of the way : and had therefore fent Ferhates to cafe him of that care. The Baffa without making any shew of hostility, marching with his army along the confines of his country, as if it had been but to looke to his charge, when he was L come as necre as he could to Alia, without mistrust, thought good to affay if he could by policy bring that to paffe which he was otherwise with great danger to attempt by force. Wherefore faining himfelfe to be extream ficke, he fent Embaffadors to Alie, requesting him as a friend to vouchfafe to come with him being at the point of death, virtowhom he had many things of importance from the great Emperour to impart, and would if he should die feare with him all his charge vntill Solyman should otherwise dispose thereof.

Alie, who from his youth had alwaies honoured the Turkish Emperours and faithfully serued them, milituiting no harme came to the Baffa, accompanied with his foure lons; whom the faithlesse Bassawithout regard of infamy, caused presently to be put to death with their father and fo reducing all that country into the manner of a Prouince, vider Solymans obei- M. fance, came to him with twenty thousand men, about the time that the city of the Rhodes was yeelded up. This is the faithleffe dealing of the Turks, not with the Christians only, but with them of their owne superstition also: vsing it as no small policy, vteerly to extinguish the nobility of all countries subject to their seruile tyranny.

Solyman after he had thus subdued the Rhodes, and disposed of the Island as he liked best, Solyman returreturning to Constantinople, brake vp his army, and for the space of three yeares after fol- franciscople, lowed his pleasure, not doing any thing worthy of remembrance. During which time and many yeres after, the rich and flourishing countrey of Italy, sometime mistresse of the world was miserably afflicted & rent in pieces by Charles the fift (then Emperor) and Francis the French king the one enuying vnto the other the glory of the Empire : and he not content therewith, feeking with immoderat ambition to make himfelfe lord of all Italy:most of the other Chriftian princes and states being at the same time either by the one or by the other, drawne into the fellowship of that war, to the great trouble and fore weakning of the Christian commonweale. Wherupon Solyman waiting all occasions that might serue for the inlarging of his em-Dire. & annoying of the Christians, thought it now a fit time for him to fet his foot into Hun- the different of gary, whereinto he had already laid open a way by the taking of Belgrade. He knew right well the chiffian t hat withen King of Hungary was but yong, altogether vnacquainted with the wars, com- word flate of manding ouer his headstrong subjects (especially his rich prelates and nobility) no otherwise """ and """. than oleafed themselues, being himselse rather by them altogether ouersuled besides that, he invade that was in good hope, that the other Christian Princes neer vnto him, either carried away with regard of their own estate, would not, or els before vnto himselse by league fast bound, could not affourd vnto him any great aid or fuccorithe Germanes he knew would make finall haft vnto fuch wars as should yeeld them much danger, and but small pay. As for the Princes of the house of Austria, Charles the Emperor, and Ferdinand his brother, although they were joyned C vnto the vong king with the neerest bonds of allyance (Lewis having married Mary their vongest fister, and Ferdinand, Anne, king Lewis his fister) yet was there as he thought small help to be expected from them: Charles having his hands full in Italy, and Ferdinand altogether carefull of himselferand that Sigismund king of Polonia would for the yong kings sake breake the 1526 antient league be had with the Turkish Emperors, he could hardly be persuaded:as for other Selemen com. Christian Princes farther off he stood not in any great doubt. Thus having with himselfe sin- meth against gled out this young Prince the Hungarian King, whom he had in his greedy mind already deuoured, he fet forward from Constantinople, and was come on his way as far as Sophia in Seruia with a mighty army of two hundred thousand men, before that the Hungarians had any knowledge of his comming (foblind and fencelesse was that state, which now sleeping in se-D curity, had long before loft those eies which euer watcht, and neuer spared cost or paines to keep the fame in fafety) in flead of whom were others come in place, sharp of fight, and too too prouident for that concerned their owne advancement; but blind as beetles in forefeeing this great and common danger (wherwith they were shortly after all quite ouerwhelmed (vntill it was now brought home vnto their owne dores. The yong king of himfelfe but weak, by reasonof his youthfull yeares, and nothing strengthned by them for whom he had most done, and should have bin his greatest stay was wonderfully dismayd with the fame of the approch of so mighty an enemy yet the better to withstand him, he sent Embassadours with all speed to the Christian Princes his neighbors, requesting their aid against the common enemy; but all in vain. In the mean time, after the antient maner of his countrey he gaue out general fum-E mons for the affembly of his counsell for the wars: whither his great stipendarie Prelates (of duty bound to appeare) came with their troups of euill appointed horsmen, and not halfe full; who also deliuered in lesse sums of money by far, than of right they should have don, towards the maintenance of the charge of that common war. And the temporall nobilitie, forgetting the warlike discipline of their famous auncestors, as fresh water souldiers which had seen the Turkish Emperour in his strength, and but little acquainted with some light skirmishes or fmal inuations, in their vain bravery made light account of the Turks; proudly vaunting, Phat although they were in number but few, yet they would eafily ouerthrow the great numbers of them, if ever they came to handy strokes. But above all the rest, one Paulin Tomores, Archbi- The vanity of shop of Colossa, sometimes a Minorit, who had before bin in divers light skirmishes against Temorem. F the Turks, with great insolency did so confidently brag & boast of the victory he vainly dreamed of, that in his fermons unto the fouldiers, and in open talke with the nobility (if he could have done fo much as he vaunted of) it should seem that he himselfe had bin enough to have found five and twenty thousand men in all, horse and foot. So that the foolish hardinesse of G Tomoreus, and others fo forward to give the Turks battell, was of most wife men disliked. The old fouldiers and men of great experience faid plainly, That it was meere folly and madneffe with such a handfull of men to give battell vnto the enemy, who would bring eight times fo many moe into the field as they were. Wherefore some wished, that the yong king should be withdrawn from the eminent danger: among whom Stephanm Perbetim, a noble captain, of all the rest best acquainted with the Turkish wars, gaue counsel, that the person of the yong king should for the safety of the common state, what soeuer should happen, be kept out of danger whollow case in the strong castle of Buda. But the viruly soldiers with open mouth impugned his wholsom counfell, and faid plainly, That except the king himselfe did lead them, they would not at all fight. Of which opinion was also the rash prelat Tomoress, persuading them with all speed to H give the enemy battell, and that the noble yong king under the protection of Almighty God thould in person himselfe go & give the signal of battell against his enemies. The king oner. ruld by this vnlucky counfell, vpon a brauery without reason set forward with his army, and came to a place called Mohatchz or Mugace, which is a little countrey village not farre from Danubius, almost in the middle between Buda and Belgrade. And now Balybeus with 20000 horsemen (the forerunners of the Turkish army) was at hand, at which time the commanders and captains of the kings army, entred into counfell, Whether it were better to incamp their army within their waggons along ft the river of Danubius, and for expect the comming of Toannes Sepusius, County of Cilia, and Vayuod of Transiluania (who was then said to be comming towards the king with his Tranfyluanian horsemen) of all other fittest to have incountred the Turks, or elfe to march on forward, and presently to give them battell ? But Tomeress, who now commanded all, knowing that upon the comming of the Vayuod, he was to give place, and himselfe to be commanded (which vnto so proud a man was no small griefe) for the maintenance of his credit and reputation, and to carry away the glory of the victory he fo vainly hoped for, could not abide to heare of any delay; but hafting headlong to his owndestruction, did with such vehemencie impugn the wholsom counsel of others, who would have expected the comming of the Vayuod, that he by his franticke persuasions, drew on the vnaduised young King into most apparent and manifest danger. For Balybens divided his horsemen into foure battels, which by turns skirmished with the Kings army without intermission, and gaue the Hungarians no leifure to rest either day or night, but continually wheeling about, R kept them in so strait, that no man could without great danger goe to water his horse at the fide of Danubius, which was fast by, or once to stir out of the camp, but were inforced to dig pits for water in places where they lay: with which necessity Tomoreus was inforced to put the army in order of battell, and there was now no remedy, but he must of necessity fight for the honour of his Prince and countrey. His battell was ranged all in length, and his horsmen not altogether (as it was thought) vnfitly placed here and there among his footmen; left the Turks (being in number eight to one) should with their multitude compasse them round, and so inforce them to fight as it were in a ring : for now was Solyman come also with his huge army. The Hungarian tents defended with a small garrison, were left a little from the army on the right hand, inclosed round about with wagons, one chained to another : neere vnto the which, L. Tomorem, Generall of this vnluckie battell, had not altogether undiscreetly placed atroup of chosen horsmen for the desence of the Kings person against all vncertaine euents of the battell. But this day (vnlucky to the Hungarian name, but vnto the King himselse most fatall and vnfortunat)ouerthrew that his purpose, deuised too late for the safety of the kings person: for at the first encounter, the Hungarians, although they had received no harme by the Turkish Artillery (being mounted too high, of purpose as it was thought, the gunners being for most part Christians) were easily beaten downe and ouerthrowne, oppressed by the multitude Tomorem flain. of their enemies, especially Tomorem with the rest of the prelats and nobility, being almost all flaine together, and the Hungarian horfmen also either flainor put to flight. All things going thus towrack, a company of Turks affailed the camp, which was hardly defended by the weak M garrison. Which thing the troup of the chosen horsemen appointed for desence of the kings person, beholding, could not be staid, but that they would needs help them which defended the campe. The young King feeing all his army discomfitted, and himselfe for laken of the horiemen which he was in hope should have guarded him, betooke himselse to flight.

A But as he was making shift for himself, thinking to have passed over a senny ditch, his horse King Limis in plunging out, fel backward vpon him into the ditch; where being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a ditch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a ditch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with armor, a disch, a file being heavy loden with a file being not able to help himself, he was in the middest of the filthy ditch in the mud most miserably drowned. Some few horfmen escaped out of the battel, the rest were either slain or taken prifoners. This woful battel, not fufficiently to be lamented, as the ground of the miferies of that worthy kingdom, was fought the 29 day of October, in the year 1526.

Solyman having obtained this victory, marched on directly to Buda the regall feat of the Hungarian Kings, which was deliuered to him with the castle, vpon condition that he should not violate any man either in person or goods, and at his departure to leave the same again to the Hungarians: all which things he according to their request faithfully performed. Being B entred into the castle, he wonderfully commended the same, but lodged not therin, because it is by their antient Law forbidden the Turkish Emperour to lodge within any walled place which is not his own. Wherfore he returned and lodged in his camp along it the river of Da-

Whila Solyman thus lay at Buda, feuen bloudy heads of the Bishops and greatest of the The brade of Nobility (flain in the late battel at Mohatchz) were presented to him, all set in order vpon a the sain Christian By Shops wooden steps wherat he smiled, to see his courtiers laying their right hands upon their brests, and captains and bending their bodies as if they had done them great obcilance, to falute them by name, preferred to and in derision to welcom them by the names of valiant Popes. But afterwards, when he had more particularly inquired what every one of them was, it is reported, that he most of al detested Ladislaus Salcanius the great Bishop of Strigonium, for his miserable couetousnesse, that being a man of infinit wealth, refused to spare part therof vnto his soucraigne, requesting the same at his great need. Tomoreus he blamed of inconsiderat rashnes, for that he being a Clergy man, would busie himself so far in matters not belonging to his vocation. On the contrary part he commended Franciscus Perenus Bishop of Veradium, a man honorably descended, for the Bishop of his wife counsel (though it was not followed) for that he had heard it reported that hee as a Veradium 100 true prophet, fortelling the common flaughter infuing, had sharpely faid in the Councell, at true a prophet, fuch time as Tomoreus would needs fight with the Turks, and was not by any means to bee remoued from that his fatal opinion, That hee did foresee what that their Frier-like Generall would the next day do ; and that he would with fo great an enterprise effect no more, but to D make one holyday the more in the Christian Calenders, in remembrance of 30000 Hungaria an Martyrs, most miserably slain of the Turks in an vnequal battell, for defence of the Christian faith and religion: for at that time, they which willingly exposed themselves to death in defence of the Christian faith, were all accounted for Martyrs. Georgius Sepulius and others, he called rath fools, that would aduenture with fo small strength to incounter so strong an E. nemy. At such time as the counterfeits of King Lewis and Mary his wife were shewed to him. he honourably faid, that he was forry for the young King, that it was his hard hap to have for the bonorable ne honourably faid, that he was forry for the young King, that it was his hard hap to hade a free of Soly-vnaduised counsellors in a matter of so great importance, as to persuade him against all reafree of Solyman coconing fon to fight at so great disaduantage: And that hee came not into Hungary to take his king- his comming dom from him, but only to reuenge the wrongs don unto him by the Hungarians; and that if inio Hungary. he had escaped the danger of the battel, he would assuredly have again restored vnto him the Kingdom of Hungary, contenting himfelf with some small tribute: and that it should have bin vnto him honor enough to have faued the nephew of Sigismund King of Polonia, his confederat, so strongly allyed with the honorable house of Austria. All which he commanded to be told to Mary the Queen, who was for fear fled from Buda to Possonium. Which might perhaps all feem to have bin either dissemblingly spoken, or falsly reported of the equity and courtefie of the barbarous King, if he had not shortly afterwards to the ample declaration of his bounty and liberality, without any defert, given the same kingdom of Hungary to loannes Sepulius, not born of any Royall bloud, and then retaining the minde of a very enemy. After that, he took away three goodly images of braffe of antient workmanship, which were placed in the entrance into the Kings Palace, by that renowned King Matthia Corvinus the great favourer of rare qualities and yertues. These images represented the forms of Hercules with his club, of Apollo with his harp, and Diana with her bow and quiuer. All which hee placed in the Tilt-yard at Constantinople, as a trophey of the Hungarian victoric. Neuerthelesse

these images were since taken down by the persuasion of the Musti, and mosten (as contrary Fff2 to their superstition) and great ordnance made of them. He caried also away with him three G pieces of Artillery of most excellent and curious work, and certain brasen pillars of chamse red work, which supported the chapiters of the gates. He taried at Buda about twenty dayes in which time to fatisfie the cruel nature and greedy defires of his foldiers, he fent out divers troups of horimen into the countries therabouts; by whom all the country betwirt Rab and the river of Tibyscus was by that sudden and vnexpected incursion so destroyed, that as it is reported, about an hundred and fifty thousand people of al forts were either slain or led away into most miserable captinitie. All which don, he returned again by the same way hee came,

LIANNES SERVEus, i ayund of Trancluania.

About the same time, Ioannes Sepusius Vayuod of Transylvania, with a great power came now too late into Hungary to have aided the King: but glad (as was thought) of his death, as H Transfinancia, a first to the tending to his own advancement, for a finuch as he was now (the King being dead without if fue) a man of greatest account among the Nobility of Hungary. Wherfore as one of adeep and reaching wit, and in great hope to obtain the kingdom, he began cunningly to labourdiuers Noblemen one by one, and instantly to request them, that at the next parliament they would not betray the honor of their Countrey, in suffering the royall dignity of that antient kingdom to be transferred vnto a stranger, of such a nation as haply loued them not. For why, the Hungarians ought well to remember what great calamities they had received in former times, in chusing forrein kings and strangers to rule ouer them, and in following their vnfortunat enfignes against the Turks; which thing the woful misery of times past might notably proue, which either Sigifmundus of Bohemia, or Ladislaus the first of Polonia, by their vnfortunat battels, once at Nicopolis, again at Culumbarium, and last of all at Varna, had brought vnto the Hungarians. But to speak, nay once to remember the harmes received by the long cowardife of Vladiflam, or this laterashnes of his son King Lewis, would make any noble mind to blush and be ashamed : vnder whose gouernment all military discipline, and the glory of Hungary, might wel be thought to be vaterly lost. And he faid there remained of the nobility of Hungary men honourably descended of most antient Houses, worthy of the kingdome, who bare noble minds, and were of sufficient conrage, discretion and power, in this time of common heavines, to restore the honor of the Estate, and worthily to defend the Kingdome. Amongst whom (said he) I would not be accounted so base minded, or so heavy headed, (although there be many which for the honor of their houses and wealth may seem to gobe. K fore me) that I will therfore confesse, that there is any of them for valour, prowesse, or fortune, better than my self, either for conducting anarmy, or government of a Kingdom. For I thall be a King of courage and valour fufficient, if by your fauourable good will I thall bee thought worthy of your consent and suffrages. The Vayuod taking this course, by his ernest fuit and labor had won the good wils of many; and fo much the easier, for that Stephanns Bater (a man of greatest nobility among the Hungarians) was a little before gon into Bohemiavato King Ferdinand, who was then greatly busied, by reason of a parliament there summoned, in procuring the fauour of the Nobility and commons of that Realme, against the time of the Parliament; wherein hee was in good hope to be chosen King, as hee was in short time-

At the same time the Hungarians were with great solemnity celebrating the sunerall of their late King:whose dead body after the departure of Solyman from Buda, was found whole, by the demonstration of one Cotrifem a squire of his body, who was present when he was drowned, and so was brought out of the sens of Mohatez, to Alba Regalis, where it was with great pomp buried among the Sepulchres of the other kings of Hungary his predeceffors. Which folemne funerall onceended, the generall military Parliament (by the authority and voyce wherof the Kings of Hungary were by their antient Lawes and Cuftomes to be chosen) was called in the shutting vp whereof, John the Vayuod having in that common heavines no competitor, nor any of the greatest nobility which durst stand against him, was with the great applaufe, and a generall confent of all there present, chosen King. Vinto whom forthwith Pe. M. Irns Perennue Came and presented the antient Crown of the Kingdome of Hungary, which was in his keeping, made after an homely fail hion of pure gold; with which the lawfull Kings of Hungary vical alwaies to be folemnly crowned. It is reported, that, it was the Crowne of Stephanus the first King of Hungary, and was by an antient Custom alwaies kept in the castle of Vicegrade. And so token the Vayuod was orderly crowned, and consecrated by the hands of the Sepasius Paulus Bishop of Strigonium, lately chose in stead of Ladislaus Salvanius, slaine in the battell for an crow. at Mugace, and by the hands of Stephanus Brodaricus Bishop of Vacia, whom he chose for his ned King of Secretary. And vnto America Cibaca he gaue the honour of the Vayuod of Transylvania. Hunga 3. being but a little before chosen Bishop of Veradium. In his preserment, he was greatly holcenvnto the kingdome by the nobility which followed him out of Transylvania, men of great account both in peace and warre: among whom descended of the Hungarian bloud, were chiefe. Stephanus Verbetius, Paulus Antandrus, Gregorius Pefchenius, Nicholans Gleffa, and lanus Docia. But whilest this new King is in this fort busied in rewarding his friends and strengthening himselfe in his kingdome, he was advertised that Ferdinand his competitor of the Hun-B garian kingdome was chosen King of Bohemia: who out of the old courtesse betwixt (Matthis Corninus and Fredericus the Emperours great grandfather, alledged great claime vnto Ferdinand line that kingdome, derived from the time of Ladiflaus, who was reported to have beene poisoned of Bolinnia 15arthetime of the folemnization of his marriage, through the ambition and malice of Georgius the finedome Pacibracian who, affecting the kingdome of Bohemia, thorthy after obtained the fame. And of Hangary. now it feemed that the time was come, wherein Ferdinand made greater with the kingdome of Bohemia, and ftrengthened with the power of his brother Charles the Emperour, not forgetting his right, might voon good ground lay claime vnto the kingdome of Hungary, vnto him (as he pretended) of right belonging ever fince the time of Albertus the Emperour. Neither did Ferdinand beside the strength of Austria and Bohemia, want the furtherance of di-C uers of the Princes of Hungary: having in his court many of vinquiet foirits, halfe fugitiues. defirous of change, which enuied at the Vayuods royall preferment (as if it had beene taken from them solues, more worthy thereof than he) by the rash and tumultuous fauour of the vulgar people. For besides Bator, who in most mens judgement might most worthily have requised and obtained the kingdome, there were others also almost of like nobility and valour, as Valentinus Turaccus, Stephanus Maylatus, Janus Scala, Gufper Scredius, Baltafor Pamphilus, and Ferentius Gnarius; to whom also was joyned Paulus Bachitius borne in Seruia, a valiant Gentleman, who being entered into the Mahometan religion to avoid the Turkish slavery, got away vnto the Christians, and hardly escaped from the battell of Mohatchz. By the persuasion of these noblemen, Ferdinand of his own disposition ready enough to claime his right, especial-D ly a kingdome, and trusting vnto his strength in Austria, Bohemia, Rhetia, Stiria, and Carynthia, marched directly towards Buda. With whose comming, John the new King being wonderfully troubled, as a man befet with want of all things, having neither sufficient firength whereupon to rest in his new got kingdome, neither any great assurance of the sidelity of his subjects, like enough either for feare, or of their naturall inconstancy, to fall from him, determined not to abide the comming of his enemy to Buda: but exhorting his captaines to follow him, although he were glad to depart and give place to his entil fortune for a time, with fuch power as he had brought with him out of Transyluania, and such other as he could otherwife leny, he passed ouer the river to Pessum: and not daring any where thereahouts to rest, by long marches passed ouer the river Tibiscus, and there incamped at Tocai, which was a E strong castle vpon the further side of the river. His departure being knowne, Ferdinand marching on, obtained Buda without refistance: where he staied a while, and consulted with his King Ferdicaptaines, Whether he should pursue his flying enemy, or not. But it was quickly resoluted, naved taketh That the discouraged enemy was to be speedily pursued, before he should gather greater Bada. strength, or enter into greater policies. Wherefore Ferdinand committed all his army vnto the nobility of Hungary, his friends, whom we have before named; who marching with all speed possible, came to the river Tibiscus: where passing over upon a bridge made of boats which they brought with them in waggons for that purpose, they came with ensignes displaied vnto thecastle of Tocai, where the King lay with his army in order of battell. But terrified with the sudden comming of his enemies, and debating with his captaines of the greatnesse of the F danger, tooke a course vnto himselfe rather safe than honourable: for his captaines desiring nothing more than to joyne battell, and in manner contemning their enemies, persuaded him to withdraw himselse a little out of the battell, and to keepe him out of danger; and if things fell out otherwise than well, to reserue himselse unto his better fortunes : as for themselves they would most resolutely fight against those traiterous sugitives, sorasmuch as it were great dishonour for them, being Hungarians, a warlike people by nature, to refuse battell being offer G red by the enemy. Amongst the chieftains of the Kings army, Ferentian Bude an old captaine of great experience and courage was chiefe, to whom the King deliuered his enligne with his own hands, and he with great skill ordered his battell, for the number of his fouldiers he him. felfe flood in the main battell with the Hungarians, placing the Transyluanians in the wings. In Ferdinands army, Valentinus Turaccus led the maine battell with the Hungarians, vider Res. dinands Enfigue; ftrengthened on the one fide with troups of horfemen out of Styria, and on the other with the horsemen of Austria. But Paulus Bachitim (according to the manner of the Turki(h wars, wherewith he was well acquainted) with a company of light horsemen lay cole in ambush in a convenient place for that purpose, a good distance off, against the less wing of the enemies army, ready as occasion should serue, to take his most advantage. It was not H greatly needful for the captaines to vie any perfuations to encourage their fouldiers, ready enough of themselves to fight. The great ordnance once discharged, the armies came saft on the Armies of and joyned battell, where the wings of both battels fought with diners fortune. The Styrian horiemen were not able to endure the force of the Transylvanians, but were put to the work. And on the other fide, the left wing of Bode his army, confifting for most part of raw and vaexpert souldiers, was by the horsemen of Austria overthrown. At the same time both the main battels (being almost all Hungarians) fought with equall courage, and that so eagetly, as feldome had bin feene a more fierce or cruell battell. But by a fresh charge given by Ferdinard horsemen, who had now put to flight the right wing of Bodo his battell, all Bodo bis army fight ting most valiantly, was disordred and put to flight: Bodo the General Laboring to restore the battell, and to faue the entigne to him before by the King deliuered, was by the comming in of Paulus Bachiling with his light horsemen, taken. The other captaines seeing all lost, and past hope of recourry, betooke themselves to flight; all the Kings Artillery and Ensignes were taken by the enemy. The King seeing the ouerthrow of his army, for safegard of his life fled into Polonia. Ferdinandi captaines following the course of the victory, entred into Transyluania; where the people yeelding themselues at the first, all the whole prouince submitted it felfe vnto the authority of Ferdinand. Bodo and the rest of the noblemen that were taken prifoners, with the enfignes taken from the enemies, were fent to Ferdinand. But when Bedo hauing his liberty promised, could not be persuaded to renounce his oath giuen to King John, and to beare armes against him, he was by Ferdinands commandement cast into a darke dungeon, K where fhortly after confumed with forrow and griefe, he miserably ended his life.

Shortly after, Ferdinand (the Hungarians generally submitting themselues vnto him) was crowned K. of by their common confent saluted King, and crowned with the same old Crowne wherewith King John had bin crowned, which the same Perenus (a man of little constancy) brought vnto him; and with him was also crowned Anne his wife, the only fifter of the late King Levis. All which folemne ceremonies were celebrated at Alba-Regalis, the viual place for the coronation of the Hungarian Kings. Ferdinand by rare felicity thus possessed of two kingdomes, whereunto he was not borne, returned into Bohemia, and left his deputies for the gouernement of the kingdome of Hungary: these were Stephanus Bator, whom he appointed Viceroy, with whom he joined Paulus Bishop of Strigonium, who had also revolted from K. Iohn; and L made Berethfaxtus Secretary, and Alexius Turfonus a Moravian, Treasurer.

King John thus miserably distressed, and thrust out of his kingdome by Ferdinand, sled to Hieronymus Lasem, a man for his honorable descent and learned vertue, of great fame and reputation among it the Polonians: who glad of so honourable a ghest, was more carefull of nothing than with all possible kindnesse and curtesse how to comfort him, wrapt vp inso many calamities for the loffe of his kingdom: he frankely promifed unto him all his ownewealth (which was not small) for the recourry of his former estate; and that which more was, for the renuing of his former felicitie, the vttermost of his wit and deuice, which in the compassing. of all great matters was accounted wonderfull. This bountiful entertainment of this poore King by Lasew.was not altogethervpleasant to Sigismund King of Polonia, although because M he would not offend Ferdinand, with whom he was joined in friendship and allyance) hee feemed to most men plainly to forget himself, in shewing so small kindnesse to K. Iohn, whose sifter Barbarahe had fomtime maried which was the cause that Lascus forgat no point of curtesie in entertaining his ghest, and yet Sigismunds credit with King Ferdinand not toucht. But when they had spent almost a month in consultation and debating of matters too & fro, Las. Lasconnection cm accustomed with his deep wit tharply to reason, & aduitedly to determine of most weigh transaction. ty causes, at last rested vpon this one point, That ready help in so hard and desperat a case was solumnes. only to be hoped for of the Turkish Emperor Solyman: being of opinion, that he being a most mighty Prince, and of an honorable disposition answerable to his greatnes, would not reject the humble prayers of an oppressed and exiled king especially, if that being by his mercy and power restored, he could be content for so great a benefit to hold his kingdom, as of the bounty of the Othoman kings. For Lascus faw that Solyman (fo great and proud an Emperor) was not fodefirous of kingdomes (whereof he had fo many as could not callly be reckoned, then commanding ouer a great part of the world) as of glory and renown, where with he understood him tobe wonderfully delighted about all other Kings of the East, naturally carried away with that windy vanity. This counsell (as in effect it prooued) was to king Iohn wholesome and reafonable, if a man do but respect the poore estate of a king, so greatly wronged, living in exile but reforcing the Christian common weale, it was vindoubtedly most dangerous and lamentable, for one mans particular profit to bring the whole state into most horrible and dreadfull danger: but the fick minds of worldly men, living in fmal hope of doing well, and at the point of desperation, refuse no worldly remedies, be they neuer so doubtfull or dangerous. And not long after, upon this resolution with the king, Lasens desirous by noble actions to increase the Lasens each honour of his name, took the matter vpon him, and went as Embassador from the exiled King Embassador for to Solyman to Constantinople. The report was, that Sigifmund did not only not stay him, but K toba to Solyman. C fecretly gaue him his fafe conduct with letters of credence, wherin he commended him vnto the Bassa's & other great men in Solymans court, descended of the Polonian bloud, as his faithfull and louing subject, sent thither upon an extraordinary and speciall embassage. Lascus as foon as he was come to Constantinople, with wonderfull dexterity had in short time won the fauor, not of the Bassacs only, but of the other courtiers also, presenting them with such gifts as might for the finenesse and rarenes thereof, rather than for the value (as he thought) be most acceptable and pleafing to their wives: for among it that barbarous and corrupted people nothing is better welcome than gifts, whither they proceed of simple good wil, or other respect. is no great difference. Amongst the great Bassa's at that time of greatest power and authority. was Luftebeius, or rather Lutzu, who had married Solymans fifter; and Abraham borne at Pirga, Abraham Baffid D abase village in Acarnania, brought up in the court from his childhood with Solyman : he was then visier or chiefe of the Bassaes, and keeper of the Emperors seale, and was by his office to subscribe all such grants or letters as passed from the Emperor: by which his great place and the speciall fauor he had with Solyman, he in magnificence, power, and authority, far exceeded all the rest of the Bassaes, doing what soeuer pleased himselfe, and that with such souer aigntie and the good liking of Solyman, that it was commonly faid, he was the commander of his thoughts. Laseus thus infinuated into the court, and oftentimes talking with the Basia's without an interpreter, for that he could well speake the Sclauonian tongue (the familiar speech of the Turkish courtiers) earnestly solicited the Kings cause, wonderfully commending him: for at his first comming, after he had faluted Solyman, and was about to have declared the cause

E of his comming, he was after the manner of the Turkish Court referred to the Bassacs: for So-lyman vsed not to admit any Christian to talke with him in his Court. Lascus requested of Soreuenging his wrongs and fubduing his enemies, had by law of arms (fortune fo judging) gai-

the maiefty of Solyman, paying him fuch yerely tribute as it should please him to impose, and to make it knowne to all men, that he was his vasfall. Which thing if it would please him to grant, it should be no lesse honour and glory to Solyman himselfe, than profitable and comfortable vnto the distressed King. For beside, that heroicall Kings are compared vnto gods, ball of K. John kish Emperor, as of right belonging to him, fince the time that Solyman with victorious hand rather for giving than receiving: it was easie to be seen, how greatly it did concern the profit & of the Othoman Kings to be neighboured with a weak and tributary King, rather than with Ferdinand a Prince of great power, lately chosen King of Bohemia, supported by the strength of his brother Charles the Emperor, commanding ouer the warlike Nation of the Germanes: which was as much difference as was betwitthe maintenance of a continual heavy war vp on his borders, and the fafe injoying of a most affured peace. Besides, it concerned the Turkes to beware, that such things as they had gotten by the sword, they should also by the sword defend, and not to fuffer any one to grow greater than the rest in riches and power. For it might fo fal out that Charls, grown to be a Prince of mighty power, might draw the rest of the Christian princes to join with him in the common cause of the Christian religion, & in that quarel, as the Christian Kings of Europ had formerly done, with vnited forces to feek to recouer H again what they had before lost; whose force it would be hard to withstand. These things being sharply deliuered, and by the Bassa's again reported to Solyman, who standing at a secret window had before heard them, as they were by Lafens to the Baffa's declared; it was no great labor to perfuade the Turkish Emperor, of himself desirous of glory and soueraignty, againe Selpman gran. to undertake the Hungarian war, and to grant King John his request; promiting according to ten Ericas bis the succes of the victory, to give him that he defired, so that hee would faithfully personne what he had promifed, and not shew himself therfore vnthankful.

In the mean time, Ferdinand vpon great reason thinking it necessarie by all means possible to confirm his possession of the Kingdom of Hungary, and searing no force but the Turks, determined to proue Solymans disposition, and to seek for his friendship; hoping by reasonable It means to compasse it, by shewing vnto the barbarous prince (not altogether abhoring from the commendation of justice) his antient title and claim, and that he was by the antient laws of the country right heir thereof: thinking that Solyman, having obtained formany victories, and ruling ouer fo many kingdoms, would now at length give himfelf to peace, as a man contented with his glory already gotten. His defire was to be received into his friendship, and to join with him in league vpon the same conditions which Ladislaus and his son Lewis had for certain years before obtained of the Othoman Kings, and Sigismund King of Polonia then also with like quietnes enjoied. Wherfore having found out a fit man whom he might send vpon this embassage to Constantinople (one Ioannes Oberdanscan an Hungarian) he furnished him accordingly, and gaue him gifts, fuch as he thought good to bestow vpon the great Baf- K fa's. But when Oberdanscus was come unto Constantinople, he found Solyman harder to be intreated than he had before hoped, and the Bassa's altogether vnwilling to hear of any league: for although he was courteously received of Solyman, and most patiently heard, whilest hee both cloquently and discreetly before the great Bassa's delinered his embassage; yet in the flutting vp of all, he received nothing but a proud and infolent answer. For Solyman faid, it was far from the manner of his Auncestors, to receive them into grace and fauour, which had don injury vnto the Othoman name: wherefore that Ferdinand had done impudently to inuade another mans kingdom, and to thinke to hold it vnto himselse; forsomuch as his old title and claim which he flood so much vpon, was altogether extinguished and lost by the Law of Armes, by his late victory against King Lewis. For which causes he adjudged him vnworthy L of his friendship and fauor; purposing sharply to revenge the wrong he had received, & proclaiming War, to come again into Hungary with such a power as should be sufficient to inuade King Ferdinand either in Austria or Germany. Wherefore in stead of friendship and League, he denounced vnto him all the calamities of War: and so commaunded the Embasfalor with speed to depart from Constantinople. But Oberdansess when he was come backe again as far as Vienna, and had there told the Kings Lieutenants of the threatening words of Solyman, and that he would shortly come thither with his army, he was not of any of them belecued, but reputed for a vaine man. Wherfore to shunthe hatred of them which mistooke truth for fallhood, he made hast to come vnto Ferdinand, who was then at Spires laboring for voices to further his fuit; for that at the next affembly of the States of the Empire, which M was then at hand for the coronation of his brother Charles, he himself as he wel hoped, was to be chosen King of the Romanes. The newes brought by oberdansen did not a little trouble King Ferdinand, foreseeing as it were what would happen; for that the Turkish Tyrant vsed not lightly to break such promises, but to performe them to the vttermost. And that more

A increased his care, he knew he should come in earll time to craue help of the Germans, for the defence of his Kingdome in Hungary, against so mighty an enemy, especially his brother Charles the Emperor being busied in his warres in Italy, and he himselfe wanting money, the only meanes to raise an army to withstand the Turke. The Spring now come, and all things fresh and green, Solyman altering nothing of his former determination, having levied an army Solyman comof an hundred and fifteen thousand men, set forward from Hadrianople, his Europeian horse methins Hage men going before him, conducted by Abraham the great Baffa, and Achomates Michael Ogli, gary with a Generall of the Acanzij or voluntary horsemen : and his Asian souldiers led by Becrambeius great army. Balla following after him: he himselfe with his Ianizaries and souldiers of the court keeping in the middle. And marching on in this fort, came in fifteene dayes to Belgrade, where King B Ishnaccompanied with Lascus and such of the Hungarian nobility as tooke his part, came vnto him, of purpose to make himselfe knowne vnto him which was to protect him; and doing menas Bel. him all the honour he possibly could, to request him to proceed to reuenge his quarrell. men with grave and yet friendly countenance, raising himselfe a little from the cushion wheron he sat, gaue him his right hand, protesting, That nothing could happen vnto him better, or that he more defired of God, than to be able to relieue distressed Princes, especially such as were wrongfully oppressed by his enemies: wherefore he willed him to be of good comfort. promifing of his bounty frankly to bestow upon him what soeuer he should in that warre win with the fword from the enemy. King Iohn obtained this rare fauor of Solyman by the earnest mediation of Abraham the commanding Bassa; whom he had before at Constantinople by C his Embassador Lassus so woon with gifts and requests, that he throughly tooke upon him the defence of the kings cause: wherein Lason was especially holpen by Aloysim Grittm the Duke of Venice his sonne, who then followed the Turks campe, and was for his fathers sake and the great sufficiencie he held himselfe, had in great reputation among st the Turks; and in such fauor with Abraham, who did all in all with Solyman, that he could perfuade him to any thing he would. For this Aleysim Grittin, borne and brought up in Constantinople, and wonderful! eloquent in the Turkish tongue, had by the honourable carriage of himselfe, and the great port he kept in his house, so throughly possessed Abraham (that al commanded) that he would many times bring Solyman himselfe over the haven to Pera, to solace himselfe in Grittus his pleasant gardens and banquetting houses, which he had there most sumptuously made after D the Italian manner: whereby to his great profit he obtained to be the chiefe man in receiving of the Turks customes. The fame of Solymans comming directly from Belgrade to Buda, fo terrified the Citifens of Buda, that they almost all for sooke the city and fled vnto other places further off, some to Strigonium, some to Alba Regalis, some to Possonium: so that at his first comming he entred the city (almost desolate) without any resistance: the castle holden by a garrison of Germans, he commanded to be befreged. The captaine of the castle was one Thomas Nadassus, a man of Solyman enters great account among the Hungarians, both for the honour of his house, and his qualities an. response fwerable to the same, graced with singular learning: he perceiving his soldiers dismayed with befreeth the the fight of fo great an army and willing to furrender up the castile as beformed a valiant cap- castile E tain, forbad his fouldiers to have any talke with the enemy, commanding the great artillery to bebent and discharged upon the Turks: and seeing his soldiers slack and timorous rep, rooued them of cowardise & treason, threatning them with shamefull death if they did not hold out the fiege to the vttermost, and shew themselves valiant men both for the honor of their coun. try, and of king Ferdinand, whose pay they received, and of whose bounty they were to expect rewards & preferments answerable to their deserts. But they misdoubting by the running too and fro of the Turks, that the castle was undermined; and smelling, or at leastwife imagining themselues to smell the sent of the gunpowder, which they supposed to be in the mine, and doubting to be presently blown vp; were struck with such a sudden seare; that neither the seare of future punishment, neither the shame of so foule a fact, nor the reverence of so worthy a F captaine could stay them, but that they would needs without further delay deliuer up the ca-

flic:which when they could by no means persuade the resolute captain to consent to, but that he stil with stern countenance exclaimed against their cowardise and treason, they layd hands on him, and bound him hand and foot, and fo presently concluded with the enemy to yeeld to him the castle, so that they might in safety depart thence with bag and baggage; which their request Solyman granted. But when the garison soldiers (in number about 700) were about to G depart with their baggage toward Possonium, as was before agreed; and the Janizaries com. ming into the castle, having loosed the captain, were about to let him go also, solyman aduer. tifed of the trechery of the garrifon foldiers, and of the fidelity of the captain; changing his rany unto bit mind, indged fuch villanous minded men vnworthy of his mercy, and in detertation of their the gard on fol. perfidious dealing with their captain, gaue them all to his lanizaries to be flain; but voto the oursefreibty captain himfelf he offered honorable entertainment 3 which when he refused, solyman curte hal delibered treesfle, to be outly fent him away holpen therin by the commendation of king Iohn, although his fifter was maried to Stephanus Maylas his deadly enemy. Which bloudy execution don by the commandement of the bloudy tyrant, the Turkes said was not only lawfully done, but also to the immortal glory of his name in the execution of justice. Which might peraduenture seeme H reasonable, if the perpetual hatred of that barbarous nation against the Christians, gaue not iust occasion to suspect, that it proceeded rather of their antient malice, than of any regard of justice. For why should the Germans, who had offended to his great good, and therefore obtained his safe conduct, be thought worthy of so cruel death? when as Solyman himself in punishing the perjury of another, ran into wilful perjury himself, peruerting the commendation of justice which he so much defired, by his most bloudy and vniust sentence.

Buda the chief city of Hungary thus taken by Solyman, he resolved forthwith to besiege Vienna the chiefeity of Austria; in good hope, that by the cariage away of that, the other Cities of leffe frength both of Hungary and Austria would without any resistance yeeld vnto him, Wherfore he fent before, Achomates with the voluntary horfmen, who according to the man- I Auftria fioited ner of the Turkish wars, running thorow the heart of Hungary, and entring into Austria, with fire and fword, paffed by Vienna, miferably burning and destroying the Country before him, euen as far as Lyntz. The poor people not knowing where to hide themselues from the sury of their enemies, nor of whom to craue helpe, fled as men and women dismaied, carrying with them their beloued children, the vnfortunat pledges of their loue, and what els they could, as things faued out of the midst of the fire. For what socuet fel into the enemies hand, was lost without recure : the old men were flain, the young men led away into captinity, women ranished before their husbands faces, and afterwards slain with their children, young infantswere ript out of their mothers wombs, and others taken from their brefts were cut in pieces, or els thrust vpon sharpe stakes, yeelding vp againe that breath which they had but a little before K. receiued, with many other incredible cruelties which were then by the mercilesse Enemie committed. Solyman himselfe shortly after followed these fore-runners, and setting forward with all his army from Buda towards Vienna, by the way took the Castle of Altenburg, whe ther by force or composition is diversly reported. Of the garrison souldiers there placed by King Ferdinand, he reserved 300 Bohemians, whom he commanded to follow his camp. Hee alfo affaulted the little city of Neapolis seuentimes in one day, & was as often repulsed but being loth to spend any longer time about a town of so small importance, hee for sooke that, Selyman comes and held on his way to Vienna, whither he came about the fix and twentieth day of September, and incamped in fine places round about the City; with fuch a world of people, that. unto them which viewed his Camp from the highest tower in Vienna, it seemed that all the ground for the space of eight miles was couered with the multitude of his Tents and people. King Ferdinand, who from the time that he had by his Embassadour Oberdanseus receiued the hard answer from Solyman, alwaies stood in doubt of his comming, and beside his own forces (which were no way greatenough to oppose against so mighty an enemie) craued aid of the other Christian Princes his Neighbours, especially of the Princes of the Empire. Who granting him aid against the Common Enemy, appointed Fredericke County Palatine of the Rhyne and Duke of Bavaria, Generall of their Forces. But whileft the Germans after their manner, slowly set forward, and made lesse hast than the greatnesse of the present danger required; Solyman comming in the mean time, had so belayd the City, that it was not possible for the Duke Frederick by any means to get into it, but was glad to stay with his At- M my at Chremfe, about twelue miles from Vienna. A few dayes before, by good hap, you the report of the losse of Buda, twenty thousand souldiers, horsmen and sootmen out of diaers Countries, were in good time come to Vienna. Amongst these, the chiefe Commanders were Philip the Paltzgraue Duke Fredericks Nephew(a yong Gentleman of great courage & hope, fent thither but a little before with a few companies of horsemen and sootmen by Fredericke his vncle, who was comming after with a greater power himfelfe, but was now thut out of the city by Solyman) Nicholaus County of Salma, the L. William Rogendorff, steward of the Kings houshold, Ioannes Cazzianer, a noble man of Ctoatia, and afterwards Gouernor of Vienna: and next unto them, Nicholaus Turrianus, Ioannes Hardecus, Leonardus Velsius, Hector Ramsacke, men both for their birth and valour of great account amongst the Germans. The city of Vienna as Vienna badly it was of some good strength toward the North, by reason of Danubius, so in other places it strifted. was at that time neither by art nor nature strong. The ditches, such as they were, were altoge. ther drie, and easie to be passed ouer: the wals of bricke, built round without any flankers, and neither high nor thicke, but after the antient simple manner of fortification of cities : for be-R fore that time neither had king Ferdinand, searing no enemy, neither they of Vienna, who had not of many yeares feen an enemy, had any care to fortifie the city: but as men altogether buried in fecurity, and nothing fearing the comming of fo mighty an enemy (although they were therof before admonished by Oberdanseus) had not so much as cast vp any rampire or bulwark, more than at the gate of Carinthia, whereon they might conveniently place their great ordnance: so that of a 100 great peeces, and 300 others of lesse charge, which might have wonderfully annoyed the enemy, a great part ferued to novie, for want of conuenient place to mount them vpon. Yet as the fudden comming of the enemy, and the shortnesse of the time gaue leave, fuch bulwarkes as they could vpon the fudden, they cast vp, and planted their ordnance thereon. The city was divided into divers quarters, and to every part a strong garrison C appointed for the defence thereof, all the gates of the city were mured vp, except fuch as were of purpose reserved to sallie outat. Now had Abraham the great Bassa incamped himselfe voon a high hill, where stood a ruinous castle, from whende he might ouerlooke all the City, yet so, as that he lay out of the danger of gun shot. Becrambeius, Solymans great commander in Afia, lay at the gate called Purgatoria, neer the Church of S. Viderich. In the third campe towards the rifing of the hils, lay Michael Ogli, towards the Church of S. Vitus. At the Scottiff gate towards Danubius, lay the Afapi, with divers companies of the lanizaries : which with thot out of their trenches, fuffered no man to appeare vpon the wals in that quarter without most manifest danger, and poured such showrs of arrows ouer the wals into the city, as if they had fallen out of the clouds that hardly could any man thir in the city vnarmed, but hee was D forthwith wounded. Solyman himselfe lay neer vnto S. Markes Church, compassed about with the lanizaries and other foldiers of the Court, defended also with the bricke wals of the gardens thereabouts. Whilest the Turks were thus incamping themselves, the Christian defendants oftentimes fortunatly fallyed out voon them, and flew many of them. In one of which fallies Wolfgangus Hagen a valiant captain, with certain old foldiers of the Spaniards was flain fighting mock valiantly at the gates of the castle: and in another skirmish Christophorus Setlitz a man of great courage, fallying out of the city with fine hundred horfemen, even vnto the enemies trenches, was intercepted and taken with fix others of his company, who were alcompelled by the Turks to carry fo many heads of their flain fellows vpon poles, and fo prefented vnto Solyman: of whom he inquired many things as well concerning Ferdinand himselfe, and where he was, as concerning the Princes which had the charge of the city, whether they were in hope to defend the same against his mighty power or not. Whereunto Christophorus aptly and wisely answered, although not altogether so truly, That King Ferdinand lay not farre off at the city of Lintz, expecting the affembling of a great army : and that the Princes of Germany, Bohemia, Morauia, and of divers other places were comming to him, with great aid ; so that if he would but stay a little untill his forces were come together, hee should then see whether of them were of greater strength and power: forasmuch as it would not be long before the King would come and give him battell : as for the Princes in the City, he faid hee knew no more of their minds, but that both they and all the foldiers from the highest to the lowest, had solemnly sworne to defend the city, and not to give it over, vnto the last man, re-F poling their hope not in the wals and fortreffes thereof, but in their weapons and valor, being men of great resolution, and not easily to be vanquished or discouraged. With which answer although Solyman was a little mooued, yet dissembling his present heat, said, he had hithertomade war against diners nations, and alwaies had the victory, whereof he doubted not now also but as for him, and the others taken with him, they knew they were in his power to faue or kill at his pleasure: yet to make them know that he could shew mercy voto his vanqui. G. Solphin relia- fied enemies, he frankly granted them their lines and liberty: charging them, that after they were again returned into the city, they should in his name with the defendants of themselves were against extended in the city, which it was impossible for them long to defend against his mighty po. wer, which neither the strong city of Belgrade, nor the samous city of the Rhodes were able to with fland; and to accept of fuch reasonable conditions as the should grant vato them, pro. miting, that among it other things proceeding of his infinit bounty, he would take order, that they should in fafety depart thence with bag and baggage : in which doing, they should well prouide for the fafety of themselves and of their goods, by flying to his mercy in time, before the fury of the war was grown to further extremitie: all which it would be too late to exped. atter the victory, when nothing was to be hoped for but cruell death, murther, and miferable H destruction. Wherefore it were good for them well to confider of the matter, and not foolishly to refuse that was now frankly offred them of mercy, which they should not afterwards obtaine with any prayers or teares : for why, he was refolutely fet down (as he faid) non to depart thence before he had taken the city. When he had thus schooled them, he gaue to everyone of them three Hungarian duckats, and fo fent them away. They being received into the city with great ioy, made relation vnto the Princes and great Captaines, of all the threatning and proud speeches of the Turkish tyrant: which they took in such disdaine, that they would not vouchfase to returne him any answer. Solyman not a little displeased, that his great words were fo lightly regarded, by way of derifion fent word to the City, That if they wanted helpe, he would fend them the 300 Bohemians, whom he took in the castle of Altenburgstowhoman- I (wer was returned by them of the city, that they needed no help from him, wherforehe might dispose of his prisoners as he thought good. By this, Selyman perceived, that Viennawas not to be woon with words, nor the defendants to be discouraged, with great looks, whereforehe began to vie his force, and with fuch ordnance as he had brought with him, to batter the wals: which because it was not great, but fitter for service in field than, for battery, did not much more harme than to beat downe the battlements and fuch like standings, made of timber and boords in manner of galleries, hanging here and there ouer the wall, for the small shot to play out of, a simple deuise in stead of flankers. His great artillery prouided for battery was comming vp the river of Danubius, which he daily looked for, but by good hap Welfgangue Hoder, a forward Captain, hearing of the Turks comming up the river, went out of Poffonium with K certain smal vessels well appointed; and meeting with the Turks, set upon them with such courage and resolution that he slew many of them, and sunke divers of their boats and pinnaces, amongft whom were they which were bringing up Solymans great pieces for battery to Vienna:which was there all funke in the river, with the boats that brought it. By this good feruice, Solyman was disappointed of his great artillery, and the city deliuered of a great danger. So Wolfgangss having made great spoile amongst the Turks, and lost some few men, returned with victory to Possonium, Yet another part of the Turks fleet comming up to Vienna, at the tirst comming brake downcall the bridges : for a little about the city, the river of Danubius dividing his channell, maketh divers Islands, which by fundry bridges are joyned together, ouer which lieth the way from Austria vnto the city. This fleet so kept the passage, that no L man could without danger either by water or by land go in or out of the city. Solyman having lost all his pieces for battery, and feeing how little he preuailed with his field pieces, fell to undermining of the city, hoping by that means to ouerthrow the wals, and to make a way for his men to enter. This worke, as the Turks chiefe hope, was with wonderfull labout and diligence attempted in fifteene fundry places: which was not fo fecretly done, but that it was by drums laid vpon the ground, by basons filled with water, and sounds made into the earth perceined by the defendants; and fowith countermines met withal, that most part of those works Eightkonfand were vetterly frustrated, and in them 8000 of his Turks either slaine or buried quicke.

Solyman to buffe the defendants, that they should not so perseally discover his mines, dislded his army into foure parts, appointing them orderly to fucceed one after another in giuing M. alarums in the town, that filling their ears with continuall noife, he might keep them alwaiss occupied. In the midft of which hurly burly his mine workes went forward with all speed possible, neither was he in that his expectation deceived for one of the mines broughtto perfection vaperceived by the defendants, and fuddenly blown vp, shooke and overthrew a great

Who on the contrary part like resolute men stood in the face of the breach, with more assurance than the wall it selfe, receining them with deadly floorand push of pike, in such furious manner, that the Turks for all The Tarkeretheir multitude, vnable longer to maintaine the affault, began to retyre. Which thing Solyman pulled from the perceiuing, fant in new supplies, and so renewed the affault before given over, but with no better successe than before i for having received a great overthrow, as men forgetting both duty and martiallidiffipline, they retired, nonexpecting any figne of retreat. At which time, as the Christia an captaines encouraged their foldiers with cheerefull persuasions; so the Turkish commandersenforced forward their Turks both with words and wounds. The affault began to terrible, that it was thought a more fierce and cruell fight was neuer seene from the beginning of the World which was with great resolution maintained by the Turks, for that many of their most valiant horsemen forsaking their horses, thrust in with their targuets and seimiters, or elsewith the launces among it the lanizaries and other footmen, and there fought most despe-D raily. At last, after this furious fight had endured by the space of three hours, and many of The Turkethe the Turks best captains and souldiers lay dead upon the ground by heapes, the Turks seeing the demoreno hope to prevaile, gave over the affault, and retyred to their campe. Long and tedious it were to recount every affault given during the time of that dreadfull fiege, with every particular accident not viworthy the remembrance, which for brevity wittingly I passe ouer. Yet among it the rest, the most valiant leader (though afterward vn fortunar) the Lord William Rogendorffe is not to be forgotten, who oftentimes perceiuing many of the The La, william Turks stragling disorderly abroad in the country, one day upon the sudden fallied out upon Rogender St. them with certain troups of horsemen, with such violence, that at the first onset be ouerthrew

ble, the Christian desendants still repulsing them with greater courage than they were able to & affaile them. Besides that, to the great advantage of the desendants many pieces of their great ordnance skilfully mounted in places most convenient, and continuelly discharged among the thickest of their enemies as they pressed on, made of them such slaughter, and so cut them off, that being thorowly discouraged they shrunk backe, and could nor by any threats or command of their captaines be thrust forward; chusing rather to be slaine of their owne captains (as some of them were) than to be rent in sunder with the murthering free of the Christians; So that the captaines feeing now no other remedy, gaue ouer the affault and retited, leaving behind them many thousands of their dead Turks in the towne ditches;

The next day after this affault, Solyman despairing to win the city, and feating the comming of King Ferdinand and the County Palatine with a ftrong army, as it had been to him tepor H ted, confidering also that Winter was now comming fest on, determined to raise his segment to colour the dishonour thereof, he sent certaine of the chiefe prisoners which he had taken richly apparelled, with their puries full of money, into the city, to tell the captaines; that he came not with purpose either to besiege or take the city, but to reuenge the wrongs done vato him by his enemy King Ferdinand, and to have fought a battell with him for the kingdome of Hungary : whom forasmuch as he could not draw vnro Vienna, he would remove thence to feeke for him, as his capitall enemy; wherefore they should doe well to yeeld themselves; which if they would, he promised not to enter their city, but to receive both the citisens and foldiers into his protection, referning vnto them their lines and goods, with perpetuall freedome. Which his offer the defendants founfully refused, as proceeding of meere desparation, I The next night following, Solyman with more than barbarous cruelty caused all the prisoners in his army to be flaine; which pittifull outcries was of the fouldiers heard into the city, not knowing what the matter should be, vntill that the next day after the departure of the enemy, they found the dead bodies of men, women, and children in all places of the campe wallowed in their owne bloud, a most lamentable spectacle to behold. Solyman put posing to forsake the fiege, caufed Abraham the great Baffa to thew himfelfe in order of battell, as if he would have giuen a fresh assault: in the meane time he himselse rose vpon the sudden with the rest of his army, and returned towards Buda in such hast, that he neither put any garrison into such places as he had taken, neither demanded of them any tribute. After whom the Baffa followed, keeping himselse a daies journy behind him : and so in fine daies he arrised with all his army & at Buda, 32 Germane miles from Vienna.

Solyman rai-

This fiege was given over by Solyman about the fixteenth of October, wherein he is repor-$0000 Twifes teel to have lost eighty thousand men, amongst whom was his great Lieutenant of Asia, with 1 h at the fiege many other of his forward Captains and best soldiers. Of the desendants sew or none of name were lost; but of the country people it is supposed that there was about fixty thousand slaine and carried away into captivity : all the country about Vienna was miserably spoiled, all their trees and vines being by the Turks cut downe to the ground. Solyman according to his pro-Solyman refor mife restored Buda to King John; who by solemne writing acknowledged himselfe his valid, with he king and to hold the kingdome of Hungary of him as his Lord and Sourraigne. Vnto him Solyman cars to K toon, joyned Aloysim Grittm as his Legat, to help him to prouide for such things as should be need- L full for the defence of that kingdome.

It hapned one day whilest Solyman lay at Buda, and had given King Tohn with divers of the nobility of Hungary accesse into his paulion, that he fell earnestly in hand with King tohm, to pardon Paulus Bishop of Strigonium, and Petrus Perenss (who had taken partwith king Ferdinand) and to receive them into his favor again; which men king lehn in no case liked of because that they as traitors vnto their Prince and country, forgetting their faithrand oath, had performed the like duty to Ferdinand, as they had but a little before done vnto him at the time of his coronation : wherein he shewed himselfevnwilling to be intreated, said, That their mutable minds fraught with infidelity, would neuer containe themselves within the bounds of loyalty, but find occasion to commit some fouler treason than they had before. Whereunto M The horsestable Solyman firaining his voice a little, as one fomewhat moved, most honourably replied, Can any fairing of him, thing (faid he) happen unto thee in this life better or more honourable, shan if by thy kindenesse think enemies hall be of all men accounted ingratefull, that is to fay, men noted with eternall infany : when as in they feefe the commendation of a good and courteous Prince shall for ever remaine ! And so not

A long after, fearing the cold of Winter then approching, dangerous for his beafts for carriage, cfoecially his camels, bred and brought up in the hot countries of Asia, he fet forward to Belgrade, and so trauelling through Thracia, returned to Constantinople.

All this while that Solyman thus raged in Hungary and Austria, Charles the Emperor lately reconciled to Clement the seventh of that name, then Bishop of Rome, with a strong army befieged Florence, by his lieutenant Danalm, (who might have done much against the Turkes, if he had been so well imploied) labouring by all means to represse the liberty of the citisens. whereunto they had but a little before aspired, and to bring them againe under the subjection of the family of Medices, whereof Clement was the chiefe. Which thing with much adoe he brought to passe, inuesting Alexander the Bishops nephew in the Dukedome of Florence. B and afterward giving him his base daughter in marriage; forgetting his brother Ferdinand in the meane time, thrust out of the Kingdome of Hungary by Solyman, and the Dukedome of Austria wasted by the Turks, with the city of Vienna in danger to have beene lost. Which common calamities might well have moved both the Emperour and the Bishop, to have had more regard of, than by oppressing the liberty of one free city, to seeke how to serue their own privat respects. The yeare following, which was 1530, Solyman with great folemnity and triumph, after the 1520 Turkish manner, circumcised three of his sonnes, Mustapha, Muhamet, and Selymus, at Con- Solyman err-

Solyman hardly difgetting the dishonour he had before received at Vienna, and oftentimes three formers. C folicited by King John, for aid against Ferdinand, who with greater stomackethan power ceased not continually to molest him: but most of all prickt forward with the infatiable defire of inlarging his Empire, after the manner of the Othoman Kings, accounting his neighbor princes alwaies his enemies, and their dominions the objects of his victories, and fpoile for his fontdiers; raifed fuch an army, as for the greatnesse thereof might worthily have bin a terror vnto the World: not so much purposing the protection of king Tohn, which he in shew most pretended; neither the fiege of Vienna, as was commonly bruted, as the conquering of Austria, Carinthia, Croatia, Styria, and the rest of King Ferdinands dominions, and so afterwards of all Germany. For the accomplishment whereof, he had in his immoderate defire prefined vnto himselfe the space of three yeares, which the great Monarchs of Rome could not performe in D more than formany hundreds. It was commonly reported, That the proud tyrant would many times fay, That what soener belonged vnto the Empire of Rome, was of right his, torafmuch as he was rightfully possessed both of the Imperial seat and scepter of Constantine the Great. commander of the World, which his great grandfather Mahomet had by law of Armes won from Constantine the late Christian Emperour, whom he slew at Constantinople. And therefore both in his common talke and writings, as oft as he had occasion to make any mention of Charles the Emperour, he would proudly, and as it were in disdaine terme him by the name of the King of Spaine, but neuer by the name of Emperour.

The discord of the Christian Princes, and the great troubles even then arising in Germany about matters of Religion, did not a little encourage the barbarous tyrant to take in hand this E great expedition. King Ferdinand certainly advertised, that Solyman was in person himselfe setting forward with his huge army, sent vnto him three Embassadors; whereof Lonardus Nega- King Ferduard rola, a noble Gentleman well learned, and skilfull in divers languages, was chiefe, with rich I ads Emb Va Presents, and reasonable offers to intreat with him for peace. Who meeting him vpon the borders of Seruia, were by him courteoully received, and patiently heard: yet obtained of him no other answer, but that they should follow his campe, and attend his further pleasure. The report whereof brought a generall feare vpon all Germany, but especially them of Austria, in whose fresh remembrance as yet remained the bleeding wounds of their country, their brethren and friends slain, their wives and children led away into captivity, their goods and cattell lost, their houses and fields burnt, and thousands of other gricuous calamities which they had F endured in the late inuation of the Turks. Charles the Emperor had in very good time a little before, for a while well appealed the diffention then arising in Germany about matters of religion; putting them in hope of a free and generall Counsell to be holden for the deciding of all fuch matters; and in a great affembly of the States of the empire to be holden at Ratisbon, shewing the greatnesse of the imminent danger, so puissant an enemy threatning vnto them all the calamities of war, with the manifold mischiefs like to ensue, if they should in so vasit time G fall at variance among it themselves: offering with great resolution, to go in person himselfe with all his old expert foldiers, in desence of the common Christian cause; so much prevailed with the Princes of the Empire, and the Embassadors of the free States, that they highly commended his forwardnesse, and all other matters for that time set apart, agreed all with one content, at a prefixed day to fend vnto Vienna such warlike forces as they had in any timebe-The graphation fore fet forth for the defence of the Christian religion, and the majesty of the Empire, Where of conder the upon he wrote voto Alphonfus Vaftius (his lieutenant Generall in Italy, and one of the greatest captains of that age) that he should without delay call together the old captains, and to leay formany companies of harquebusiers as they possibly could; and with them and the Spanish foldiers to repaire forthwith vnto him into Austria. He also enjoyned Andreas Auria his Ad-H mirall, that he should with like diligence rig vp a strong fleet of gallies and merchants ships, and to go against the Turks Nauy into Grecia. At the same time he sent for his choise horsemen out of Burgondy and the Low-Countries, and many noble Gentlemen and old fouldiers out of Spaine: for the guard of his owne person he entertained twelue thousand Germanes. fuch as had longest served in his wars in Italy, over whom commanded Maximilian Herberflene and Tamifius, both famous captaines. At the fame time Glement the feuenth then Bifbop of Rome, although his coffers were greatly emptied by the late Florentine wars, which had cost him ten hundred thousand ducats; yet to make some shew of his denotion in so dangerous a time, with the great good will he bare unto the Emperour; after he had with gricuous exaction extorted from the clergy a great masse of mony (whereunto his rich Cardinals contributed nothing, as if it had bin a thing veterly volawfull for them, in so good a cause to have abated any jot of their pontificall shew in the court of Rome) sent the young Cardinall Hippolitus Medices his nephew, being then about twenty yeares of age, a man indeed fitter for the wars than for the Church, as his Legat vnto the Emperour; accompanied with moe good captaines than clergy men, and his coffers well stuffed with treasure: whose comming to Ratifbone was vnto the Emperour and the Germanes very welcome; for besides that he was a yong Gentleman of very comely personage, and exceeding bountifull, he entertained for those wars (besides the company he brought with him) eight thousand Hungarian horsemen, of all others best acquainted with the Turkish wars.

King Iohn vnderstanding, that the formost of Solymans great army were come as far as Sa. K hered by King mandria in Seruia, thought it now a fit time to wring from King Ferdinand such townes as he yet held in Hungary; wherefore he fent Aloysius Grittus (whom Solyman had left as a helpet for his estate) to be siege Strigonium, which is a city of Hungary scituat vpon the side of Danubius, about hirty miles from Buda, the castle thereof was at that time holden with a strong garrison of King Ferdinands: wherunto for all that Grittus laied such hard siege both by the river and by land, that the defendants doubting how they should be able to hold out, especially if Solyman should take that in his way, as it was most like he would; fent for relife to Cazsianer, a warlike captaine then Gouernor of Vienna, and General of all King Ferdinands forces: by whose appointment certaine small frigots were sent downe the river of Danubius, from Possonium, well manned; who suddenly setting vpon the Turks fleet (which so kept the river, L that nothing could that way possibly be conucied either in or out of the castle) should by their vnexpected comming open that way. But Gritten having intelligence thereof by certain Hungarians, which though they served King Ferdinand, made no great account to fly sometime to the one part, sometime to the other, as best fitted their purpose; presently resolved to fend his fleet up the riner and by his sudden comming to oppresse his enemies, in like fort as they had thought to have done him. And the more to encourage his foldiers, he promifed great rewards to all such as should performe any extraordinary piece of service in that action and so having thorowly furnished all his fleet with good foldiers, but especially with Tarkish archers, sent them up the river to feeke their enemies: who fearing no fuch matter, as men farprifed with the fame mischiese they had prepared for others, were at the first exceedingly dismaied; yet M considering that they were reasonably well provided for their cumming (although they yet wanted fuch helpe as Cazzianer had appointed to fend them) they thought it a great shame to fly, and therfore putting themselues in order of battell, came downe the riuer, and with great courage encountred their enemy. There began a sharpe and cruell fight, many being slaine

A and wounded on both fidesibut at last they of Possonium not able longer to endure the deadly shot of their enemies, and especially of the Turkish archers, (who with their arrowes fore gauled both the foldiers and the mariners) they turned their backs and fled : in which fight of fixty frigots which came from Possonium, only thirteene escaped, with Corporansu the Generall all the rest being either sunke in the fight, or els taken by the enemy, being run ashore and forsaken by the Possonians, trusting more vnto their legs by land, than their oares by water. Besides this losse of the Frigots, there was slaine of the Possonians almost fine hundred. After this victory, Gritton hoping that they in the castle of Strigonium, dispairing now of reliefe, and fearing the comming of Solyman, would not long hold out, left off to batter or undermine the castle (wherewith he perceived he little prevailed) purposing by lying still, and keeping them of the castle from all reliefe, to inforce them in time to forsake the place. Thus whilest the divided Hungarians with their owne hands inconsideratly sought one anothers destruction, with the ruine of their country; Solyman the great enemy of all Christians was ready at their backs to deuoure both the one and the other, as in few yeares after he did.

Much about this time the old Spanish soldiers in Italy, drawne together by Vasius, as the Emperor had before commanded, were come to the Alpes. In this campe, of one fort of men and other, was aboue 20000, whereof almost the third part was not seruiceable: for the old foldiers enriched with the long wars in Italy, and the spoile of the rich country of Lumbardy, wherein they had of late bin billited, brought with them all their old gotten spoiles and substance, not forgetting so much as their women, and whatsoever else served their pleasure: for carriage whereof they drew after them a great multitude of carriages and vnucceffary people, all which served for no other vie but for the soldiers pleasure, and to consume vicuals. Which their licentious wantonnesse Valtius destring to reforme, gaue streit commandement through all the campe, That they should leave behind them all such vnnecessary baggage, and appointed what carriages should suffiae for every company. Whereat the souldiers began at the first to murmure, and presently after to rise vp in mutiny s for many of the captains being rich, and disliking of that long and dangerous expedition, coverely incited the common fouldiers to cry out vpon Vafine the Generall, for their pay already due. Which thing once put Mustry among into their heads, and the matter fet on foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one the span foot, quickly grew to the span foot, quickly voice faid flatly, That they would go no foot further before they had received their pay. Va-D stim, although he well perceived that tumult to be raifed by some of his enemies, which lought thereby to lighten his credit, was glad for all that for the present to diffemble the master, & yeelding to the necessity of the time, to content the mutinous foldiers with one months pay, promising them their full contentment, at such time as they should come vato the Empefor sand so when he had with much ado appealed that tumule, he set forward into Germany.

Immediatly after the Spaniards followed the Italians, who with such cheerfulnesse offered themselves to that service, that every captain brought with him twice so many in his company as was expected : fo that Vaftim (who before doubtfull of their forwardnesse in so dangetous awar, especially in the aid of the Germans, of whom they had in the late wars received great harmes, had by great and carnest persuasions induced divers of the nobility, and others E of the better fort, to enter into that honourable action, in hope that they would draw after them great numbers of their frierids and renants, as indeed they did) was now glad so fend backe againe many of the common foldiers, by reason of the multitude; and also to his great discredit, and the offence of many, full fore against his will to displace most part of those forward gentlemen, whom he had but a little before made captains; who to their no fmall charge had gallantly furnished themselves according to their degrees and places : for the Emperor had then appointed what number of Italians he should bring; and also gluen commandemens, That rejecting the rest, he should commit the leading of them only to those old expert captains, of whose valour and discretion he had before had good experience. There were Martine Columna, Ferran Adaria Rubene, Philippus Torniellus, Ioannes Baptifia Caftaltus, Fabritius Adard malden, Pyraken Stippianen, and Camillen Columna, being all men'of great worth, and appround faith towards the Braperor.

In the felt talian companies were fourteen thouland felect footmen, belide many other brave men who yoluntarily reforted from divers places to Vienna. After these footmen followed Rerdinand Genzaga, with two thousand horsemen, and certains troups of Greviana and Spanis ards, and with them came many noble gentlemen out of all parts of Italy, who had beforebin G great commanders, but now ferued as privat gentlemen voluntarily without charge or pay; accounting it a great shame to tarry at home as cowards, and not to be present in that religi.

The Emperour also about the same time having taken view of his horsemen come ont of the Low countries most excellently appointed, and shipping his great ordnance, whereof he had bought great flore at Nurembergh, departed downe the river from Ratisbone to Lynn. The river of Danubius neuer carried fo many vessels and souldiers since the time of the great Roman Emperors, as it did at that prefent : and yet besides them which went downe the river by shipping, the pleasant banks on both sides were filled with great companies of horsemen and footmen passing all alongst the river under their colours, with their drums and trumpets H founding, which altogether made the most glorious shew that a man could well behold your

In the meane while, Solyman in fix and fifty daies march come to Belgrade, thrust ouer the Solomen com- great river Savus by bridges made in divers places, an infinit number of his horsmen into Hunmus into the gary; and leaving Danubius on the right hand, turning a little voon the left, marched directly towards the rich country of Stiria, called in antient time Valeria, and now Stiermarke. By the way as he went he came to the little towne of Gunza, which one Nicholas Iurischitz (a manof an inuincible courage) kept with a small garrison of his owne. This town standeth in a Plaine not far from the city of Sabaria, built fquare, and but of a small compasse, not very strongly walled, a poore obscure thing, never famous till now by the great dishonour that the Turkish Emperor Solyman there received. Abraham the chiefe Bassa (who so absolutely commanded among the Turks as if Solyman had received him into the fellowship of his Empirewithhimselse) was very desirous to faue this captain Nichelas, for that he knew him to be a man of great courage, and was familiarly acquainted with him at such time as he lay Embassador at Constantinople wherefore he attempted first by gentle persuasions and large offers, and afterwards Gunza befored by most terrible threats, to induce him to yeeld the town to Solyman. But finding him so resolutely set downe, that he was neither by faire nor foule means, but only by force to be remoued out of the towne : he inclosed the same round about with the huge army of the Turks, and by mines overthrew the wals in three places. Which fudden breach whilest the garrison fouldiers most valiantly defended against the surious assault of the Ianizaries on the South K fide of the towne, the Bassa planting his field pieces upon the hils on the North side, did from thence grieuously annoy the defendants: who stercely assailed by their enemies before, and beaten with the great ordnance behind, were grieuously distressed. Wherwith the worthy gouernor somwhat troubled, though not much discouraged; suddenly of timber and boords raifed up a curtain twelue foot high, at the backs of his foldiers, wherewith they were fo couered from the fight of their enemies, that they could not make any certain flor at them; but only at that curtain at all adventures, not doing any thing fo great harme as before and with desperat and reftlesse labout, in despight of all the Turks great power repaired the breaches, in as ftrong manner as at the first. In the meane time 200 of the Turks horstnen straging from the campe, and feeking after booty in the country as farre as Neoftat, were by the Hungarian L horsemen intercepted, and all staine or taken; whose heads the Hungarians brought to Vienna, and the more to encourage the fouldiers which dayly repaired thither, in token of good lucke fet them up upon stakes upon the wals of the city. Then was it certainly knowne of the The have army prisoners, that Solyman had in his dampe five hundred thousand men, and three hundred field pieces, which were not of greater bignesse but that a camell might well carry one of them, being taken from the catriage: for why, Selyman purpoling by deftroying the country before him, to draw the Emperous ento battell; had (as they faid) brought no greater pieces of battery with him. Which report of the prisoners was also confirmed by the Embassadouts of Ring Ferdinand, whom Solyman gatte leaue to depart at Gunza, gilling to ettery one of thema gowne Solymen proud of veluet and a piece of plate, with letters vnto the Emperorund King For Mand In brother; M teters who the wherein proudly viurping the title of many kingdomes, he most infestently brone himselfe and ting Finds Lord and Sourraigne of almost all countries and nations, Bue the safe theireof was, That he was come into Hungary, to reuenge the wrongs which they had done unto King 10th his friend and vaffall; and would with fire and fword enter their countries; and by the power of God and his great Prophet Mahomet, the fauourers of just quarrels, give them battell, if they durst meet him: wherfore if they would as valiant and couragious princes meet him in the field. he would in one battell end that quarrell with them, and in reward of the victory either win or lose the Empire of the World. When Solyman had thus a great while lien at the siege of Gunza.and thereto given divers sharpe assaults, being still with great losse and dishonor repulsed. he in the space of soure daies cast vp neere vnto the towne ditch two great mounts of saggots and earth, as if they had bin two great mountains, of fuch height, that they overtopped not the wals only, but even the highest towers in the towne (by which wonderfull worke the greatnesse of the Turks army might easily be conjectured:) on of these great mounts he cast up direally against the face of the towner and the other at a corner of the fame, to flankier along the wall; from whence he did with his shot not only beat them which appeared upon the wals for the defence thereof, but them also which vpon occasion went too and fro in the streets. These mounts being with incredible celerity brought to perfection, the town ditch filled vp, & many of the defendants either flain or wounded vpon the wals, the Turks gaue a most furious affault at the place which was before shaken with the mine : against whom the valiant captains as need was in that extreme danger, opposed all the strength he had left. But the Turks still pressing on with their infinit multitude, were got up to the top of the wals with eight enfignes, from whence they had repulsed the desendants : which being all either wounded or wearied, shrouded themselves under the defence of their penthouses, being neither able nor of courage to make further refissance, so that the wals were now abandoned and the towne there c left without defendants: when fuddenly fuch a great clamor, was made by the loud outcries and samentation of the women and children and other fearefull people, that the Turks which had recoursed the top of the wals, strucken with a sudden seare, thinking the towne to have bin full of foldiers, flood as men aftonied and difmaid, wherupon the defendants began againe to take courage, and to shew themselves: at whose sight the Turks possessed of a needlesse feare, for fooke the wal, and could not by any perfuafions or threats of their captains be brought onagaine to the affault. The towne was that day in all mens judgement defended by the mighty power of God, and not by the strength of man. It grieued the proud tyrant about meathat sobase a towne should so long hold out against all his power, so that oftentimes in his rage he would threaten to rase it downe to the ground, and not to leave any signe thereof remaining: which he would undoubtedly haue in time performed, had not Abraham the great Abraham Balla Baffa (by whose counsell he was altogether directed) otherwise persuaded him : who waiting persuaded 5 a fit time, when his choler was path, told him, that it was not worth his name and greatnesse, to small enter front his sime and forces word for finell a common for the first of fpend his time and forces vpon to fmall a towne of no importance, by rating wherof he should Ganza. neither get honor nor profit: for why, no man would maruell, if he with so puissant an army should take so small a thing, especially by long siege, wherby the strongest places are inforced to yeeld and when he had for aken it, it would be accounted a greater honor for fo little a town to have holden out so long, than for him to have with so great forces in long time constrained it : but if it should otherwise fall out, as the chances of war are uncertaine, that he should by any occasion be constrained to leave it, he should thereby get no small dishonor: wherefore it E were more wisedome to spare his soldiers labor in so small a matter, wherof he was not to exped cisherhonour or profit, and for to referue him for his greater defignes, and not vainely to spend his forces and time in belieging of so base a village, from whence he might now depart with leffe dishonor than he could afterwards, when he had proued the vitermost of his forces, and yet in the end glad peraduenture to for fake it : where fore it were more for his honour to saife his fiege, and calling the Gouernor of the town unto him, to give him the town as it were of bounty, than to spend so many good men as he must needs cast away in the winning of it by force; with thate and like reasons the Bassa prevailed so much with Solyman, that Wicholas the worthy Gournor of the rown was by a herauld at arms fent for to come to the great Baffa, Sodifdaming (as it should feem) to speak with him himself. The Gouernor being sent for, F though he was grieuously wounded, & in small hope of life, yet stoutly refused to come to any parly, except he were first well assured both by safe conduct & good hostages for the safety of his person, and that nothing should be exacted of him, not befitting his religion & honor: which flour answer caused Solyman & the Bassa to think, that his strength was not yet so weakned, but that he was still able to hold out the fiege : and thereupon, that he required for his fafety was forthwith granted, and two men of great acount sent for hostages for him into the city with G The Gouernous Solymans safe conduct. Which being received, the Gouernor went forth, and was by Abraham The Generalist Solymans rate conduct, we like the commended to fit downe by him in his tent: where he was of him first by the way of courtesie demanded, whether he had recougred his old infirmity wherewith he was troubled at fuch time as he was fent Embassador vnto Solyman at Constantinople: After that, whether the wounds he had received in the last assault. were dangerous or not? But last of all, and that which most concerned the matter, vpon what hope he alone had so long and so obstinatly withstood the mighty Sultan Solyman, when as all his neighbours round about him had so willingly submitted themselves ? saying further, that he manuelled much why he reposed any confidence in the lingring King Ferdinand. Where. unto the Gouernor modestly answered, That he was (thanks be to God) well deliuered of his H old disease, and that his wounds were without danger : but as concerning his holding out, he faid, that he for his great wifedome knew, that it was the duty of a good fouldier valiantly to withstand his enemies, and not to be troubled for any euill hap, or discouraged with any chance of war : as for himselfe, he said, when mans helpe failed, he had reposed his full trust in God, by whose power he had beene hitherto preserued, which as he well hoped should neuer faile him at his need : and that King Ferdinand was not fo far off, but that he would before it were long be there present with a great army: wherefore he did not greatly maruell, that he was not relieued before that time, forasmuch as many lets and occasion might chance which might hinder the Kings purpose, considering that fortune alwaies by nature vnconstant, was in nothing more like vnto her selfe in her inconstancy, than in martiall affaires. The Bassa wondering at the inuincible courage of the Gouernor, faid, That although the great Emperor Solyman might now at his pleasure vtterly destroy the towne, with all that therein was, yetheing by nature of a most honourable and milde disposition, and a great louer of valiant and couragious men, had commanded him in his name to give him that towie, and the lives of all them that were in it, as a reward of his valour shewed in the desence thereof : yet so, that he should sweare obedience vnto him, and receive some few Turks into the towne, in token that he had yeelded the same. The politicke Gouernour knowing that of 800 valiant souldiers, he had fearcely a third part left, and them also fore weakned with wounds and want of rest, thought it necessary to make his peace in best fort he could : for what could have hapned vnto him more wishedly, than with his great honour to keepe the towne still, and with the losse of a few plea. K fing words to diliuer himselfe, with somany of his friends, from extream feare and perill? and foin all his talke shewing no signe of feare, and with great words setting forth the strength of bis garrison (which was indeed brought to an extream weaknesse) said he was ready at the first to have yeelded up the towne, for the old acquaintance he had with him at Constantinople, but was alwaics letted by the Germans and Spaniards, which were there in garrifon, fierce and cruell foldiers, whose hardhearts were (as he said) hardly tntreated to suffer him at that time to come out of the city into the campe : wherefore he could promife to be a friend to all fuch Turks as should passe that way, and to relieve him with such things as his wasted country could affoord, and further in token of his fubmiffion, to fet vp one of Solymans enfignes in the chiefe tower of the city:but as for receiving any Turks into garifon, in token that he had yeel- L ded up the towne, he was willing fo to do, but that he was greatly affraid they flied be evil intreated by the Germans and Spaniards, who deadly hated the Turks: whereof it was to be thought, that new wars would eft soone arise. In conclusion he so cunningly vied the matter, that the great Bassa was contented with this small token of submission, that he should recipie in at one of gates of the city, one of Solymans captains with ten languages: which being done accordingly, and they courteously for a while entertained and again dismissed, the great past held himselse with that simple submissionwell contented when as the Goudstor had neither German nor Spaniard as then in garrison. So when Solyman had with his great wants hearth Selyment de lege of Gunza by the space of 28 daies, and in that time to his great losse a Market the fante thirteene times, he rose with his army, glad of a little saided submission for the safegad of the honor: and leaving Vienna on the right hand, whither most part of the Christian army we affembled, tooke the way on the left hand into Carinthia, and fo came to the river Mura and from thence to the city Gratia. This turning of Solymans out of the way from Vienna, whele he knew his enemies lay, put all feare out of the minds of the Christians, which they had A before not without cause conceived, infomuch that he but a little before feared as a Prince of great pride and power, shamefully repulsed at the little town of Gunza, and now shunning his enemies at Vienna, began to grow into contempt as if he had beene running away for feare. Which diffrace the Turks fought by divers excuses to cover, as that the strong city of Ncoflat lay betwixt him and Vienna, which could neither without much difficulty be taken, nor danger lest enemy behind him : besides that, Winter began to approch, which caused him (as the Turks gaue it out) to content himselfe with the spoile of the rich countries betwist the riuers of Savus and Dranus, and so in good time to returne againe to Belgrade. But they which feemed to fee further into the matter, were of opinion, That Solyman understanding by his efpials, and secret aduertisement from his friends. That the Princes of Germany had with one consent joined their forces with the emperors, brought out of Italy, Spain, and the Low countries, which at his fetting forth he least feared; and that the Christian army in number great, consisted not of raw souldiers, but for the most part such as had been trained up in wars, men both for courage and skill nothing inferiour to his Ianizaries and best men of war, chose rather to take the spoile of the country, as he might with safety, than to aduenture his person and state to the hazard of a most doubtfull and dangerous battell.

Whilest these things were in doing, Michael-Ogli by the commandement of Solyman, sent Cofon sent with Cason with 15000 of his voluntary horsemen (who in Solymans expedition against Vienna, had 15000 horsemen run through the country of Austria as farre as Lyntz) charging him without stay to spoile all the country far and neere which lyeth betweene Danubius and the Alpes, thereby to learne what he could of the state and strength of the Emperors campe; and by doing all the harmes he could possibly, to leave a most lamentable remembrance of the Turk's being in Austria. C4for was of himselfe forward enough, and desirous of the spoile; but so much the more, for that he was by the former road into that country become both famous and rich: wherefore diuiding his horsemen into three companies not far distant one from another, he suddenly oppresfed an infinit multitude of all forts of people in the fields and country villages as he went; all which he either flew without mercy, or carried away as miserable prisoners. Thousands of men and women tied together in chaines and ropes, were by the cruell Turks enforced to run as fast as their horses; the country villages were all burnt downe to the ground, and in them the poore children of the Christians, whose parents were either slaine or carried away captines: fo that all the country enery way almost for the space of a 150 miles, was concred with smoke and fire, within three miles of Lyntz, where King Ferdinand then lying, was glad to get himselse further off to Strabinga, where his brother Charles the Emperour lay. This cruell Turke according to his charge, having with fire and fword without compassion wrought all the woe he could possible upon the poore Christians, and now loded with the spoile of the country and multitude of prisoners, began to returne the same way he came, thinking to finde Solyman either at the fiege of Gunza, where he left him, or necter hand at Neoftat comming towards Vienna. But he as is aforefaid, rifing with small honour from Gunza, and searing the power of the Christians, was quite gone another way as far as Gratia, the Metropolitical city of Stiria, standing upon the river of Mura; which turned to the utter destruction of Casen and E all his followers: for as soone as it was perceived by the burning of the countrey all about, that the Turks were come neere to Lyntz, the Christian captaines with their companies went out of the campe, some one way some another, as was thought most convenient for the meeting with of these mischieuous Turks, which neuer rested in one place: wherin they vsed such diligence in taking the passages, that it was not possible they should escape vnfought withall. Foure companies of Spanish and Italian horsemen under the leading of Levis Coue a valiant captaine, first lighting vpon them in a valley neere vnto Neostat, and desperatly charging them, were by the Turks for most part slaine : But Cason perceiving how he was one every side laied by the Christians in the vallies betwixt Neostat, Sabaria, and Vesprinium, the night following with more than barbarous cruelty flew foure thousand of the Christians he had be- 4000 christian fore taken prisoners, because he should not be hindered by them in his slight; and dividing captives murhisarmy into a solution of the circle deed by cases. his army into two parts, about midnight began to fet forward, vfing the benefit of the night to haucescaped from his enemies out of these vallies wherein he was inclosed. One part of this army led by Ferifes taking the way Southward, did with incredible labour cut a way tho-10w the thicke and ouergrown woods (a thing thought altogether impossible), and so with little or no losse came to Solyman into Styria. Casen with the other part of the army breaking G out of the valley of Storamberg chanced vpon the Palatine (Generall of the forces fent from the German Princes) who with ten thousand footmen and two thousand horsemen, and cer. cofor discomfo taine field pieces brake the battell of the Turks, and slew of them a great number; in which tine, and fleine. conflict Cafen his chiefe enfigne was taken. He fighting most valiantly in the rereward, togine others time to escape, was himselse there slaine; whose gallant head piece presented after. wards to the Emperour, confirmed the report of his death. They which escaped from the Palatine, in their flight fell into the hands of Lewis, and the Marquesse of Brandenburg, by whom they were slaine like beasts. The Hungarian horsemen led by Valentinus Turacus, lighting vp. on them which fled from Lewis and the Marquesse, had the killing of them for the space of seuen miles; and of all others did upon them the cruellest execution, following them hard H at the heels with their fresh horses, and fiercely insulting upon them in their owne language. Those few dispersed Turks which escaped the fury of the Hungarians, fell into the hands of the country people about Vesprinium and the lake of Balaron, which came out on every fide in hope of spoile, who shewed them small fauour: so that of 8000 which were with Cason, it was thought not one returned to Solyman.

iThe Emperour understanding that Solyman was gone as farre as Gracia in Stiria, called his chiese captains together into the castle of Lyntz, to know their opinions, whether it were best to follow the enemy into Stiria or not. The cities of Lyntz, Gracia, and Vienna, are scituat almost informe of a triangle : but from Lyntz to Gratia is three good daies journey of bad rough way by horse. Some said it was best to fight with the Turks in that vneuen mountaine I country, where the Turks chiefe frength confifting in the multitude of his horsemen, should stand him in small stead, but should be inforced to try his battell with his sootmen, wherein he was inferiour to the Christians. This counsell although it had in it many difficulties, yet for that it proceeded from the most approved captains, so moved the Emperour, that he presently sent Apontius a Spaniard (the most famous captaine Antonius Leua his lieutenant) to take view of that paffage: who shortly after returned againe to Lyntz, bringing word that all the country as he went was defolate and for feare for faken of the inhabitants: but concerning the place of the enemies abode, he could learne no certainty. Whereupon it was by general consent concluded, that they should all goe to Vienna, whither all the strength of the Germans was already affembled, there to take a generall view of the army, and to give the enemy & battell if he should againe returne. Some there were of great courage which openly disliked of that going to Vienna; faying, that the Emperour should rather in that distresse of the prouinces of Stiria and Carinthia pursue his enemy, than turne out of the way to Vienna. But others of greater judgement, whose opinion prevailed, said, it was one thing to invade and another thing to defend : fo that the Emperour might with honor enough encampe himselse in the fields of Vienna, and from thence to expect and deride the base expedition and vaine brags of his proudenemie, who a far off challenged him into the field, and then like a coward durst not come neere him.

The Emperor comming to Vienna, and taking a generall view of the army, found therein perest fuspore two hundred and fixty thousand men, whereof 90000 footmen, and 30000 horsemen were L accounted old expert foldiers, and of them many whole companies and bands, of such as had before bin Generals, Captains, Lieutenants, Antients, or other officers and men of marke in other armies, and now were content to serue as privat men. It was thought that so many worthy captains and valiant fouldiers, were neuer before in the memory of man affembled together into one camp : for the Princes and free cities had not fent thither common foldiers, but their chosen and approued men; striuing as it were amongst themselves, who should send the best. All the flowre and strength of Germany from the river of Vistula to the Rhene, and from the Ocean to the Alpes, was by the Princes of the Empire and free cities either sent thither, or of themselues voluntarily came thither. A thing neuer before heard of, that all Germany should as it were with one consent, be glad to take up arms for their common safety, in defence M of their honor and liberty; especially against people brought out of the furthest parts of Asia, Syria, and Ægypt. Beside the great number of Spaniards, Italians, and Burgundians; the Bohemian campe lay not farre off, ftrengthened with them of Silicia and Morauia. There were also some troupes of Polonian horsemen, not sent thither by publike authority, but seruing

A asvoluntary men: King Sheifmund winking thereat, who as he was carefull not rathly to breake the league he had made with Solyman; fo lest he should seeme carelesse of the Christian common cause, by notable diffimulation less place for such of his subjects as would (as if it had been without his knowledge) to thew their valour in the most honourable war.

The Christian army ready to receive the enemy, lay in a great field neere vnto Vienna, in Theorier of the this order: three great (quadrons of pikemen, standing one (quadron a great way distant from another, were so placed against the enemy with like and equal front, that all the horsemen diuided into two parts, might well be received into the great spaces betwirt the three fourdions: for it was not thought convenient to oppose so small a number of horsemen in open field without the footmen, against almost 300000 of the Turks horsemen. The right wing of the horsemen was led by the Emperour himselfe, and the left by King Ferdinand, Before and behind, and on every fide of the three squadrons of pikes, saving in those places which were left open for the horsemen, about thirty paces off, were placed twenty thousand nimble harquebusiers ranged in length, and but five in a ranke; so that whilest the first discharged, the second, and after them the third, and fo the rest readily and orderly comming on, might without letdeliuer their bullets voon their enemies: neither was it thought any difaduantage to place them for thin, for that if they found themselves by the enemies oppressed, they might easily retire amongst the pikes, standing fast at hand. Before the harquebusiers was planted the great ordnance, whereof the Emperour had fuch store, and so well placed, that he could therewith (as with a most fure trench) have compassed in his whole army. Only the Hungarians, men C well acquainted with the manner of the Turkish fight, chose to lie in the open field in two great wings, under the leading of their two valiant captaines Valentinus and Paulus. Many noblegentlemen beholding this goodly army, wept for joy, conceiving a most assured hope of victory, if the proud enemy dutit with all his forces joyne in battell. But Solyman, who by all solyman rece means fought with his great number of horsemen to keepe the wide and open fields, certainly with advertised both of the Emperors strength and the manner of his lying, got him over the river of Mura, and at Marpurge by bridges which he made on the fudden, passed ouer the great river

Drahus. And so he which that Summer held almost all the World in suspence, with the doubtfull expectation of the fuccesse of that war; having with all that his huge power wherewith he threatned the World, done nothing at all worth the remembrance, but was in every D place either ouercome, or els shamefully repulsed; lest Stiria, and returned the same way he came, directly betwixe the rivers of Savus and Dranus, to Belgrade and so to Constantinople, leaving here and there some remembrance of his barbarous cruelty, and still looking behind him if the Emperour were not at his heeles : at fuch time as a few Dalmatian and Croatian horsemendid still pursue the taile of his army. It is reported, that he carried away with him 30000 Christians into Captiuity, besides many thousands of poore country people slaine by the mercileffe Turks; but especially by Cason and his followers: and so to his eternall infamy was twice in the space of a few yeares driven out of Germany. The Emperor understanding of Solymans departure, determined with all speed to returne into Italy; although King Ferdinand his brother most earnestly intreated him before his departure, in so fit a time to imploy those

E great forces against King Iohn, who now as it were for faken of Solyman, might easily with fo puissant an army haue bin thrust not only out of Buda, but also quite out of the Kingdome of Hungary, wherein he was by Solyman as his vaffall placed. But the Emperour, for that Winter begain now to approch, and the plague was got into the camp, yea, even into his court, continued in his former purpose of departing into Italy : yet yeelding so far unto his brothers request, as to leave behind him all the Italians, who joyned with King Ferdinands owne forces, were thought sufficient for the accomplishment of the Hungarian war.

Ouerthese Italians, one Fabritius Maramaldus was by the meanes of Alphonsus Victims appointed Generall: but no order taken for the paiment of their wages, whereby the fouldiers might be the more incouraged to take in hand that war, and also kept in obedience. Which thing at the first much offended the minds of the other captains, thinking themselves difgraced by the preferment of Maramaldus, a man of no greater account than themselves : but as The Itelians foon as it was known abroad, the vnder captains & officers of the bands, led with the credit and to form and form of all the credit and to form and form of all the credit and to form and form of all the credit and to form and form of King Fe distance of all the credit and to form of the credit and the credit fauor of their old captains; said plainly, That they would not go into Hungary, except either of K. of Fe al-King Ferdinandwould in person goe himselse, or essence of the great Commanders, Vastim mairs.

to his own dwelling, leaving King Ferdinand unto his own forces. The Emperor alfobreaking G op his army at Vienna, and purposing now as before to return into Italy, appointed Ferdinand Gen Laga to go formost with the light horsmen, with whom also he went himselfe. Afterhim Canalisticon- followed Vassius with the Spaniards: two daies after came the Cardinall, whose traine was of all the greatest: last of all followed the mercinary Germanes: in which order he returned in

This was the end of those wonderful preparations made by the two great Monarchs soly. man and Charles the fifth, in the yeare 1532 : which held the world in great suspence with the tearfull expectation of some maruellous alteration; and so much the more, for that at the fame time appeared a great blazing star by the space of 15 daies. All which for all that, God to appointing, forted to far lesse harm than was of most men feared.

Now while Charles the Emperor was thus in arms against Solyman in Austria, Andreas Au. ria by his appointment, with a fleet of 35 tall ships, and 48 gallies, wherein he had imbarked 25000 fouldiers well appointed, did in the meane time wonderfully annoy the Turkes in Peloponesus. With this fleet Auria departing from Messana in Sicilia, and passing alongst the coast of Italy into the Ionian, neer to the Isle of Zacynthus met with Vincentius Capellius the Venetian Admiral, with a fleet of fixty gallies fet forth by the Venetians in defence of their territory: who offered vnto Auria all possible kindnes, but excused himself that he could not join with him in that war against the common enemy, by reason of an old league betwire the Turks and the Venetians, which Solyman had but a little before renued. So that at that time the Venetians flood as men indifferent betwixt Charles the emperor and Solyman, offering like 1 kindnes to both, but taking part with neither, yet in readines to fall out with either, if they should by sea or land offer any injury to their State : wherin they bare themselves so indifferent, that it was thought that they at one and the selfe same instant aductised Auria, that Hymerales the Turks Admiral lay with his fleet of 60 gallies euill appointed in the Bay of Ambracia, where he might easily be surprised, and gaue likewise warning to him of the comming of Auria with a strong sleet, wishing him in time to prouide for his better safety, by retyring his flect into some other place of more assurance; which he presently did: for knowing himfelf too weak, he departed from Ambracia to the strong hauen of Calcide. Which thing with other like wel considered, might giue iust cause to any Christian heart to bewail the state of that time, wherin the Christian Princes being either in mortal wars amongst themselves, or K intangled by Solyman with leagus of no affurance, omitted the fairest opportunitie that could have bin withed for the abating of the Turks greatnes: for if the Venetians joining their forces with Auria, had in time pursued the Turkish Admiral, it was like that not only all Solymans power at sea had bin etterly discomfitted, but also most part of Grecia, mindful of their antient empire and liberty, and then ready to have rebelled, and joined hands with the Christian Rians, might have bin recovered out of the Turkish thraldom; yea and the Imperial city of Constantinople greatly indangered, sew or none being lest for the desence thereof, beside yong Ianizaries and effeminat Eunuchs, the heartleffe keepers of the Turks concubines; Solyman himself being then far off in Hungary, and having drawne with him the greatest strength

Muria taking his leaue of the Venetian Admirall, with much honour done at feaon, both fides 3 was shortly after aduertised that the Turks Admiral was fled to Calcide. Wherfore now out of hope to do any good against him, hee directed his course to Corone, which is a Corne beliefed firong city vpon the coast of Peloponesus, about twelve miles distant from Modon, with purpose to besiege it: which when he had welviewed, and considered of the strength theros, hee laid fiege thereto both by sea and land, battering it most terribly at one time with 14 great pieces of artillery by land, and 150 by sea, so that a more terrible battery had not been lightly heard of. For all that, the Turks valiantly stood vpon their defence, and manfully repulsed the Italians, which under the leading of the County of Same affaulted the city by land. The Turks garrisons lying about in the country of Peloponesus, did what they might to have re- M lieued the city; who by the valor of the County were discomfited, and Zadares their chief leader flain: whose head with others of the slain Turks were set vpon stakes, to the terror of the

At length the Turks wearied with assaults, and terrified with the thundring shot which nener ceased, and driven also from their greatest strength towards sea, by the desperat assault of certain resolute Christians, whom they had now full fore against their wils received as it were into their bosomes & fearing alfo to want victuall and pouder, if they should longer hold out Corone yested without any hope of reliefe, reelded the City and Castle to Auria, vpon condition that they Tarks. might in safety depart thence with bag and baggage. Corone thus taken, and a strong garrifon of Spaniards there placed, and the Christian Greeks which dwelt in the city sworn vnto them. daria put to fea with his fleet, and fayling againe by Zacinthus, came to Patras another antient city of Peloponefus, which he eafily took and ranfacked: for the Turks diffrusting the Parastaten fixength of the City, had firongly intrenched themselves neere vnto the Castle, which place and ransal to a alfo, together with the Castle, they in short time yeelded to Auria; couchanting, that they, and especially their wives, might with their garments onely depart in safety into Atolia: which was by Auria to precifely performed that when three thouland of them passed along through the army of the Christians, ranged on both sides, and some of the souldiers began rudely to handle former of the women; and to take from them force of their jewels, he caused them prefently, to the terror of others, to be hanged. Anvia leaving his army at Patras, with commandment to dollow him by land, failed along the coaft of Peloponefus, vntill he came to the freit of Naura ctum, now called Lepanto, which is the entrance into the gulfe of Corinthia, parting Reloponefus from Ætolia, with a fireit formwhat narrower then the fireit of Hellefpont. Vpon this freit flood two Castles, the one called Rhium, you the coast of Peloponesus, and C theother Molicreum in Atolia, which Bajazet had wonderfully fortified, and flored with ordnance for the keeping of that streit. Auria threatning all extremity to the Captaine of the Castle on Peloponesus side, if he did inforce him to plant his battery, so terrified him, that he without delay yeelded unto him the castle; couenanting only, That he and his soldiers might in fafety depart thence; which granted, and the Turks departed, Auria gaue the spoyle of the Castle vnto his foldiers which came with him by sea: wherby he so offended the minds of the other fouldiers which came by land from Patras, that they were about to haue forfaken him. The other Castle vpon Ætolia side was not so easily taken, being valiantly desended by a ga 4 rison of old Ianizaries, appointed for the keeping thereof. Yet in the end by fury of the Ordnance a breach was made, whereby the Christians forcibly entring, flew three hundred of the D old garrifon fouldiers, not taking any one to mercy: the rest fled into a strong tower into the midft of the Castle, where seeing no remedy but that they must needs fall into the hands of their enemies, they desperatly blew up themselves, and the tower, with agreat part of the Cafile, with gunpouder, in such fort, that it feemed all the sea coast to have been shaken with an earthquake; and the gallies which lay a bow shoot off, were almost ouerwhelmed with stones blown out fo far off. The great Ordnance taken in this Castle was valued at 70000 duckars; whereof certaine pieces of a wonderfull greatnesse, with Arabian letters written upon them, were afterwards by Auria brought to Genoa, & in remembrance of the victory, mounted vpon the bulwark at the mouth of the hauen. All these things thus happily atchieued, Auria strongly fortified the city of Corone, floring it both with munition and plenty of victuall, commit-E ting the defence thereof to Mendoza a valiant Spaniard, with a strong garrifon of Spaniards; promising of his owne charge to relieue him when soeuer he should need, if the Emperour should defer to do it. The streit of Naupactum laid open, Saluiatus with the gallies of Malta scoured all along it the gulfe of Corinth, doing great harm to the Turks which dwelt on both sides of the gulfe, spoiling and terrifying them even as far as Corinth. Not long after, Winter now approaching, Juria receiving letters from the Emperour, of Solymans departure out of Hungary, returned with his fleet loaded with the spoyle of the Turks, to Naples, and so from thence home to Genoa. In the beginning of the Spring following (which was the yere 1533) it was rifely reported that the Turks were comming with a great fleet toward Peloponesus and not long after, Men-F deza Gouernour of Corone, by letters aduertised Peter of Toledo, Vizroy of Naples, That he was both by sea and land hardly besieged by the Turks; and that he would to the vetermost of his power valiantly defend the city, so long as he had any prouision of victuall: Wherefore he most earnestly requested. That if the Emperour would have the towne kept, he should intime fend him reliefe, whereupon the oppressed Gracians taking heart, were like enough to rebel, and to help to expulse the Turks quite out of Peloponesus. But about all things he forgot not to craue speedy aid of Auria, and to put him in mind of the faithfull promise he had made, to relieue him at his need. Vpon this news, Charles the Emperor commanded an ria his Admiral to rig up a convenient fleet for that fervice, premifing forthwith to feed mo him twelue Gallies which he had new built in Spain. He alforequested the Knights of Mah ta to aid him with their Gallies against that Common enemy. Wherfore Auria having with wonderfull celeritie rigged up thirty tall ships, and as many gallies, came to Naples to take in his fouldiers. There the old Garrisons of the Spaniards, which for want of paymere nich in mutiny against the great commander and General Vastim & the Viceroy and had an facts the city of Aversa, and don no little harm all about in the country of Campania, were against pacified by a pay given vnto them, and prefently imbarked for Corone, vnder the command p of Rodericus Macicam their Generall : at which time also Frederick of Toledo the Victorio fon with a company of braue Gentlemen went abord, vowing their service to the sacred was The Knights of Maltacame thither also with their gallies. Whilk these things were doing Auria to incourage them of Corone, for fear left they dispairing of help, should fall to some hard Composition with the Turks, sent Christopher Palavicine (a resolute young Gentleman of an inuincible courage) with a most swift Gally to Corone: who by day light passing those row the middest of the Turkes fleet, safely recourred the hauen, to the great joy of the besse. ged Christians: and shorely after, when he had well viewed all things, with the strength and manner of the Enemies lying, and filled the minds of the Defendants with affured hope of speedy rescue, about noon time of the day he suddenly brake out again through the middest of his enemies, and as it were miraculously escaped in safety, for all that they could doe, although they ceased not to give him chase so long as they were in any hope to haud overtaken him. Auria departing from Naples, came to Messana, where beeing certainly informed of the Enemies force both by sea and land, with the number of their Gallies, and seeing that the chief hope of relieuing of the City confided in celerity, stayed not for the Gallies which he expected out of Spain, but held on his course towards Grecia. For it was told him, that the Enemies fleet dayly encreased, by the comming in of the Turkish Pyrats; and that Beg (otherwise called the Moor of Alexandria) an arch Pyrat was still looked for, in whose good directions the Turkish Captains reposed the greatest hope of their victory. Whenhe was come as far as Zacynthus, he was informed by the Venetians, that Luftibeins Bassa (orta. & ther Lutzis Bassa) the Turks great Admiral, and Solymans brother in law, with Solyman of Acarnania, and the Moore (men for their skil at sea of great fame and reputation) lay before Corone, with eighty gallies manned with divers companies of the old Ianizaries: fo that it was thought a matter of exceeding peril for him to aduenture to relieue the town, except he took the advantage of some prosperous gale of wind. Wherfore Auria to have yet more certaine knowledge of the enemies fleet, sent before him Christopher Palavicine with one Gally, againe to view the manner of the enemies lying: Who passing the promontorie of Acrytes, saw al the Turks great fleet lying in very good order besore the City; and so returned to Auria, confirming that which the Venetians had before reported; and that the Turks fleet was greatly encreafed, and lay ready as it should feem to give him battel so soon as he should approch the City. For all that, Auria nothing dismaid with the greatnes of the Turks sleet, made no stay, but stil kept on his courf, & with a fair gale of wind passing the promontory Acrites, came directly towards Corone. Two great Gallions, of all the fleet the most warlike ships, came formost, wherof the one was Auria's own, which he had built with a wonderfull charge; and the other was of Sicilia. These two great ships were appointed by Auria to turn a little vpon the left hand; and at such time as the Enemie should set forward from the shore, to cast anchor betwixt both the fleets; that as occasion should ferue, they might as out of two strong Cafiles beat the Turks gallies with their great Ordnance, wherewith they were for that purpole wonderfully flored. Next vnto these great Gallions followed the other warlike ships with ful fails: afterwhom came the gallies in three fquadrons, wherof Salviatus had the leading of M. the right wing, which confifted of the Bishop of Romes gallies, & them of Malta. In the left wing and neer to the enemy commanded Antenius Auria: and in the midst was Auria himself. At the first fight of the Christian fleet the Turks moved not from the shore, but discharged their ordnance at them afar off, and then began to fet forward and todraw neerer; especially

A the Moor, who with greater courage than the rest assailed the side and rereward of the fleet: for the Christians' keeping their course right forth to Corone, & turning nothing to the lest The christians hand, as was before appointed, feemed as if they fled ; and fo much the more, for that the gal-fiet hyperarch. lies in the right wing, for fear of the Turks great ordnance, did fet a great compasse farther off into the sea, and many of the middle squadron and of the left wing also, had disorderly thrust themselves in among the ships, although they had received little or no harme of the enemies great shot. In this confusion of the Christian Navy, the Moor requested Lut Zis the Admiral not to let flip fo fair an occasion, wherein the Christian fleet might easily have bin overthrowne. But while Lutzis doth flowly and confideratly fet forward, Juria in the mean time had put his B fleet again in order, and with a fair wind was come to Corone. Two of the flips by the way falling one foul on another, staid behind, being notable to keep way with the rest about which at corone. all the Turks gallies presently flockt, and took the lesser of them, killing all the Spaniards they found therin. Out of this they boorded the greater, and with a bloudy fight had woon the forecastle and wast of the ship: when Auria, accounting it no smal dishonour to hauch is thips fo furprifed at his heels, caused all his gallies to turne againe upon the enemy to rescue those ships. The Turks seeing that, & with the Westerly wind by little and little fallen down fo far with the ships, that they were come within the danger of the shot of the Towne. began with great stir to for lake the ships, and to betake them to their oars, and so in maner of slight withdrew themselues: whom Auria pursued a great way to Modon, thundring in their poups The Turk; Bees

C wish his great flot, which he liberally bestowed among them: whilst in the mean time An. Bits to Medan tonius Auria came to rescue the two distressed ships. There the Spaniards which but a little before had hardly maintained their close fights, began now as men reviued, to shew themfelues. & couragiously to make refistance: and they which came with Antonius Auria to their rescue, entring with wonderfull celerity on euery side, slew and tooke 300 Ianizaries, which with great courage had entred those ships, & were there left by the sudden departure of their fellows. Among it whom was taken one loguphus an old captain of 1000 Ianizaries; to whom Auria after he was come to Corone, gaue a fair suit of apparel and a chain of gold, and so set him at liberty without any ransom: therby to prouoke the Turks to the like kind of curteous dealing toward the Christians. Assam. Beg the pyrat, and the other captains of the Turks fleet, D wonderfully blamed Lutzis the Admirall, for that hee would not then fight with the Christians, when he was thereo earnestly requested, both by the captains and soldiers in general, and had a fair opportunitie of victory offered, at such time as the Christians fleet was disordred. But he excused himself, saying. That it was given him in special charge by Solyman the Emperor, That he thould in any case respect the safety of his navy, and not to come vnto the hafard of a battel. The Turks which befieged the city by land, upon the approach of the Christian fleet for fook their trenches and fled. At which time Mendeza the governour fallving out, took great store of victuall and warlike provision, which the Turkes had for hast left behinde them. So Auria to his great honor having driven the Turks from Corone both by sea & land, corone relicited furnished the city with store of corn, wine, victual, pouder & shot; and committed the defence by Ania, therof to Maricaus & the companies of the mutinous Spaniards which he had brought from Naples. Comforting the Greeks, and exhorting them, patiently for a while to endure those calamities of war: faying, that the Emperor would the next year make war against the Turks both by sea and land in Peloponesus, and free them from their bondage. And so imbarking theold garrison of the Spaniards, departed from Corone, and came before Modon, where he lay as it were brauing the Turks great Admiral, hoping therby to draw him out of that firong Auria seinras, harbor to battel. But when he faw that the enemie could by no meanes be allured out of his denbrages the Arength, or affailed as he lay, he departed from thence to Corcyra, and to back again to Mel- Inteffer.

Within a few dayes after, Affam-Beg the Moore of Alexandria, and most famous Pyrat, The Moore of F lying in wait for the merchants thips of Venice comming out of Syria with merchandife, by Atrandria chance met with Hieronymu Canalis upon the coast of Creet: Where in the night time was referent and fought betwirt them a fierce and cruell battell; wherein of the Moores thirteene Gallies, listbe years 2, foure were funke, three taken, and the rest having lost most part of their Rowers, fled to Alexandria. In this fight was flaine three hundred Ianizaries which were going to Caire, and a thousand other Turks. Of all that were taken, there was scarsly one faued but the Moothin. G felf, who grieuoully wounded in the face, for fafegard of his life was glad to discour himself: for the Venetians maintaining their state by trade and trassique, do of all others shew least fanor to pyrats. When the Moor had made himself known vnto Canalu, there was great careta. ken for the curing of his wounds, and either of them began with notable diffimulation to excuse the matter to other, saying, That they were both deceiued by the likenes of their gallies, and militaking of their friends for enemies: when as for all that, they knew one another right well. For the Moor said, That he took those Venetian Gallies to have bin part of Auria his fleet: and Canalys excused himself, by saying that he mistook him for Barbaruss, who a few years before had furprifed three of the Venetian gallies. Yet the Venetians doubting how Solyman would take the matter, by their embassador sought to excuse what was don, as athing H hapning by error and mischance. Of which excuse Solyman accepted, and said moreouer, That Canalis had don wel and foldier-like, to repulf by force the wrong that was offered him. Three of the Emperors gallies staying behind the rest of the fleet, were neer voto the promontory of Palinurus, vpon the coast of Apulia, intercepted and caried away by Sinan, syrnamed the lew.

The Winter following, the Spaniards and Greeks in Corone began to want victuals, elpecially wine and flesh, for the Turks had so blocked up the city, that nothing was to be hadout of the country: wherfore the foldiers requested Macicaus their gouernor and Generall, to lead them forth to some piece of seruice against the enemy, for somuch as they were not to expect any reliefe elswhere before Aprill; wishing rather valiantly to die like men in fight against I the Turks, than to languish within those dead walls forwant of victuall. But Macient mindfull of his charge, fought by reasons to disfuade them from that purpose, shewing them what an offence it were, rashly to depart out of the city committed to their charge, which might be vnto them dangerous, although they should speed neuer so well; and that thosewants, which they rather feared than felt, would well enough be ouercome by sparing and patience; and therfore told them plainly, that he was resolutely set downe to keep the city for the Emperour, and to endure all hardnes, rather than to incurre the infamy, That he had for saken the City, and betrayed his Garrison. Yet for all this, the matter was so viged by Didacus Tovarres and Hermofilla, both great Captains, and by the general importunity of the fouldiers, that Macieus was inforced to yeeld to their defire, and to promife them to go:yet protesting with K all, That he did it altogether against his will, rather inforced that persuaded vnto that, wherof he had no great hope of succes. Amongst other that were so forward in that action, was one Barbatius a most valiant Greek, who could perfectly speak the Turks language, and of all others best knew the by waies and secret passages of the country : he undertooke to bee their rent gottle or guid, and by printer waies to bring them to the enemies vndiscouered in the dead time of the to his prife da. night, when as they feared no fuch matter. So Maciena commending the currody of the city to Liscanius and Mendesius, with charge that they should suffer no man to go out of the City after his departure, for fear of giuing any knowledge vnto the enemy, fet forward about ten a clock at night toward Andrussa, Barbatius being his guid; who shunning the common beaten waies, brought them by secret and vincouth paths that night halfe the way to Andrussa. But vpon the rifing of the Sunne, he brought them into a fecret wooddy Vally, where they refted and refreshed themselves all that day, and setting forward again that night, came to Andrussa besoreday. In this town, which was of no great strength, lay one Caranu a warlike Cap tain, with three thousand footmen, wherof the one half was of the Ianizaries; and in the suburbs lay Achomates with a thousand chosen horsmen, with which garrison the Turks keptall that fide of Peloponesus in awe. Macicaus brought by his guid unto the place where hisenemies lay, went directly to the town to have surprised it : Hermosilla in the mean time standing stil with certain troups of Spaniards ouer against the place where the horsmen lay. But this could not be done with to great filence, but that fome of the horse-boyes beeing awak, discouered them by the fire in their matches; who first awaked the negligent watchmen, & after- M wards raised an alarm in the suburbs. Wherupon Hermosilla couragiously set vpon the horse men, being altogether vnready, and flew many of them before they could arme themselves, and set fire also vpon the stables wherin the Turks horses stood, with the extraordinarie rage wherof many of the Turks perished, with their horses and armor. Great and terrible was the noise raised upon the sudden in the suburbs; but especially of the horses, which burnt as they flood fast tied in the stables, or by chance breaking loofe, ranne up and down with their tailes and mains of a light fire: by occasion wherof an alarm was raised in the town, and the Turkes got to the wals before the Spaniards could enter. Mackaus himself laboring to breake in at a postern, was shot in the head with a small shot and slain:divers others neer him were there al. Macicaus slain. to flain. The Turks perceiving the small number of their enemies, sallied out vpon them and inforced them to retyre to Hermefilla, who had already made great spoil among the horsmenby whose skilfull direction the Spaniards retired in so good order, making many stands, with their harquebusiers all drawn into the rereward, that such of the Turkes as were most forward to pursue them, did by their death cause the rest to make lesse hast. Achomates with such of B his horimen as had escaped the fire, hasted thither also, bringing with him 200 harquebusiers which he had caused his horsemen for hast to take vp behinde them vpon their horses: but whilst he fought eagerly to be reuenged upon his enemies, and with too much heat pressed on with the formost, he was shot into the body with a bullet and slain. So the horsmen having besore receiued a great losse as they lay in their lodgings, accounting it in their good haps that they were not there al flain, and having now loft their captain, ceased any further to purfue their enemies, but returned. The Spaniards and Greeks although they were wearied both with their long march and euill succes, retired stil as resolute men ready to fight, and so returned to Corone. Presently after, the Turkish garison removed from Andrussa to Megalopolis, now called Londarium. After whose departure the Christian soldiers of Corone came thither and buried the dead bodies of their slain fellows (which til then lay vnburied) and brought back with them the head of Macicaus their late General, which the Turkes had there fet vp vpon a long pole, which they honorably buried at Corone. Not long after, the plague Corone for facbegan to grow hot in Corone, so much the more grieuous, for that it came accompanied tensyster. Spewith many other hard difficulties. For which causes, the Spaniards as men at once inforced with many extremities, imbarked themselues with all the great Ordnance, and such Greekes aswould go with them, in certain thips which came with corn out of Sicily, and fo departed.

leaving the town empty for the Turks to come vnto. It was commonly reported, that the Spaniards left Corone not without secret consent of the Emperor, which was the rather thought to be fo, for that they which for fook the place re-D ceiued therby no difgrace; and the Emperor himfelf had offered to give the Town to Clement Bishop of Rome, the Venetians, and the Knights of Malta, who all refused to receive it, as loth to be at fo great a charge in keeping a place feruing to no greater purpose, the very cause why the empetor was so willing to part with it. Now Clement the great Bishop had by means of Alogsius Grittus made a motion of peace, to have bin concluded for ten years betwirt solyman and the Christian Princes, and therupon the Town to have again bindelivered vnto the Turks. Which peace Solyman was not altogether vnwilling to grant, being then wholly bent to innade the Persian. Ferdinand was also in good hope, that his brother Charles the Emperor would for the yeelding up of that towne, have covenanted with the Turke fome great matter for his benefit in Hungary; which was thought would also easily have bin granted. But whilst the Emperor drawn diversly with the consideration of his honor in keeping it, and of his profit in giving it vp, stood too long in resoluing; the town in the meane time was by the Spaniards (their necessities daily increasing) abandoned, and so lest vnto the Turks for nothing. Solyman now purposing to turn his forces against the Persians, of whom he had in the frontiers of his dominion received great hurt, especially in Comagene, renued the league he had with the Venetians and some other Christian princes : but of all other his affairs with the Christians, he was most carefull of the interest he had already gotten in Hungary: for it was reported, That King Iohn his Vassall, induced by the continual solicitations of his subjects, was defirous of peace with King Ferdinand, upon condition that he might quietly enjoy the kingdom during his life : and after his decease, it to remaine vnto King Ferdinand and his

F heirs. Wherfore Solyman, that nothing should be there done in his absence without his know- Aleysim Grie. kedge, sent Aloysius Grittus the duke of Venice his son (of whom we have before spoken) a man we have before spoken) a man we have before spoken. both for the honor of his house, the good cariage of himselfe, and the special commendation salymenting of Abraham the chief Baffa, in great credit with him; with commission as his lieutenant to be tenant in Hung-

affiftant vnto king Iohn, in fuch magnifical fort, as that without him the king might conclude G. nothing in matters of state, concerning either peace or wars, with other the Christian princes. With this proud Commission of the grand Seigniour Grittus entred into Transylvania then a part of the Hungarian kingdom (much about the fame time that Solyman fet forward from Constantinople against the Persian) attended vpon with seven thousand persons of one fort and other, among ft whom were Vrbanus Batianus, and Ianus Docia, two famous Hungarian captains with their companies, and many of the Turks Ianizaries also. At his fifth comming, to make his authority the more known, he fent out his proud Commaund vnto the great men and gouernors of the cities of that warlike prouince, charging them forthwith to repair vato him as great Solymans Deputy, authorised by him to hear and determine all the controuerses and matters of state concerning the Kingdom of Hungary. At that time Americus Sihachus H Bishop of Veradium, a man of great nobility and power, withall singularly wel qualified, was Vayuod or gouernor of Transylvania, an honor next vnto the King. Hee vnderstanding that Grittus was come into his prouince, and making small hast to welcome him, as one not greatly mooued at his comming, or much regarding the commandement of Solyman; wonderfully offended Grittus, who defired nothing more than at his first entrance to have confirmed the opinion of his authority in the minds of the vulgar people, by the prest and ready attendance of the Vayuod. But it was reported, that the stout Bishop vpon a Christian zeal detested the friendship of the Turks, and could not wel brooke that they should be too much acquainted in his province, for fear lest that fruitful country abounding with men and horses, should by one means or other fall into their hands. Grittus was come to Baxovia, when he understood I that the Vayuod was comming with a great train, and lay about ten miles off, incamped with diuers gallant troups of horsemen, in warlike maner appointed : for the Bishops of Hungary being wonderfull rich, were by old custom bound to keep great numbers of horsmen, which as occasion served, they vsed to bring into the field against the Turks; accounting it great honor, with their religious hands to defend the cause of Religion. Bur then especially the Nobility of the country wel appointed reforted on every fide, in curtesie to honour and counte. nance their great Bishop and gouernor, at whose commandement they were: insoquehas the Bishops retinue made shew of a good army. Which thing mooued Grittun exceedingly, that he should be inforced contrary to his expectation, to parly with the Bishop in the open fields as with an enemy in the fight of all their followers. Herof rose envy, a deadly mischief always & repining at another mans honour, when as the one swelling with Turkish pride could shide no equall; and the other jealous of his honor, could by no means indure any superior in such place as he had the foueraignty of. When these two great men had met together in the open field, and there dined more like enemies than friends, without any flew of friendship or good will 3 Gritter inwardly chafing at his bare entertainment, concretly threatned to be revenged vpon all fuch as should make to light account of his authority: and immediatly as he departed from the banquet, taking his Turkish cap from his head (which was after the Turkish maner made of a high fashion, of rich sables) and opening it with both his hands, sald, This Cap will not hold two heads, and therfore it must be fitted to one, and so put it on again, James 36 cia, one of the Hungarian captains his followers (who deadly hated the Vayuodi for that hee long time before, for a malapert speech in a great assembly, gaue him a blow with his fift) took hold of that speech of Grittue, as a fit occasion for him toworke his revenge; and layd; Doise Infences Your Honour maketh a fit comparison ; neither can this province contain two equals Gouernors or Commanders, nor you ever enjoy your power and authority, except you do this day with speedy and manly resolution defend both Solymans credit and your own. You know not this proud beaft Americus, whose pride and insolency if you but say the word, I will quickly pull down : for he hateth Solyman, he regardeth not the King, and of you he maket I no account at all ; for why be aftireth unto the majelty of aking, and faith that the Vayuodhip of Transyluania well beseemeth a King for that in this countrey Decebaldus the Dacian somtime reigned, whom the warlike Emperour Trajan with all the force of the Roman Empire hard's subdued. No man can more proudly or arrogantly set himself forth than he, neither more crastily M or cumingly diffemble to serue his own turn. Indeed he hath for fashion sake presented your Honor with a few simple presents, and given you his hand also, better known for his falshood than his faith; so the entent that when you are once past his country, he may scof and jeast at your Decrees. Verily he deadly enuits

A year honor and felicity, and grudgethin his heart that you should set down the laws of peace and warre in Hungary : and wheras he dath manifestly aspire unto a kingdom, he feareth you abone all others lest you bould trouble bu defignes, abate his credit, and chaftife his infolencie. Verily, he that thus maliones your bappines and contempeth your authority, is not to be suffered but by good reason to be taken away thereby at this your first entrance to defend the credit of your Commission, and honor of your name. For nothing is more dangarans than a faithlesse Companion and a socret enemy, especially when you shall leave him at your back behind you : for when he Shall an occasion fernes few forth his hidden malice, he shall so much the more listy and desperally indanger your person. Grittus intaged with this speech more than before thought it best to make hast, and to vie his authority to the full : hee commended Doria. and promised in short time to require his good will towards him, especially if he would by fome notable attempt abate the Bishops pride. It is reported, That Gritting gave him no other charge but to take the Bishop, that so he might after the Turkish manner have sent him in chains to Constantinople, and bestowed the honor of the Vayuod vpon Hieronymus Lasens the Polonian, who in hope of that honorable preferment voto him promised by King John, had don him oreat and faithful feruice, as his embaffador both to Solyman, and to the French king. But when King Lobn perceived that hee could not conveniently without manifest danger The cause whi place him (heing a Polonian, who could fearfe speake the Hungarian language) Gouernour King John ouer fuch a warlike proplet he as it were inforced by necessity, preferred this Americas the bithop of Veradium, a man of them both reuerenced and feared. Which fo grieved Lafen, (a man of great flomack and experience, and therunto excellently learned) that he would never admit any excuse of the Kings, but ever after complained that he was by the King deluded. Sepertheles he kept himself within the bounds of loyaltie, and enioied certain lands & towns which the King, had given him in the borders of Polonia : but estranged from him in minde. he was now becom one of Grittus his followers, hoping of his better preferment by his means vnto Solyman , and for that cause was not so forward to do the King such feruice as he had in times past. Now by the commandement of Gritten, a strong company of Turkish horsemen, and certain troups of Hungarians, were deliuered to Docia; who fecretly departing that night from Baxovia, came fuddenly to the Vayuods camp; having a little before by his Hungarian spies learned that he lay in the open fields in his tent, by reason of the great heat, without any Natch or gard, attended on only by his pages and houthold feruants, as a man without fear; D and that all the rest of his regione lay dispersed in the Countrey Villages round about. All which served so well for Docia his purpose, that the Vayuod ignorant of his death so nigh at hand (who rather contemned than feared his enemies) was suddenly oppressed by Docia his The Vaywood fouldiers: so that whilst he was yet lying in his bed, and scarcely wel awaked by his Cham- Tent by Docus, berlains and the noise of the enemy; Docia suddenly breaking into his tent, cut off his head and but bead as he lay. All they which lay neere, amased at the suddennes of the matter, fled away for fear, Griting. and left their horses and other things for a prey vnto the Turks and other of Docia his followers. Decia having don so great an outrage, returned to Grittus, presenting vnto him the Vayuods head, which he brought in his hand by the ear. Lascus was then present, but altogether ignorant of the murther, who as a man mooued with natural compassion in so sudden and hor-E rible a fact, and forgetting all former grudges (as in like case it oftentimes chanceth) stood as one dismayed, nothing reioycing at the vnworthy death of his enemy. To whom Grittus turning himselfe, said, Lascus, Doest thou not know this shauen pate: truely it is a great mans head, but of such a one as was very ambitious, rebellious, and proud. To whom Lafens replied. Truly though I loued him not, yet I thought it not so whilst it stood upon his shoulders; difallowing therin the cruelty of the fact. Which thing Grittus perceiving, began to repent him of that was done, and faid openly, That although he was worthily flain, yet he could have win shedrather to have had him taken prisoner. The report of this horrible murther once bruted abroad, the Bishops kinsmen and friends, yea almost all the people of that province, rose vp. in arms against Grittu to revenge the death of that reverend Bishop, whom living they had both loued & feared. Neuer did any people in reuenge of a common wrong rife in arms with The Translation greater desire, more heat, or quicker speed: so that in few days there were assembled together manife up in 40000 horse and foot, under the leading of Stephanus Maylat a valiant Gentleman, who of all Gruus, is reother most honored the Bishop, and in that common grief took vpon him as Chiefe, the per- weagethe Vag. fecuting of the authours of fuch inhumane cruelty. Grittus perceiung how grieuously the words death.

matter was taken, with the danger he was in, began to doubt with himselfe what course were & best for him to take. To go forward, and to fall into the hands of the furious people, the same was prefent death, and to return and leave the honour of the deputation he had with fo expectation of al men taken vpon him, was vnto his afpiring mind no leffe torment than death it felf. Thus perplexed, he with all speed got himself with his followers to the strong tome of Mege, in hope to throud himfelf, vntil the rage of the country people were either of repir appealed (as it oftentimes falleth out in fudden tumults) or els til he should be relicited by King lohn, or the Turkes Sanzacks which had the charge of the frontiers of the Turkiti Enpire. The townsmen of Mege seeing Grittus accompanied with so many Turks shift the gare against him : yet av length by the persuasion of the two Hungarian Capcains Beris and Bail ana, they gaue him leave to enter into the bale Towne, having before retyred themselves and H all their substance vnto the higher town, which in maner of a strong Gastele commanded the lower. Here whilst Gritten with all carefulnes fortifieth the place, and dispatcheth truffe messengers vnto his friends abroad for aid; his enemies with hideons noise and durcries and proching the town, at their first comming attempted to have scaled the Walls and rapples therof. Which thing whilst they disorderly did, with greater fury than discretical they were casily repulsed, and many of them slaine by the Turkes Ianizaries and harquebusters. After which loffe, by the direction of Maylat their Generall they withdrew themselves out of the danger of the shot, and incamped on every side of the town, hoping, as the truth was that the enemy unprouided of victual, could not long hold the place, but mult of necessity stards with famin,or yeeld it vp. In the mean time Grittus resolutely induring all the calamities of a man, I befieged, fel fick, and fo much the more, for that he could hear nothing of any aid he expedied from his friends. For King John glad in his minde of the diffreffe of the Overfeet, or rather competitor of his kingdome; and also knowing that he could not without great discontentment of his subjects oppose himself against such a multitude, risen vpon so inst a cause; yet for fashion sake sent certain troups of horsmen to his relief; who not altogether ignorant of the Kings minde, made fuch haft as men that purposed not to come in time to doe him good. As for the Turks Sanzacks of Belgrade and Samandria, they enuying at his honor, flatly refufed to depart from their charge to relieue him, without expres command from Solyman himfelf and Lafens (before one of Grittus his chief followers, but now a beholder of his distresse) when he had a little before departed from him to procure him fome reliefe, as hee promifed, K did now in his extremity for sake him alfo. The citisens of the upper town (who a great while had flood looking on from aboue as men indifferent) perceiuing the full resolution of their countrymen to be reuenged, and the difficulties wherwith the Turkes were inclosed, affailed them also from the high town. Grutus thus befet on every side, offered vnto the Transylvanians a great masse of mony to suffer him to passe farther into Hungary but their surious minds more destrous of reuenge than mony, were not to be moued with any gold. In fine, hee sent rich jewels to the gouernor of Moldavia his friend, to be ready at a certain hour when he purposed to fally out of the town, to receive him with certaine troups of horsemen; so if it were possible to saue himself and his children. Grittus (whether it were vpon a doubtful hope, or vrged by inevitable destiny) fallying out of the town at the appointed time, with Solymans commission in his hand, and missing of the Moldavian, fell voon Francis Schenden the late Bishops and biought to nigh kinfinan, and Maylats familiar friend 3 who furiously running in vpon him with tumultuous speech, violently caught from his head his rich cap of Sables, and with his horsemen took him, being weak with ficknes, and making no refiftance. His followers, especially the Turks, inclosed on euery fide, were either slain or taken. But Grittus himselfe being brought to the Generals Tent, befet round with his armed enemies, and there examined, Why he had commanded the Vayuod to be flain; erneftly protested that he neuer commaunded any such thing, and that it was don without his knowledge. Which his answer ferued not his turne, all the people crying out against him with one voice, that he should as a sacrifice be offered voto the Vayuods ghost. Wherupon he was by Maylat deliuered again to Francis Schenden to beex- M ecuted, who without delay caused his head to be struck off. The Nobilitie and the Vayuods kinsmen (after the maner of that people) dipped some part of their garments in his bloud, the longer to keep in mind the remembrance of the reuenge. This was the shamefull end of Alossim Grutus the Duke of Venice his son, Solymans Deputy in Hungary, with whom hee was

A in such credit as neuer was any Christian abounding in wealth and worldly felicity: but climing too fast vp the cuil staued ladder of ambition, suddenly fel and neuer rose more. The executioner stripping his dead body, found about him so many pretious stones and jewels as were valued at forty millions of ducats, And not long after, Lasens fent for by the King to Bu. Theriches fold da, was streitly examined upon torture, concerning Grittus his Commission and purposes, and about Grittus. was in great danger of his life; but at last by the intercession of Sigismund King of Polonia he was fet at liberty, and so fled out of Hungary vnto Sigismunds court in Polonia: after he had long time wearied himself, and adventured his life in the Hungarian state. Docta the author of this tragedy was by the furious people afterwards rent in pieces and fo perished.

The same time that Grittus went from Constantinople into Hungary, Solyman the Turkish Soliman purpo-Emperor dreading no danger out of Europ, took in hand two great expeditions both at one feth in invade time, the one by land into Asia against the Persians, and the other by sea into Africke against Press and of the Moors; promifing to him self in his inordinat desires, the monarchy of the whole world in short time, if he might subdue these two great Nations, whom he had already in hope deuoured. But forasmuch as all canor be told at once, which was at one time in divers places so far distant don, omitting for a while the expedition made in person himself against the Persians. we wil first declare what he did by his lieutenants against the Moors. Hariadenus, syrnamed of the Christians Barbarussa (who succeeding his elder brother Horruccius in the kingdome of Algiers in Africk, had by many victories fo inlarged the kingdom before gotten by his brother that his name and power was now become terrible both to the Christians & wild Moors. and his fame grown great in the Turkish court) was the chief author and persuader of Solyman to inuade Africk, But it shal not (as I think) be far from our purpose, briefly to relate by what means those two Mytilene brethren, basely born, crept out of a smal galliot vnto the majesty of great Kings; that her in they which come afterward may also admire the wonderfull changes and chances of these worldly things, now vp, now downe, as if the life of man were not of much more certainty than a stage play.

These two brethren Horruccius and Hariadensu, bornat Mytilene in the Island of Lesbos, The poore beweary of the poor and base estate they led at home with their father a renegat Grecian; stea- ginning of Horling a little galliot, committed themselves & all the hope of their good fortune to sea, where riadenes, who by chance they conforted themselves with Camales a most famous pyrat of that time; vnder of base Pyrais D whom Horraccius the elder brother for his forwardnes became a captain; and growing rich by appread to the many purchases, and also strong with gallies and slaues which he had at fundry times taken; with and at last consorting himself with Haidin, Sinan the Iew, Salec, and other lesse pyrats (who afterward became men of great fame and account) ouer whom he commanded as an arch pirat, came seeking after purchase as far as Mauritania. At which time Selymes King of Iulia Cæfarea, now called Algiers, was in arms against his brother Mechemetes competitor of the kingdom, who aided by the Numidians, now commonly called Arabians, put his brother in great doubt of his estate. Selymes glad of the comming of Horrnecins and the other pyrats his followers, with a great masse of mony paid before hand, induced Horruccius and the rest to take vpon them the defence of him and his kingdom against his brother. Which thing Horrucciau so happily performed (especially by the means of his harquebusiers, as then no smalterror to the wild Moors and Numidians) that in short time he repulsed that sauage people, and set Selymes at peace in his kingdom. Horrucedus being a man of a sharpwit, and by nature ambitions, noting in the time of his service the Kings milde and simple disposition void of all distrust; and that the naked Moors were no soldiers, but a light and vnconstant people, alwayes at variance among themselves; and that the wandring Numidians living barely, divided into many factions, were easily by reward to be won, or by force constrained; suddenly falsified his faith, and villanously slew Selymes the King, as hee was bathing himselfe, mistrusting nothing leffe than the falshood of the pyrati& in the same hurle, murdring such as he thought would withstand his desire, and with bounty and cruelty ouercomming the rest, so wrought the matter, that he was by general consent chosen king of Algiers. Thus of a pyrat become a king, he shortly after by policie surprised Circello Ya samous city about 60 miles distant from Algiers) by his foldiers fent thither in the habit of Merchants. After that, he by his brother Hariadenus, no les valiant than himselfe, troubled all the Mediteranian sea from Algiers with his Hornetius bie gallies, & al his neighbors: himself by land with daily incursions leaving nothing vntoucht, sucuse.

which might by force or policy be had; so that his power daily increased, men of service con- G timally reforting vnto him, as the chiefe man in all those parts. Not thus contented, he to enlarge his kingdome, draue the Spaniards out of Bugea, a city famous both for the great trade thither, and for the Mahometan schoole sometime their kept : at the taking whereof he lost his right hand with a shot, and in stead thereof euer after vsed a hand of yron, wherewith he obtained many worthy vi ctories against his enemies: for neere to Algiers he ouerthrew an army of the Spaniards, with Diego de Vara their Generall. And shortly after, at such time as Hy. co Moncada returning out of Italy with the old Spanish fouldiers, landed in his country, he enforced him againe to fea; where he with all his expert fouldiers either perifhed by shipwrack, or driven on thore, were flain or taken prisoners by Horruccius, and thrust into his gallies. At last having in fundry battels ouercome the King of Tremissa, Charles the Emperour his confe-H derat, and thrust him out of his kingdome, he stirred up both the Christians and Numidians against him: so that comming to take Ora and Portus (two strong holds kept by garrisons of Spaniards fent thither to aid the King of Tremiffa) he was by them and the Moors at the first repulfed, and afterwards quite ouerthrowne: where most part of his army being flaine or taken prisoners, he with a few of his friends sought to saue themselues by slight ouer the desart tands; and feeing himselse hardly pursued by his enemies, scattered many pieces of gold you the fands as he fled, thereby to have staied their hasty pursuit: but they more desirous of him than of his gold, followed fo fast, that at last they ouertooke him, and without further delay flrucke off his head, which was afterwards fent into Spaine, and carried vpon a lancethrough all the townes and cities along the sea coast; to the wonderfull rejoyeing of the people, vnto I about in Spain. whom he had in former time done great harme.

After the death of Horruccius, Hariadenus inferiour to his brother neither in courage nor martiall prowesse, by the generall consent of the souldiers tooke vpon him the kingdome of Algiers. He, made heire not only of his brothers kingdome, but of his vertues and haughty thoughts, and of the syrname also of Barbarussa, began forthwith to aspire vnto the Empire of all that part of Affricke; accounting what he had already gotten, too little and too base to anfiver his defires. Wherefore he entred into armes, and became a terrour both to the Moores and Numidians; holding peace with fome, and wars with others, as best served his purpose: and with his gallies robbed and spoiled the coasts of Spaine, Sardinia, and the Islands Balearesstortune fo fauoring him in all his enterprises, that he became both famous & fearful to all K Con the fall his enemies. He flew Hamet, a great commander among the Numidians, and chased Benchades and Amida, two of their greatest Princes, out of the country; and with like fortune at sea, ouercame Hugo Moncada, a famous Spaniard, who fore wounded, had much ado to faue himselfe by flight, when he had loft divers of his gallies. He also inbattell at sea overthrew Roderican Portundus, Admirall of Spaine: in which fight the Admirall and his son were both slaine, and seuen of his gallies taken: intoken of which victory, he sent part of the rich spoile there taken, with the Admirals enfigne, as a present vnto Solyman, whereby he became famous in the Turks court, but much more, after he had repulsed Auria from Cercenna, and taken two great Genoway thips which were comming to Auria loaded with men and munition; the losse whereof filled the city of Genoa with much forrow. All things forting thus according to his defire, L and his name become no leffe terrible in Spaine, Italy, Sicily, and the Islands of the Meditertanian, than it was in the greatest part of Affricke; Solyman grieued with the losse of Corone, Patras, and the castles upon the streits of Lepanto, taken from him by Auria, Himerales his Admirall being shamefully put to flight: by the counsell of his Bassaes, but especially of Abrafrom the chiefe Baffa, sent Embaffadours vnto him to Algiers; offering him the greatest hofor the Landian nours of his court, and to make him Admirall of all his fleet, if he would forthwith repaire unto Constantinople: for why, he was the only man in all mens judgements, who for his yeres and great experience at fea, as well as for his inuincible courage, and glory of his late at chieued kingdome, was to be compared with Auria, and to be opposed against the Christian ficet. Sinas a great man in Solymans court, was with this embassage sent, and speedily transpor-M ted to Algiers by Mangalis, a famous pyrat, then Gouernour of the Rhodes; who at his landing, was honourably received by Barbarussa, and audience given him. Barbarussa vnderstanding vnders ding the cause of his comming, was exceeding glad thereof, presently conceining no small hope of obtaining the Monarchy of Affricke, if hee might once come to Solymans prefence,

A and at large shew vnto him the state of Affricke, and power of the Christians, with their conrinuall discord among stehemselues. Wherefore without further delay committing the prorection of his fon Afanes (then about eighteene yeares old) and the gouernment of the new gotten kingdome to Ramada and Agis, two of his nigh kinfemen and affured friends, of whose fidelity he doubted not: he with forty of his owne gallies in most warlike manner appointed. fer forward with Solymans Embassadour towards Constantinople: where by the way he met with a fleet of Gonoway thips bound for Sicily for corne, which after a tharpe a cruell fight he tooke and burnt. After that, landing by night in the Countrey of Elba, not farre from Naples, hee suddenly surprised Rhium a rich city , where loading his gallies with the wealth thereof, and carrying away with him all the inhabitants into captinity, he arrived at Constan. Barbarussaco. tinoplein the yeare 1533, where he was by the great courtiers brought to Solyman, of whom he flavingole. was joyfully received if it were but for the presents which he gaue him : which were faire boves and young maidens sumptuously apparelled, cunuchs, and wild beasts of Lybia, as Lyons. Leopards and such like. But after he had certaine daies discoursed at large with his great Bassa's of the state of Affricke, the strength of the Christians, and how the wars were to be managed, he was afterwards by them feldomer fent for, and offering himfelfe into their com. pany, was hardly admitted for enuy (the inseparable companion of growing honour) had "uret court. quickely ouertaken him in the Court, fo that many men letted not openly to fay, It had not bin the fashion of the Othoman Kings, to prefer pyrats (the worst kind of thecues) to the honor of their great Admirall; and that there wanted not, neither ever would want men both ver-C tuous and valiant in the Turks court, which could with great honour maintaine and augment the glory of the Turkish Empire both by sea and land , whereas he had against all right and conscience, by shameful treachery intruded himselse into another mans kingdom in Affricke. and there perfecuted the Mahometan Princes and people, being of no religion himselfe, as one that was borne of a renegate Greeke, and had from his youth lived as a mercileffe pyrac. and common enemy of mankinde. By which speeches Barbaru Ja perceived in how evil time Abraham Baffa his best friend, and by whose meanes he was sent for, was absent from Court; who at that time was gone into Comagena, and Wintred at Aleppo, with purpose (as Solymans forcrunner) with the first of the next Spring, to passe ouer Euphrates against the Persian. After long fuit and much expectation, Solyman answered Barbaruffa by Ajax and Cassimes two of the Barbaruffa re-D great Baffa's, That all the matter concerning him should be referred to the discretion of Abra. I steed to Abraham the chiefe Bassa, for that he was by his counsell especially sent for out of Affricke: where - Bassa, fore if he did expect any thing, he should repaire vnto him in Syria, that according to his grave judgement all things might be ordered. Barbaruffa thus rejected into Syria, although he well perceived that it tended to his no small disgrace; yet in hope by sufferance to obtaine another kingdome, seemed contented with the answer, and resolved forthwith to take upon He travelles him that long and painefull journy: which the old king luftly performed, and so posting by into Siria to land thorow Afia the leffe, and travelling over the mountain Amanus, then covered with deep by bim comen-fnow, came in the dead time of Winter to Aleppo in Syria, where he was honourably recei.

ued by the great Baffa, and heard at large, to his fo good contentation and liking, that he decmed him of all others the fittest to command the Turks power at seasand to that purpose writ commendatory letters in his behalfe to Solyman. withing him for his fufficience to place him as the fourth with the other three Baffa's of his counfell. After Barbaruffa was againe arrived His returne to

at Constantinople with these letters, and that it was once knowne how effectually the chiefe Constantinople. Baffa had commended him to Selyman, it was a world to fee how on the fudden the face of the court was changed voon him, every man either for friendship or flattery began now to speake bation of all men accounted fufficient to prefer whom he pleased; and his letters lawes to the reft of the court. Barbaruffa had brought with him from Algiers, one Roscetes the elder brother Roscetes of Muleaffes king of Tunes, who wrongfully driven into exile by his yonger brother, had lived certain yeres at Algiers, but now by the persuasion of Barbarn Ja was come with him to Constantinople, to craue aid of Solyman against the oppression of his brother. Him Barbarussa oftentimes shewed vnto the great Bassa's, and in his discourses with them concerning the conquest of Affricke, set him out as a most fit instrument for subduing of the kingdom of Tunes, of his praises, and to extoll his worthinesse: who was now in all mens mouthes but Barbarussa?

G liberation and confultation had with the Baffaes concerning the innation of Affricke, Baffa. russia now admitted vnto the presence of Solyman, in these or like words persuaded him to that war, for the entrance whereunto we have thus far digreffed.

What thing the Priests with loud voice vie to pray for, at such time at the Othoman Emperors enter freeh in the into the Temple to pray, the same thing do I also wish unto thee most mighty Solyman, which is, Thu tion to cauale thou shouldest remember, thy progenitors by Instice and Religion to have got for thee this Empire, the which, more magnificent and richer the gods have not given to any : Fortune hath never deceived them that troad that way, and thou hitherto half so traced their steps, that thou half easily surmounted their fame and glory, administring Insticctothy subjects; and instamed with the hope of eternal praise, making H continuall war against the enemies of our religion the true office of a zealous Prince. By this meanes is Belgrade taken, Rhodes won, the King of Hungary flaine in battell, Germany ewice harried andburnt: fo that Charles, whom the Christians would make equall to thy selfe in power and valour, with the great aid almost of all the Christian Nations, terrified with the noise of thy army, shunned battell. But forafmuch us Empires, be they never fo large, or victories be they never fo glorious, can weither fatisfie thegreamiffe of an beroicall mind, or glut the same with glory; show hast therefore fent before thee the victoriomen. fignes against the Persians and Parthians, that those Nations who have wickedly fallen from our Rites. purified as it were by thy facred armes, may be un ain reclaimed to the antient rives of our religion. But be this unto thy greatness, most bonourable to attept, and glorious to performe : let it only be lawfull for me now grown an old man in the middest of arms & dangers to declare what is expedient and briefely to open 1 fuch things as I have by long experience learned to concerne the augmenting of thy fame and Empire elsewhere. Neither would I have you to take this as presumptionsly spoken of me : for Fartune hath enough, yea, and more than enough favoured my designes, whom from a poore costage and bare hope, shee hath promoted to glorious victories, great riches, ga, while the title and majafty of a King : But unto thife things the gods could give me nothing better, than to be called for of thee, and fent for in Counsell to diff cour fe of matters of greatest importance : wherefore my uduice shall be unto thee faithfully and with the personce confirmed : which although is be all that is feemeth old men cando, get in my found body remain neth such strength, that I dare both promise and performe unto thee my good service at all affairs both by sea and land. For unto this only course have I bent my felfe day and night from my youth; following the purpose and counsell of my valiant brother Hortugius, (who to extend the bounds of our religion, perse. K cuted the Christians both by sea and land) desiring nothing more, than that thy fleet und power migh once be joyned with my forces and direction, and fo under thy good hap, to be either a communder, or elft commanded for asmuch as it grienes b me not to be commanded by my betters. Of which my desires if the gods Shall make me pareaker, the Spaniards Shall Shortly be dreuen quite out of Affricke, thou Shall heare that the Moores are gone ouer into Spaine, to repoffeffethe king dome of Granado , That Tanes and Numidia are at thy command; and not to feake of Sardinia, and Covegra, that Sietlin is ours: which once taken, we shall sterue up Italy, and on enery side distresse it with our sleet, being now weakt and brought low by the distord of the Princes, and that part thereof both toward Specific and Macedonia ready to submit it felfe upon any condision, foit might cast off the Spanish yoke. Thinke not, that either that strength or whity is now in Italy, which was when thy great grandfather Mallomat having taken Hydruntum, I brought a great feare, not upon Italy, on, but upon other the Christian nations, also i for by the good suceffe of that war, which all the Christian Princes could hardly withstand, he had undoubtedly taken the city of Rome, and so according to right and reason, againe united the Empire of the East and of the West. as they were before in their antient glory. But he suddenly left the Worlds apt to Heaven, that hee might leane to thee (according to the appointment of the fatall Definites & revolutions of the hequent) this work of absolute perfection. And yet my purpose is not, by putting thee in hope of so great and rare atriumph, to interrupt or hinder thee for turning thy power into the East, against thy old and irreligious enemies, diferning all extremities: for thy nauy shall be sufficient for me, whereof thou shall have no need in thy wars fo far within land; that whileft thou art conquering Afia, Affrica sheethird part of the Worldman in the meanetime be brought under thy subjection also. Where before all other things, Mulcasses it tobe M drinen out of Tunes; a man of infatiable conetoufnesse, unstaicd lust, horrible cruelty, hated both of God and man; who having by trechery flaine eighteene of his brethen or that which worfe is cruelly burnt out their cies, doth fo raigne alone, that he left him neither kinseman nor friend. For being as unthankeful as perfideous, he hath murthered all his fathers friends, who with great travell had preferred him to the

A kingdome, so to make short payment for so great desert. With this beast we must have to do, whom whilest no man loueth, all men wish to perish. The Numedians trouble him with dayly inuasions, whose injuries the infamous coward endureth with fuch shame and reproach, that it should sceme he had rather to suffer them, than revenge them. And yet this effaminate dastard holdeth in chaines many valuant Turks. and acknowledgeth not your imperiall name, whereunto all men on every fide fue for grace : and which is not to be suffered, exceedingly favoureth the Spaniards of Tripolis, to the intent that Agis and Moses. two valiant Turkish captaines, may be driven out of the city. This wilde beast disarmed of his clawes and teeth, we shall easily destroy, if it be but for that we have with vs Roscetes his brother, whom the Numidians wish and long for : him must we ver, if it be but for a shew, so shall the thing we defire, be with out bloudeffected, as soone as we shall but present our sclues before the gates of Tunes. Then shall it be at your B oleafure, to appoint whom you will have to governe the Numidian king dome : it shall be unto me glory enough, when the greatest part of Affricke conquered, shall be peaceably delinered into your hands at your returne with the triumphs of Persia. But by the way as I returne, I assure you repon mine own privat, so to wee thematter, that the Christians shall also have good cause to bewaile their calamities: and if I hap to meet with Auria, he shall have small cause to rejoyce of the mischiefe he hath done : for him alone I challenge to persecute, as my proper and peculiar enemy, both for the remembrance of the harmes we have receined at his hands, and for the desprott I have at his fame who once taken out of the way, the seas shall beopen onely to you and your fleets. And beleeue me, he that shall be able to command the seas, shall easily allo lubdue the king domes by land.

But Solyman, who after the manner of wife Princes, vsed well to consider, and afterwards with ripe judgement to refolue of fuch matters as he had with attentive eare hearkened vntos commending Barbaruffa for his forwardnesse in his service, for that time brake up the counsell. Not long after, a decree was made, according to Abraham the great Baffa's advice, That Barba- Barbaruffa h rulla should be joyned as fourth with the other three chiefe Bassa's of Solymans counsell, and be made Solymans made great Admirall; so that all the Islands, ports, and people all along it the sea coast thorowout Solymans Empire should be at his command, and that it should be lawfull for him to take vp such mariners and soldiers for seruice at sea, as pleased him in what place soeuer. This being folemnly proclaimed, Solyman with his owne hand delivered him a scepter and a sword, willing him by worthy deeds to performe what he had promifed. After which, Ajax and Caf-

D simes the two great Bassa's, with the Captaine of the Ianizaries, brought him with exceeding pompe, from the Court to the Nauy: at which time was carried before him all the tokens of his new obtained honour. And toward the maintenance of that warre at sea, he had delivered vnto him out of Solymans treasures, eight hundred thousand duckets, and eight hundred Iani-

But forasmuch as much it was that he did in the service of Solyman, and more is of him hereafter to be spoken; it shall not be amisse here to present vnto the view of the World the sterne, but lively countenance of this so famous a man (who living kept all the Mediterranian in feare) as it is by Boilardus expressed, together with the Elogium following.

Litterate Hesperia timuere vtrinsque, Lybesque Oppressi dextra subcubuere tua Nunquam te Lypare, Corcyrane diligit, harum Cum sis immeritos depopulatus agros.

The coasts of Italy and Spaine, of thee were fore afraid, And so the Moores did stoupe to thee, by thy right hand dismaid. Lyparos will thee neuer loue, ne yet Corcyra firong; For that thou causelesse did'st to them so great and open wrong.

Barbaruffa sped of that he desired, staied not long after at Constantinople, but departing out of Hellespontus with eighty gallies and certain galliots, shaped his course towards Italy, leaving Amurathes (a fea captaine) with twelve gallies to transport Solyman and his army, ready to fet forward against the Persian, ouer that narrow sea into Asia. Who after behad so done, ouertooke Barbaraffa at Methone, who holding on his course to Affricke, and suddenly He solute the paffing the fireit betwixt Italy and Sicily, brought a great feare vpon both the Countries, M craft of tiely. but passing by the Bay of Hippona along it the coast of the lower Calabria, he set vpon the towne of Saint Lucidim, called in antient time Tempfa: which although it flood you arocke and was reasonable well walled, yet such was the violence of the Turkes assault, that it could not be defended but was taken, with fo much more hurt to the inhabitants, forthat the

A Major of the towne, to keepe the people from flying away, had locke up the gates on the other fide of the city, from the enemy. From thence he with rich spoile and many prisoners went to Citrarium, where he had learned of his prisoners, a fleet of gallies was in building. This rown forfaken of the inhabitants for feare, he tooke without refiftance, ranfacked it, and burnt it where he also fired seuen gallies not yet altogether finished. But after he was come with his fleet as far as the Island Capri, within the fight of Naples, fuch a terror was strucke into the minds of all that dwelt along it that coast, That it was thought, if he had lauded and gone directly to Naples, the Neapolitans would for feare have abandoned the city. But holding on his course, he came to Prochita, which he tooke and rifled : so passing by the port of Careta. (which he might easily have taken) he came to Spelunca, a town in the hithermost part of the B Kingdome of Naples. They of the Towne difmaied with the fudden arrivall of fo great a fleet, veelded the same without refissance. The enemy entring the towne, tooke twelve hundied prisoners. Pelegrinas a chiefe man among & them of Spelunca, was fled into the Castle: him Barbaruffa commanded to yeeld, which if he would prefently do, he promised to let him go free but if he should stand upon his defence, he threatned in short time to make him repent his foolish hardinesse, with the etter destruction both of himselse and the towne. The fearefull gentleman without delay came out of the castle, and sell downe at his seet; who according to his promise gaue him his liberty, and with rare curtesie restored to him his wife, his some, and niece, whom he had taken prisoners who received them with many teares falling from their eies for jov.

The same night also 2000 Turks came from the fleet, through the rough and bushy mountaines, to the city Fundi, ten miles distant from Spelunca, in the vetermost borders of the kingdome of Naples, conducted as was thought by certaine Italians of that country; who a few yeares before taken at sea, and ouerwearied with the heavy burthen of the Turkish slavery. had revolted to the Mahometan religion. But such was the suddennesse of their comming, and their celerity in entring the city, that Iulia Gonzaga the Paragon of Italy, and the chiefe Iulia Gonzaga prise which they sought after, had scarce time to get to horse halfe naked, and so with much a saire Lady difficulty to escape into the mountaines. It is reported that Barbaruffa (which thing he him fed by Barbafelfe afterwards feemed not to deny) moved with the fame of her incomparable beauty, and rulla. wonderfull perfection, defired exceedingly to have taken her as a Present for Solyman. The D citisens were for most part either slaine or taken prisoners by the Turks, who loaded with the spoile of the city, returned agains to the fleet. Another part of Barbaruffues fleet came to Tarracina, which the Turks tooke for laken of the inhabitants, who for feare were all fled into the mountains, except some which for age or sickenesse could not shift for themselves, whom the Turks flew, and spoyled the churches. Barbarussa thus scouring along the coast of Italy, and newes thereof daily brought to the city of Rome, strucke such an exceeding terrour into the The Romans afminds of the citisens, that it was verily thought if he had come a little further to Oftia, they fail of barba. would generally have for faken the city. But he having well performed his promife made to "" a. Solyman for vexing the Christians, and before resolved of a greater matter he had to do; when he had watred at Pontia, passed ouer into Affrick with such celerity, that he was arrived there E before it was thought that he was departed from the coast of Italy. For Barbarussa to deceine Muleasses king of Tunes, and to take him unprovided, had given it out, that he would burn and spoyle the coasts of the Christian countries, especially of Italy, Liguria, and Spain, in reuenge of the harmedone by Auria at Corone and Patras. Which thing Muleaffes the rather believed, vnderstanding his proceedings upon the coast of Italy. The Venetians having also at the same time at great charges prepared a great fleet, did in some part lessen Muleasses feare, That Barbarussa would imploy his forces for Affricke: for then what should the Venetians have necded to haue had so great and chargeable a preparation. But that which about all other things brought him into security, was for that he had by his secret espials certainly learned, that his brother Rescetes was kept at Constantinople, as a prisoner at large, under fafe keeping : which the competitor of his kingdome, to whom his guilty conscience doubted, that both the citilens of Tunes and the Numidians were for most part well affected. This Mulcasses of whom we now speake, and whom afterward we shall by occasion often re-Iii a

F made him to thinke, that Barbaruffa's forces were not prepared against him; for he knew that he could not be impugned, or his state more indangered by any other means, than by producing fourth Emperour of the Turks.

Stutes ffet King member, was lineally descended of the antient Kings of Tunes; who without interruption of G discent, or mixture of forreine bloud, had by the space of 954 yeares mightily ruled the great kingdome of Tunes, from Tripolis to Bugia, almost 800 miles alongst the Mediterranean, and into the Main as far as the mount Atlas: and for the long continuance of their state, and large. nesse of their kingdome, were worthily accounted the most reuerend and mighty amongst the Mahometan Kings of Affricke. His father Mahomethes, when he had with much glory, and more pleasure, reigned 32 yeares, perceiving the end of his life to approch, had purposed to have appointed Maimo his eldest some (whom for his hasty aspiring he then held indurance) to succeed him in his kingdome: but ouercome with the importunity of Lentigessa his wife, a woman of a haughty spirit, who had by reward made a strong saction in the Court for her some Muleasses, he altered his former purpose, and appointed him his successor by whom H (as it was thought) the small remainder of his owne old yeares was shortened; Maino the right heire of the kingdome in prison, presently murthered; seuenteene of his other brethen vnmercifully executed; and three other, Barcha, Beleth, and Saeth, with more than barbarous cruelty with a hot yron of their fight deprived; only Roseres the second brother, and Abde. melech, escaping the hands of their vnnatural brother, fled to Morbabitus a great Prince amongst the Numidians : whither also their brothers malice persecuted them, seeking by many pra-Rifes to have taken them away, and at last for a great summe of mony to have had them deliuered into his hands. Which mony the Numidian received, but suffered the distressed Princes, as if they had escaped against his will, to fly further to another Numidian Prince a friend of his, called Benisefes : where Muleasfes by like practifes as before, fought to have destroyed 1 them, or to haue got them into his owne power. Thus chased by their brothers endlesse malice, from Prince to Prince, and from place to place, they for their more fafety fled at last to the city of Biscaris, sarre into the maine land : where Abdemelech as one weary of the World gaue ouer all, and betooke himfelfe to a folitary life, and became a melancholy Mahometan Monke. But Resease curteously entertained by Abdalla Prince of that city, found such favour in his fight, that he gaue him his daughter in marriage, and long time honourably maintained him as his sonne in law, with such carefulnesse, that for seare of Muleasses practises, hewas feldome permitted to eat any other meat but such as the Prince or his wife had before tasted of. Mulcaffes thus reigning and raging, and yet not contented with the death of fo many of his brethren, proceeded further, and murthered divers of their children also. He caused also K Their cantuale the Manifet and Mc suar, men of greatest authority in all the kingdom, his fathers graue counfellors, and his chiefe friends, by whose meanes especially he had aspired vnto the kingdome, to be cruelly tortured to death, fearing their greatnesse; or rather as some thought grieuing to see them live, to whom he was so much beholden, and therefore rewarded them with such sharpe payment. And by the instigation of Lemigesia his mother, caused divers of his fathers other wives and concubines to be shamefully murthered, enueighing oftentimes against his father, that as an effeeminat Prince, had for his pleasure maintained 200 wives and concubins in his houses of delight, by whom he had begot so many sons competitors of the kingdome, that he had left him (as he faid) a laborious and endlesse piece of worke, to destroy so great a referen rifub brood. Reserves aided by his father in law and the other Numidian Princes, to whom the L against bis broe name of Muleasses, both for his cruelty against his owne bloud, and injurious dealing against his neighbors was become odious; passing ouer the river Bragada, with a great army, neere vnto Tunes met with Muleasses his army, conducted by Dorax a valiant captaine, brother to Lonigesta: where in a sharpe conflict he ouerthrew his brothers Army, and enforced Doran with them that were escaped out of the battell, for safegard of their lines to fly into Tunes. Rejectes pursuing the victory, came and presented his army before the gates of the city, in hope that the citifens (whom he knew for the most part to hate the vsurping tyrant) would vpon the fight of him, in right their King, with fo great an army, raife fome tumult in the city, and let him in. There he lay by the space of twenty daies, still expecting some innovation; in which time the more to alienate the minds of the people from Muleaffes, and to shew how vnable he M was to protect them, he burnt and destroied all the Oliue and fruit trees, which grew most plentifully and pleasantly all alongst the country, from the ruines of old Carthage, to the walls of Tunes : which was vnto the citifens, whose greatest possessions lay there, a most hear uy and lamentable spectacle. But Mulcasses had so attempered their minds with faire speeches, and large promises of recompensing every man to the full; for all such harme as they should fustaine for his brothers fury in the country : and beside that, had the city in such strong posfession by reason of his soldiers, that the citisens either would not or could not revolt to Rosetes. The Numidian Princes weary of that long and vaine expectation, according to the leuity Referent forfact of that nation, accounting it no shame after victory once gotten to depart, began one after midian triner, another to shrinke away to their owne dwellings, persuading Rosetes also to provide for him. he systation are selse whilst he had time, and to attend his better fortune. Wherefore he searing to be betrated bings. by the Numidians, or circumvented by his cruell brother, fled to Barbaruffa, then reigning at Algiers in great glory, where he was honourably entertained; and there remained vntill such time as by his persuasion he went with him as is aforesaid to Constantinople, to craue helpe of Solyman, by whom he was detained in fafe custody: although it was in policy given out by Barbarussa, that he was in the fleet, and that he should by Solymans power be restored to his fathers kingdome at Tunes.

This was the state of the kingdom of Tunes, at such time as Barbarussa with Solymans great Barbarussa lanfleet, contrary to all mens expectation, fuddenly departing from the coast of Italy, landed in deth at Biferia. Affricke at Biserta, a samous port of the kingdome of Tunes. They of Bisertaweary of the gouernment of Muleaffes, and of themselves desirous of change, as soone as they heard the name of Rolcetes, forthwith draue out their Gouernor, and received the Turks into the towne. Diferen relded, For Barbarussa had before sent certaine of Roseres his familiar friends ashore, which bare the people in hand, that he was in the fleet, but not able to come yet on shore, for that he was (as

C they faid) fea- fick, and troubled with an ague, Biferta thus poffeffed by Barbaruffa, he prefently departed thence, and failing by Vtica, thirty miles distant from Biserta, and so keeping along st the coast, and passing the promontory of Carthage, came before Guletta, a strong castle Barbarassim co. within the Bay of Tunes, fo placed vpon a streit, that it commandeth all the passage by sea methic Guleria unto the city Tunes. Before this castle, Barbarussa in token of friendship, discharged all his great ordnance, which they of the castle answered with like that being required to deliuer it vpto Roscetes, they said it should be alwaics at his command that ruled in the city of Tunes. The newes of Roscetes his supposed comming, slying swiftly by land from Biserta to Tunes, and the great fleet once discouered, set all the city on an vprore; for the citisens were in great expectation of their new King, both for the loue of Rosertes, who had alwaies shewed himselfe D to be of a mild and bountifull nature; and also for the hatred of Muleaffes, whose tyrannous and couctous gouernment they thought they had too long indured. Neither was he ignorant what report ran of himselse, and how he had lost the hearts of his subjects; which was cuidently to be seene in the eies and countenances of the chiefe men of the city. And that which more increased their hatred, was for that he had not according to his promise to them in time of his distresse, made them any recompence for their goodly houses and Olive gardens, defiroied in the country by Roscetes in the former wars: wherefore at such time as he came now out of the castle, and in the greatest assembly of his people, began to persuade them to play they knew he was neuer able to performe, they all departed and left him alone: yea, some of E them under the colour of friend thip, and amongst them Abdahar, then Mesuar (which was chiefe officer next vnto the King) persuaded him to giue place to his hard fortune, and sorthwith to fly, for by chance it was at the same instance in energy mans mouth, that the Turks were Muleaffer flets euen at hand: which thing caused Muleasses, for saken of his subjects, of himselfe searefull, and one of sunes, worthily doubting to be betraied, to fly in such hast out of the city, that he left behind him both his treasure and jewels, which afterwards came into the hands of his enemies. The first that revolted was Abezes, a man of great authority; and Fetuches, captain of the castle; both renegate Spaniards. Fetuches presently after the slight of Muleasses, brought out Roscetes wife and children, whom Muleaffes had long time kept in prison, & to welcom their father, placed them in the Kings royall feat. Abezes also forthwith aduertised Barbarussa of Muleasses departure, F and with what longing the people expected their defired King, withing him without delay to repaire vnto the city; and for a present sent him a goodly Barbarian horse, richly furnished, and divers others for his other chiefe captains. Hereupon Barbaru fawithout longer stay set forward with fine thousand Turks, which he had already landed, and comming to the city, was Bubaruffe es-

the men, and to continue constant in their obedience, promising vnto them such reward as of the citifens joifully receited. But after long looking, when they could no where descry Rof- tertinio Ton;

cetes their supposed king, and heard nothing but the name of Solyman and Barbarussa, doubled G and redoubled by the Turks in their military acclamations, as they marched thorow the city towards the castle; they began to distrust as the truth was, that in stead of their new King whom they so much defired, they had received the Turkish government, which they vtterly deterled. Which suspition once confirmed by certaine of Roscetes friends (whom Barbarussa had brought with him of purpose to delude the people) who grieued to see the ruine of their native country, spared not for feare of the present danger to tel sheir friends and acquaintance as they went, That they did in vaine looke for Rescetes, whom they had left in bonds at Condeceased of the people were changed, how fuddenly the minds of the people were changed, how on, the against speedily they ran to their weapons, and how furiously they affailed the Turks, now fearing no fuch matter, and were not as yet all got into the castle. The chiefe leader of the citifens in this H tumult, was Abdahar the Mesuar, who but a little before vpon the comming of the Turks, by augmenting the danger, and the vnfaithfulnesse of his subjects, had persuaded Muleasses to fly; but now perceiuing himselfe deceiued of his expectation for the comming of Resease, and repenting of that he had done, fought by all meanes to drive out the Turks, and to recall Male. affes. And the more to animate the people, as he stood on high, from whence he might best be heard, he cried vnto them with a loud voice:

We are most villanously betraied (worthy Citisens) for Roscetes, whom we expected for our lawfull King lamenieth his misery inchains, in prison at Constantinople and we except we presently play the men, and valiantly fight for our liberty, shall for ever serve as slaves to these forreine and mercileste pyrats. The present danger of our estate telleth vs, that we must presently and without delay take the occasion of. I fered. Wherefore let all m n that meane not to serve as slaves, and to be bought and fold as beasts, take up armes against the faithlesse Turks. I my selfe will be your leader : let ws therefore all with one consent, with heart and hand revenue this shamefull trechery, defend our country and liberty with the antiem ho nour and liberty of the Numidians.

There was now no time to stay, every man had betaken himselfe to his weapons; Maleasses was againe fent for, who yet staied in the suburbs, expecting what should happen; many of the Turks were flain before they were aware, or feared any thing; all the city was filled with outcries and clattering of weapons; the number of the citifens was fuch, as mighteafily haucexpulsed the Turks, had they been but reasonably armed, or well conducted, which in a matter so fudden, and with men altogether ignorant of feruice, was not possible. Yet they, armed with & fury, and encouraged with the multitude of themselves, swarmed vp as thicke as was possible, one of the bulwarks of the castle, which they knew was easiest to be gained, where the Turks had fet up one of their enfignes; and with the multitude of their darts and arrowes so ouerwhelmed the Turks, that they were glad to forfake the place, and to retire further into thecafile to a place of more strength: from whence and all alongst the curtaine of the wall, they without intermission discharged their great artillery and small shot amongst the thickest of the naked Moores, making of them a wonderfull flaughter. Barbaruffa although he was a man of an inuincible courage and great experience, all his life time well acquainted with desperat dangers (the dreadfull steps of aspiring minds) yet surprised with the suddennesse of the asfault, thut up in a place whereof he yet knew not the ftrength, and not prouided of victuall for L three daies, was with the due consideration of these difficulties, not a little troubled: which his care was by the disordered fury of his enemies, and knowne valour of his owne souldiers greatly diminished; especially when he saw his owne men still fighting, as men sull of hope and courage, and the Moores as men halfe difmaied with the wounds and flaughter of their friends, ready to retire. Howbeit by the comming in of Muleaffes and Dorax, the affault twice before given ouer, was againe at both times renewed, with no lesse desperat sury than at the first, and the Turks hardly charged. In this dangerous assault Halis of Maliga, a renegat Spaniard, but a most expert souldier, turning himselfe to Barbarussa, said,

If thou wilt fanethine honour, and hold this fort, we must fally out upon this enemy; which having nener seene a fet bassell, but only acquainted with light skirmishes, will not be able to endure our charge at M hand but fiall in a moment know the price of their foolish hardinesse; who as braine sicke men could neither indure the government of their cruell King, ne yet thankefully receive the authors of their deliverance and liberty.

This motion of the Spaniard, confirmed by the generall approbation of the chiefest cap-

taines, Barbaruffa commanded Halis the author of that counsell, with certaine other captaines and their companions, at one instant to fally out at two ports of the castle: which they so resolutely performed, that in short time a wonderfull number of the naked Moores lay dead voon

Abdahar the Mesuar himselfe, was there shot thorow with a bullet and slaine: whereupon the affault was quite given ouer, the Moores retiring by companies backe into the city, and the Turks still pursuing them : where in the streets for certaine houres, was fought a most cruell and bloudy battell. At last the citizens ouercome, forsooke the open streets, and betooke The chistent of them to the refuge of their houses; not so carefull of their king, as of themselues, their wites, Tuner discomf. and children. And Hals with the rest, wearied with the slaughter of his enemies, and ouercome Turks. with labour, heat, and thirst, returned with victory vnto the castle. It is reported that there was aboue three thousand of the citizens slaine that day, and thrice as many hurt. Muleasses Muleasses sliente thus discouraged, & veterly despairing to recouer the city, hardly escaped his enemies hands. by the good helpe of his vncle Dorax, with whom he fled ouer the river Bagrada, and came in fafety to Constantina (called of old time Cyrtha) the antient feat of the Numidian Kings. but then a part of Derax his dominion, where he was honourably maintained and protected untill the comming of Charles the Emperour into Affricke. The night enfuing this battell.

and the flight of their King, was restlesse both to the citisens and the Turks, each of them for feare of other standing vpon their strongest guard.

The next day, the citizens discouraged with the losse of so many of their kinsemen and The citisens of C friends, and having no King now for whom they should fight, craued pardon of Barbar off a for themselvers to their rash attempt, excusing it by the name of loyalty to their antient Kings ; offering to sub-Barbaruss. mit themselues vnto him with all saithfulnesse. Which their offer he willingly accepted, knowing that he was not able to keepe that place with his fouldiers three daies, for lacke of victuall: so that all his hope and victory gotten, might easily be ouerthrowne and brought to nought, if the citisens moued either with desperation or desire of revenge, should joyne with the other Numidian Princes, and besiege him in the castle. Whereupon a generall peace was granted, and by solemne oath on both sides confirmed, whereby the citisens expresly bound themselves to the obedience of Solyman, and to Barbarussa as his lieutenant. All things thus set in order in the city of Tunes, and new magistrates and officers by him made, he laboured by

D all means to win vnto him the Numidian Princes: which when he had easily brought to passe by gifts and rewards with those needy Princes, of themselves prone enough vpon light occasions to make or break the bonds of friend ship, he sent Asan aga an eunuch, and Halis the Spaniard, with the Ianizaries, and certaine pieces of great ordnance, to take in the other cities of the kingdome of Tunes which they in thort time performed, being in all places peaceably receiued, only the city of Caruenna held out a while, yet afterwards for feare of further harme received the Turks garrison. But to leave Barbarussa King of Algiers and Solymans great Admirall, thus possessed of the kingdome of Tunes; and Muleasses in exile at Constantina, vntill he be again restored vnto his kingdome by Charles the Emperor, as shall be hereaster declared: let vs againe returne to the wars at the felfe same time vndertaken by Solyman in person him-E selse in Persia, persuaded thereunto (as we have before said) by Abraham the great Bassa. Of whom a few words, that they which thall hereafter live, may in him as in others, fee in what flippery place they stand, and what small assurance they have, which for saking God, run headlong after these worldly vanities; and swelling with the fauours of great Princes, are in a moment when they least feare any such fall, suddenly ouerthrowne, and become the miscrable spectacles of of mans fragility, in the height of their supposed blisse.

This great Bassa called of the Turks Ibrahim, of vs Abraham, was borne in a poore country The description village neere vnto Perga, a towne in that part of Epirus which was called Buthrotia: who in of Abraham ibe his childhood was raten from his Christian parents by such as by authority did take yo the Balla his childhood was taken from his Christian parents, by such as by authority did take vp the tribute children of the Christians for the Turkish Emperour. A tribute of all tributes most grieuous. He was of countenance amiable, of feature comely, active of body, wel spoken, pleafantly conceited, and sharpe of wit; so that he in shorter time than was thought possible, to the admiration of many, learned both to speake and write the Arabian tongue, and other languages vsed in the Turks court, and could skilfully play vpon fundry kindes of instruments. And being yet a boy, served Scanderbassa, a man of great authority and power, in the time of

For it is not so much to baue destroied the Mamalukes (by condition slaves) and the proud Sultans of Agypt and Syria, as to have subdued the Perfians, famous in antient time for their martiall proweffe, who fo oftentimes vanquished by Alexander of Alacedan, game wine him the name of Great. Selyman prickt forward with many such discourses, daily founded in his cares by the Baffa, began to yeeld to his persuasion. Whereof Abraham himselfe greatly rejoyeed for it was thought by many, that hee did neuer in heart renounce the Christian religion, but I was onely in outward fnew a Turke, and in heart a Christian. Which was the rather conje-Qured, for that he maruellously fauoured and protected the Christian Merchants, furthered by all meanes the leagues of the Christian Princes with Solyman, and laboured alwaies to turne his forces from them vpon the Persians. And the more to whet him forward, the Basia had cunningly infinuated into his acquaintance one Malearbe of Damalerra man in that sime a famous in Constantinople, for the opinion the people had generally conceiued of his polinesse and profound knowledge in the secret causes of things, and the att of Magicke, ving him as a Propher to fill the ambitious minde of Selyman, with affured hope of profestous fucceffe: which thing the hypocriticall wifard, after the manner of fuch decement, like performed, prophelying vnto him all happinesse in so religious a war, and so much (as he said) pleafing God. This the Baffaes purpose was much furthered also by Vienna noble and valiant Persian, who having married the great Persian King Tamas his sister, was revolted from him to Solyman, fearing to be called to account for the extortion wilerswith he had grienously of the Spring to inuade the Persian King. Which thing the Bassa gladly took vpon him, and into Spria, comming into Syria, wintred with his army at Aleppo: whither Barbaraffa came vnto him for his letters of credence to Solyman, as is before declared. The Spring now approching, Abraham fent Plemes the fugitive Persian Prince before him with the light horsmen, the fore-runners of his army, into Melopotamia as his guid, because the country was to him best known; following not far after himself with his Army. And marching still forward in that manner, came at length without refistance vnto the famous city of Tauris in Armenia the greater, called in antient time Echathana, as is probably by fome conjectured; a great and rich City, but vowalled, and of no strength: where the Persian Kings for the pleasantnesse of the place and D freshnes of the air vsed commonly to be resiant in the heat of the year. From whence Tamas the Persian King was as then absent, busied in wars against Kezien. Bassa a Prince of the Corasine Hyrcanians. So that the Citisens of Tauris destitute of all helpe, yeelded themselves The city of and the City unto the Bassa at his first comming. Which thing the wary Bassa well perceiving, for more assurance, by speedy Currours aduertised Solyman of the taking of Tauris, and of the enemies purpose; requesting him with all speed to repair with his army to Tauris. Solyman was then come far on his way with a very great Army, not by the way of Ancyra, Schastia, Amasia, the bor-E ders of Trapezond, and so ouer Euphrates at Arsenga, into Armenia, as his father Selymus had done before him, because that way was thought longer and more troublesome : but quite anotherway, on the right hand from Nyce in Bithynia, to Iconium, and by Cafaria to Malathia, where is the notable passage over the river Euphrates, bursting out by the vallies of the mountaine Antitaurus, from whence the plaines of Mesopotamia (then part of the Persian Kingdome, begin to open themselves: through which countrey Solyman marched peaceably with his army, paying the poore countrey people for what soeuer he tooke; and so in source and fiftie dayes march, came from Nice in Bithynia, to the city of Coim in Armenia the greater, which is supposed to be built in the ruines of the famous and antient city Artaxata. But hearing such newes as is aforesaid from the Bassa, he doubled his march, and so in short

victuall, and falling into divers diseases; as it commonly chancetheto populous atmies in G frange countries, where the change of the aire, with the ineuitable necessity alwaies are ding upon a great army, most times causeth grieuous and contagious diseases. Wherefore Tamas to thun the comming of Solyman, retyred further off into Sultania, about fin daics jour. solyman felicas. ny from Tauris. Whereof Solyman having knowledge, departed from that sich City without the Tames the doing any harme therein following after Tames into Sultania, to joyne battell with him if he could possible: leaving behind him for hast, a great part, of his carriages and baggage, with fine hundred Janizaries, and three of his Sanzacks with their companies. The city of Sultania was in antient time one of the royall feats of the Persian Kings, but ruinated by the Scythian Tamerlane, retained no shew of the antient majesty, but only in the churches by him spared, Necrevato this city Solyman lay incamped many daies, expecting that the Perlian King (in H reuenge of the injuries to him done, and for the fafegard of his honour) should at length come out of the mountaines, and shew himselse in plaine field, and give him battell. Which was a thing fo far from Tamas his resolution, vpon the due comparing of his owne strength with his enemies, that he retired in such fort, that Solyman could by no means learne what was become of him, or which way to follow him.

The country neere vnto the city of Sultania, wherein Solyman lay incamped at large, is on cuery side inuironed with hugy mountains, whose tops are to be seenea far off, alwaics couered with deepe frow : these mountaines were in antient time called Nyphates, Caspius, Coathras, and Zagrus, taking their beginning no doubt from Caucafus the father of mountaines, and joyning one to another, some one way, some another, do divide most large and wide countries. Whilest Solyman in those wast and plaine fields most fit to fight a battell in, expected the comming of Tamas, such a horrible and cruell tempest (as the like whereof the Persians had neuer before seene at that time of the yeare) sell downe from those mountains (which was so much the more strange, for that it fell in the begining of September) with such abundance of raine, which frose so eagerly as it fell, that it seemed the depth of Winter had even thenof a fudden been come in : for fuch was the rage of the bluffring winds, fixining with themselves as if it had bin for victory, that they swept the snow from off the tops of those high mountains, and cast io into the plaines in such abundance, that the Turks lay as menburied alive in the deep flow, most part of their tents being ouerthrowne and beaten downe to the ground with the violence of the tempest, and weight of the snow; wherein a wonderfull number of K ficke fouldiers and others of the baser sort which followed the campe, perished; and many others were sore benummed, some their hands, some their feet, that they lost they eof them for euer: most part of their beasts which they vsed for carriage, but especially their camels, were frozen to death. Yea, Solyman himselfe was in great danger to haue beene ouerwhelmed in his Tent, all the Tents round about him being ouerthrowne with the violence of the tempest. Neither was there any remedy to be found for fo great mischiefes, by reason of the bellish darkenesse of that tempessuous night, most of their fires being put out by the extremity of the storme : which did not a little terrifie the superstitious Turks, as a thing accounted of them ominous. And that which troubled them no leffe than the miferies of the tempelt, was the feare of the enemy, whose sudden comming they deadly feared syntill that after so tedious a night the fun breaking out the next morning, with his cheerefull beams revived many, before ready to give vp the ghoft for cold, and gave comfort vnto them all in generall, by difconering the open fields elecre of their feared enemies. It was a dreadfull thing to have seene what milery that one night had brought into the Turks camp: the ground lay almost covered with bodies of the dead; and many lived but fo, as that they accounted the dead more happy than themselues. Many of the Turks vainly thought, that horrible tempest was brought upon them by the charmes and inchantments of the Persian Magicians: whereas it was undoubtedly by the hand of him who bringeth the proud deuices of Princes to nought.

Solyman troubled as well with the strangenesse of the accident, as the losse he had receiued, after he had a little refreshed his discouraged souldiers, rose with his army, and tooke M his way on the left hand into Assyria: Vlemas the Persian persuading him thereunto for many causes, but especially by putting him in hope of the taking of Babylon; for that Mahometts a friend of his was Gouernour thereof. But he when the matter came to proofe was not to be woon either by promise or reward, to betray the City. Wherefore Solyman resolued to take

A it by forcemeither did his fortune fail him therin : for as foone as Mahametes understood that viends was at hand with the fore-runners of the Turkes army, and that Solyman with all his power was comming after, (who as he thought would never have come fo far) hee not prouided to withstand so mighty an enemy, and not beloued of the Citisens, sled out of the City. Solvman comming, in thort time after was received without refusance. The City of Baby. Babylon, with lon, commonly called Bagdat, rise out of the ruins of the old city of Babylon, so much spoken the countries of in holy Writ: from whence it is not far diffant, standing upon the river of Tygris, which of proposant not far beneath falleth into the river Euphrates. In this famous city is the feat of the great yeelded to self-Calyph, the chief Mahometan Priest, whom all the Mahometan Princes have in great reverence, and bath an old prerogative in the choice and confirmation of the Kings of Affvria B and the Sultans of Egypt: of which Calyph Solyman according to the old superstitious maner received at his hands the Enfignes and Ornaments of the Affyrian Kings, and with great bounty won the hearts of the people, and therupon resolued to spend that Winter there, billiting his army in divers places of that fertil country. The other cities of Assyria and Mefonotamia also, namely Caraemida, Meredinum, Orfa, and Asancesa; hearing that Solyman had without resistance taken Babylon, yeelded themselues and received his Garrisons. Yea the fame therof was fo great, that Embassadors came to him as far as Ormus (a city in the mouth of Euphrates where it falleth into the Persian gulf, famous for the great traffique out of India thither) fuing vnto him for peace. Thus the antient city of Babylon, with the great countries of Affyria and Mesopotamia, somtimes famous kingdoms of themselves, and lately part of C the Persian kingdom, fel into the hands of the Turks, and became provinces vnto the Turkish Empire in the yeare 1534. Where Solyman after he had spent that Winter in great joy and triumph, according to the manner of the Turkish government, placed a great Commaunder (which they by a proud name call the Beglerbeg, which is as much as to fay, Lord of Lords) and under him divers others for the government of these Countries by parts, which they call Sanzacks, who are euer at the command of the Beglerbeg. Whilft he thus wintred at Babylon, he caused A shender Zelibi (which is to say, Alexander the Noble) his great Treasurer for the Wars, to be hanged, for that he had unfaithfully dealt in his office; and confifcated all his goods.

Tamas hearing that Solyman was come to Babylon, returned to Tauris: Of whose speedy Tamas comes D comming the lanizaries and other captains there left by Solyman understanding, fled in halte out of the City, leaving all fuch things as were committed to their cultody, for a prey to the

Solymans army being mightily increased by the comming of the great Bassa of Caire vnto 1535. him, with the Sanzacks of Alexandria, Iudæa, Syria, and Comagena; by the perfusion of A. brahamand Vlemas, the Spring now wel come on, departed from Babylon again toward Tauris, with purpose either to draw Tamas to battel, or els to his eternal infamy, to sacke that his Regal city before his face. But Tamas advertised of his comming, and knowing himselfe too Tamas bearing weake to give him battel, for fook the City, and fled into the mountains of Hyrcania, destroying all the Country before him as he went, and carrying away the inhabitants, leaving no- Tauris, find E thing to relieve the Turks fouldiers, if they should pursue him. Solyman understanding that into Hyrcania, Tamas was again fled fent Flemas with all the choice horfmen of his Army to ouertake him if it were possible, and to fight with him. But when he had followed him two or three dayes journy, and still found the Country desolate as he went, yeelding neither forrage for his horfes, nor relief for his men, and faw no hope to ouertake the King, he began as a prouident Generall to forecast the extremities like to befall in his return thorow those desolat Countries with the Enemy at his heels; and therupon in time retyred backe again to Solyman, declaring voto him what had happened. Who fretting in his mind, that the Persian King was not to be drawn to battell, marched forthwith to Tauris, entering it without resistance, the Citisens submitting themselves vnto him : whose lives spared, he gave that rich city as a prey vnto his foldiers, who left neither house nor corner therof vnransacked, abusing the poor citisens with all maner of infolencie; every common fouldier without controlment fitting himfelfe with what focuer best pleased his greedy desire or filthy lust. Tamas had in this city a most stately and royal palace; so had also most part of the nobility their sumptuous & rich houses, which Solymen renby the commandment of Solyman were all rased down to the ground, and the greatest part of factorance.

the best citisens and beautiful personages of all forts and conditions, at his departure thence G carried away captines. Solyman contenting himself to have don the the Persian King this dif. grace, in spoiling this his rich and royal City, returned againe toward Mesopotamia, destroy. ing all the countries as he went, killing the very beafts and cattell, therby the more to impo. uerish the Persians, wishing to leave nothing to them but penury and miserie. He was scarce past Coim and the Calderan fields (famous for his fathers victory against Hymael) but that certain troups of Persian horsemen were in the tail of his Army, and had taken away someof his baggage, and flain divers of the fick and stragling souldiers, and with their often skimi. thes did not a little trouble his whole army. Besides that, it was notifed thorowall his camp, That Tamas himself was comming after him with a greater power of horsemen, taken up in Iberia, Albania, Parthia, Media, and Armenia, and would be at their backes before they could H get out of Armenia. For which cause he appointed the two great Bassa's of Cair and Syria (for fo they were called) and Vienas the Persian, with 18000 good fouldiers to follow him in the rereward of his Army, to receive and represse the sudden assaults of the Persians, if need should require; and so stil kept on his march vntil he was come to Amida, now called Caracmida, an antient city of Mesopotamia. In the mean time Tamas the Persian King was returned to Tauris with a mighty Army, in hope there suddenly to have surprised his enemy, surcharged with the pleasures of so rich a city : but finding him gon, and beholding the milerable desolation and spoil he had made in the city; mooued with indignation, hee resoluted to pursue him whithersoeuer he was gon, and was now on his way as far as Coim. Wherevolderflanding that Solyman was gon fo far before that he was hardly to bee ouertaken, and finding the noble gentlemen in his army vnwilling in their heavy armor to vndertake fuch a purfuit, as could not be performed without the wonderful toil of themselues, and most assured losse of their goodly horses; alledging, that they were prouided to fight a battel, and not to travel so long a journy (all which Tamas now that his choler was ouer, knew to stand with good reason) he changed his former determination, thinking it best there to stay, and not to follow the purfuit of his enemies any further : vntil that Delimenthes one of his noblemen (alwaies more forward than the rest) offered with fine thousand chosen horsemen to ouertake some part of the Turks army, and to do on them some good service. Which his offer Tamas gladly accepted, commending him greatly for the same, promising him most honorable reward, and so in hast fent him away.

Delimenthes

He forthwith taking the wel known and neerest way, vsed such expedition, that hee was in hope to ouertake the rereward of the Turks Army (marching not far now before him) about fact the Turke, the foot of the mountain Taurus, as indeed it felout at a place called Bethlis. This Bethlis is a famous town in the confines of the Perfian kingdome where it bordereth voon Melopotamia, standing in a pleasant vally, by which runneth a little river falling out of the mountaine Antitaurus; and had a castle kept with a garrison of Persians. In this vally the two Bassa's of Cair and Syria (conducted by Victors) thinking they had now bin past all danger of the enemies pursuit, staid with the rereward of the army to refresh their wearied souldiers, vponcertain knowledge that Solyman with the rest of his Army was already come in safety to Amida in Mesopotamia. And thersore lay as men secure, without any suspition of the comming of L the Persians, whom they had not so much as heard any thing of in long time before. But Delimenthes vsing most faithfull and diligent espials of that country people, by that time hee was come within one daies journy of Bethlis, understood certainly where the Turks lay, weary of their long trauell, as men without fear, keeping little or no watch in their camp. Wherepon he determined in the dead time of the night following to affail them in their Campe; and by fecret messengers gaue knowledge both of his comming, and of this his purpose, to the Captain of the castile of Bethlis; requesting him at an appointed hours vpon signe given, readily to fally out with his garrison upon that side of the Turks Camp which was towards the Cafile. Which his venturous designement was so furthered both by the darkenes of the night, and the aboundance of rain which fell at the same time, as if it had been wished for, that hee M, was got with all his resolute sollowers within the Turks Campe, before they were aware of his comming. Where the inraged Persian souldiers, as Wolues amongst Sheepe, did such Turkicamp by speedy execution amongst the sleepy Turkes, that the two great Bassa's, with Vlemas, had much ado to get to horse and saue themselues by flight. And such was the fury of the PerA figns, and the greatnes of the fudden four increased by the darknes of the night, that the Turks not knowing which way to turn them folues, or what to do, were flain by thou fands. fome fleeping, fome half waking, fome making themselues ready to fight, and some to fly sew of all that great army escaped the sword of the Persians. Of the fine great Sanzacks that were in the anny, three were flain, and one taken. Eight hundred Ianizaties feeing themselues for saken of their chieftains, laid down their harquebufes and other weapons, and recided themselves voon Delimenthes his word. The fierce mountain people alfo, who formerly had suffered great injuries of the Turks, after the death of Aladeillas their King, had now loyned themselves to the Persians, and notably revenged their wrongs to whose share all the baggage of the Turks camp fel for a prey. It might then wel have bin faid of the Turks, which the Poet speaketh of B the night wherin Troy was fackt : 1841 Quis cladem illim nott is qui finera fando Desphicet Propagation (300) 1. That nights flaughter was fo great, that it is of the Turks vntill this day accounted among ft their greatest losses and the victory so welcomoto the Persians, that in memorial therof they kent that day (being the thirteenth of O ctober) as one of their folemne holy-daies for many wears after. Delimenthes returning all bloudy with the flaughter of the Turks, and loded with their spoils was of Tamas toyfully received, and thonorably rewarded. This cuerthrow reported to Solyman by the two great Basia's and Vienas, as men that had Solyman dif-

hardly escaped the shipwracke, so daunted his proud conceits, that he resolved in himselfe to C return home, and no further to profecute that vinfortunat war, the cuill cuent wherof his mother (as he faid) had more truly profaged than had the cold Prophet Malearbe : but fecretly in mind displeased with abraham the great Bassa, by whose persuasion hee had taken in hand that dangerous expedition. By the way as he went he was met at Iconium by Barbarulla & Sinan Baffa, fyrnamed the lew, a man for his skil at fea in reputation next to Barbaruffa. Thefe two great personages lately come from Algiers to Constantinople with the remainder of his fleet, met him fo far by land, to thew their joyfulnes for the conquest he had made of Mesopotamia and Affyria: 84 to excuse them for the losse of the kingdom of Tunes, which won by Barbaruffa in the beginning of the Persian war, was before the end therof again wrung out of his hands by Charles the emperor, and restored to Muleasses, as shall be herafter declared. They D with great humility declared unto him the whole proces of that VV ar, and with what successe they had indured the force of Charles the Emperor himself in person; shewing him plainely, that there wanted neither valor in the foldiers, nor direction in them the Commanders, but only fortune, which as it mightily reigneth in all mens actions, so especially in matters of war. Solyman gratiously accepted of their excuse, and curteously took them up prostrat at his feet, commending them for their valor in their euil haps, in a plot so well by them laid, more than he did thevictory of others, got by good fortune, not grounded upon any good reason: willing them to be of good cheer, laying that he would in short time find occasion for them to recompence that different, and again to shew their approued valor. After long travell hee came to the streit of Bosphorus, where Abraham the Bassa going before him, had in token of E triumph caused the shore all along the place where he should go aboord the gally prouided for his transportation, to be covered with Persian silk for him to tread vpon: from whence hee passed with much triumph ouer to his palace at Constantinople.

Enny, the fatal and cruel companion of Princes immoderat fauours, had with her prying Abraham the eies suddenly discouered in court Solymans changed countenance vpon the great Bassa, & bediscourse Bassa, & began to shew her ghastly face. They which before were most ready to do him all honour possis. solymen. ble, yea and to have laid their hands winder his feet, fought now by all fecret means to work his diffrace and confusion. But of all others, the two great ladies, Solymans mother and the faire Rexolana, ceased not by daily complaints to insence Solyman against him: the mother, for that he had by tris persuasions, contrary to her mind and her supersticious observations, drawn her F fon into the dangers of the Persian war. And Roxolana, for that he most honoured and sought the preferment of Mustapha; Solymans eldest son by another woman; wheras the about al things laboured by all subtill means to prefer Bajazet her own son vnto the empire after the death of Solyman his father. Which her designement the perceived to be much crossed by the great credit which the Baffa had with her Solyman, and therfore did what the might both to bring him out of favor, and to work his destruction. But that which most impaired his credit with C Solyman, was the common report railed of him by his enemies, that he being in house Chris flian, did in all things favor the Christians (a thing most edious, among the Turks,; and had for that cause crastily persuaded Solyman to take in hand the voscortunat Betsian was And the which most increased the suspicion, was, that he about that time had caused one Mark Michael a Venetian merchant (who had not without the sufpition of some, of teatings, come was him with letters and secret messages whilst he lay at Babylon) to be taken in the night and out. dered in Constantinople, and cast into the sea, because heishould not discouer any thing the might be hurtful vnto him. Abraham thus brought in difgrage with Selyman, was fafeer the maner of the Turkish tyrannie) bid to a solemn supper in the Court about the 14 of Marchaner which time he was neuer more seen. It is reported, That after supper selyman fel inio agrest H rage with him, charging him bitterly, That he had mifgouerned the flare, inverted his Tres. fures to his own prinat, and as a traitor had fecret intelligence with the Christian princeshis enemies: for proofe whereof Selyman With sterne countenance shewed him his owne letters. which had by chance bin intercepted , oftentimes asking him in furious maner, if hee knew not that hand, if he knew not that feal. All which the Baffa, lying profitat at his feet, humbly confessed, & with many tears craued of him pardon. But his hard heart was not by any tears to be mooued: for the same night as he was slumbring upon a palar in the Court, our come with heavines, an eunuch cut his throat with a crooked knife, which Solyman for the purpole Abraham Baffa had delivered vnto him with his own hand. He was murchered floeping, because softman had court by Saly. in former time of his favor fworn vnto him, that he would never killim whill helined. By 1 manicomman- which oath the great Mahometan priest said he was not so bound but that he might kill him fleeping, forafmuch as men by fleep deprived of fence, are for shattime not to be semigrated as living, but as dead; mans life (as he faid) confifting altogether in lively actions. It is to ported. That after Solyman had looked upon the dead body, and bitterly curfed the lame, hee caused a great weight to beeried unto it, and so cast it into the see. His treasure and goods (which were almost infinite) were the next day all seifed upon for the Emperous, and a small portion therof appointed for his poore wife to live your. His death was no fooner knowne, but that the vulgar people deuised of him infamous songs, and slanderous reports, as a Traitor most justly condemned: and in further despight, with mire and stones desaced the Trophies of the Hungarian vi Aory, which hee had in a stately maner creeked before his bouse in E Constantinople. This was the wofull end of Abraham the great Bassa, who whilst he stood in fauor with his prince, was of all others accounted most fortunate, wanting nothing but the name of the great Sultan: but afterwards falling into difgrace, became the feorn of fortune, and the lamentable specacle of mans fragility. He was murthered the fifteenth of March, in

How the kingdom of Tunes was by Barbaruffa the Turks great Admiral taken from Malemound Charles affes, we have already told : but how the same was again taken from him by Charles the emperator to inuade Tanes. For a little before the returne of Solyman out of Persia, remaineth now to be declared. It was commonly reported, and not without iust cause seared, that Barbarusa possessed of the Kingdome of Tunes, and supported by the power of Solyman, would the next summer not con- L tent himselfe with the spoil of the coasts of Spain, Sardinia, and Italy, as hee had in sormer times, but with all his forces inuade Sicilia, the garnary and store-house of Italy, and from thence attempt to conquer the kingdome of Naples, which it was thought bee in his immoderat desires had longed much after. To represse this his barbarous insolencie, and to worke the fafety of the frontiers of the Christian kingdomes. (much subject to the rapines of Turkish pyrats) Charles the Emperous resolued in person himselse with a puissant army to passe ouer into Africk, whilft Solyman was yet busied in the Persian wars, and by force of armes to disposses the tyrant of his new gotten kingdom in Tunes. For accomplishment wheres, he The Emperature caused soldiers to be leuied in all parts of Spaine, and came down to Barcelona with eight great pripara chousand footmen and seuen hundred horsemen, far sooner than was by any manexpessed: M ding of Taut. among it whom were many of the nobility of Spaine, with their followers most gallantly appointed : but especially Ferdinand of Toledo Duke of Alva; whose forwardnesse in that bonourable action, with the defire he had to reuenge the death of his father Garzies, flaine before by the Moores at Girapolis, gaue great hope quen then vnto his Countrymen, That hee would in time proue a worthy Chieftaine, as indeed he afterward did. In the meaner time Andrew Ancie the great Admirall, vito whom only for his approved fi. Andrew Airle delitie and long experience the Emperous had fully communicated what he had with him. the ampression felfe before purposed, had with wonderfull diligence and celerkie rigged up a great fleet of thios and gallies to furnished with all manner of warlike proutfion, as might well have fufficed a great army: whereunto he joyned alfo his owne fleet of 17 gallies and three galeaffes. wherein he had imbarked the floure of Genoa and Liguria, who with exceeding cheerfulnes had voluntarily offred themselves to follow him the mold General in that great expedition. With this great preparation Auria came to the Emperor at Barcelona. Thither came also Lewis the King of Portingals brother (whose fifter Habel, Charles the Emperous had married) R with twenty five Carauely thips which the Porringals vied in their Indian voyages, among ft whom was also one huge Galconiall Hips well appointed and fit for fertilee, wherin were imbarked 2000 Portingals beside marthers: there also arrived fixty faile of tall ships, fent out of Planders and the low-countries, wherin were a great humber of condemned persons, whose lines were spared that they might feratift the gallies. Vnto this war Panim the third of that same, then Bithop of Rome, ten guillies under the conduct of Virginim Vrfinm : the great Master of Malta sent this fleet alfo. At the same time that all this preparation was in making in other places, that worthy Officftaine Alphonfus D'audius Vatting, whom the Empe- Alphonfus D'asorbad appointed Generall of all his forces at land, had by the Emperours commandement walm Vallim taken up flue thousand new fouldiers in Italy, which were led by Hieronimas Tutanilla, Countien Sarne Panderiche Canadia and forces, C tieof Sarne, Fredericke; Caratte, and Augustine Spinula, all famous Capeaines. Theold Spanish garrisons which lay an Lombardie, the Emperour commanded to be fireitly looked vinto, that some of zhems (hould leaste their places to go into this new expedition, but to remaine there stillunder their Generall Amonist Line , which worthy Captaine although hee would faine have had him with him, as of all his great Commanders the best ; yet he thought it good to force him, both for that he was much troubled with the gour, and allo for that it was necessarie (as he thought) to leave such a valiant captains with his garrisons in the countrey, so neer unto the French and Swiffers, whom he durft not fowell truft as to diffurnish that countrey either of fogreat a Commander, or of the wonted garrisons. At the same time Maximilians Aberstein, an old Commander, came to Vastine with eight thousand Germans, ouer the Triden-D tine Alpes to Millaine, and fo to Genoa; among st whom were divers noble Gentlemen, who then as voluntary men served of their owne charges. With these Germans and the five thoufand Italians, Vattisus imbarked himselfe at the port called Portus Veneris, in Liguria: having before persuaded them, with patience to endure the tediousnesse of the sea, and to comfort themselves with the hope of the victory in Africke, where they should fight in the quarrell of God, and for the Emperor, who did never forget his religious and valiant fouldiers. So failing along it the coast of Italy, he came to Naples, where the Viceroy and divers others of the Nobilitie had of their owne charges, every man according to his denotion or abilitie, built or furnished some one gallie, some moe, for that service. It was a wonder to see with what cheerfulnesse the Gallants and lusty youths of Naples and all that part of Italy, came

E and offred themselves to Vastim; so that it seemed there was none lest behind in Naples; for he had with fingular courtefie fo won the hearts of the old fouldiers and lufty youths of that Kingdome, that both the one and the other thought it a most honourable thing to adorn, the one their before deserved pensions, and the other their first entrance into martial affairs, with the participation of so notable a victorie. But whilest every man was thus bussed in setting forward, certaine mutinous fouldiers (weary of the sea, and searing the dangers of so long a woyage) began to cast many perils, to find fault with their small wages, and to discourage the multitude, persuading them with seditious speeches to forsake their colours, and to run away: for redreffe whereof, Vaftius caused the authours of that mutinie to be taken and thrust into facks, and in the fight of the whole fleet to be cast into the sea, So Vastim departing with his fleet from Naples, came in few dayes to Palermo in Sicilie. The Emperour also looking from Barcelona, came to the port of Mago in the Island of Minorca, and from thence to Caralis in Sardinia, whither Alphonsiu Vastim was a little before come with all his fleet out of Sicilie. Not long after, the Emperour, now that all his forces were come together, pafsed ouer from Sardinia into Africke, and with a faire Westerly winde put into the Port

Tunes. Of whom Barbaruffa had learned many things concerning the flate of Italy, the man

ners of the Christians, and strength of the Emperous agraftily feeding him with the bope of

ly and perfideously told him lies for truth; concerning the Emperous; and therefore com-guiltlesse Christian, somewhat minigated the griefe of his light beleefe, he forthwith began to cast with himselfe, how he might best withstand his puissant Enemy. And first of all calling to Counsell his sea Captaines (in whom for their approued valour he reposed the most confidence) he (hewed vnto them, That they as valiant men, acquainted with the dangers attending upon honourable actions, were not to doubt of the victory, for a fmuch as hee faw it as good as already gained; for the fame reasons for which he had before persuaded himself, that the Emperor (if he had not bin half mad) would not have vndertaken so doubtfull and despemanded him to be forthwith executed. When hee had thus with the vnworthy death of a K

A the old armories, broch my store, and bring forth my treasures. The Numidian princes now our friends, I will without delay entertain with great pay, and such presents as shall be to them most welcome. As for the citisens of Tunes, you know how easily they are to be kept in obedience, and brought on against the enen my for small pay, and hope of reward. But this one thing is it that I most carnestly require of your aboromed valor, That you most valiantly defend the strong castle of Guletta, as the surest defence not of this city only, but of the whole king dom; and especially our navy, which there lieth in safe harbor: for that piece will our enemies with all their forces first affail. Wherfore as worthy men neuer to be vanquished, keepe that for Solyman andme : fo that it being vainly attempted by our enemies, and resolutely defended by you she Christian Emperor there failing of his purpose, and shamefully foiled, shall now begin to dispaire not of the taking of the city of Tunes, but of his own return and lafety.

When he had thus faid, the fea captains answered with one consent, that they would most willingly and cheerfully perform what soeuer it should please him to command: And in confirmation therof, promised him not to do any thing which beseemed not most valiant & refolure men. Among these sea captains, Sinan of Smyrna a Iew, who had lost his right eye, was Barbarus bu both for his age and long experience in military affaires, of greatest account: next vnto him chief captains. was Haidinus Of Cilicia, for his furiousnes in fight syrnamed of the Italians Cacciadiabolo; and Sales of Ionia; which two had before in a great battel at fea flain Roderiem Portendus great admirall of Spain, and taken his fon Iohn prisoner, and seven great Gallies: after these was Tabaches of Laodicea, and Giaffer a valiant Captaine of the lanizaries; all which were notable C pyrats, and then men of great fame. The strong castle of Guletta standeth in the bottome of The stituation the Bay of Carthage, vpon a point of the land, where the fea by a narrow streit runneth on the of Galetia. East side of the castle into the lake of Tunes: which being in a maner round, is about twelve Italian miles ouer: but now that Castle is parted from the Maine on the West side also. by the sea that way let in. Which chargeable work was by Barbarus a begun, but given over again by him; perfuaded by fome, that the fea comming in that way, would in (hort time fill up the lake with fand. But was afterwards for all that perfected by othersifo that now it standeth in maner of an Island, in the mouth of the lake, divided from the firm land by two narrow streit passages; the one on the East, and the other on the West; yet so that it commandeth both. This castle Barbarus a had before strongly fortified both with men and munition as the D key of that kingdom: but now upon the comming of the emperor he put into it his most expert and refolute captains before named; wel forefeeing, that in defence therof lay the fafety of his Navy, which then lay within the lake, as in a most sure harbor; and also the greatest hope he had for the holding of the city of Tunes, whereon depended the whole state of that kingdom. The Emperor lying at anchor with all his fleet vnder the shore, gaue generall commandement, that his foldiers should with as much speed as was possible be landed with the long boats: which was fo orderly done, that the Moors terrified with the hideous cry of the foldiers making toward land, and not able to abide the shoures of small shot, were easily beaten from the shore, whither they were come downe in great multitudes; and so suffered the Christian soldiers to land quietly. The first that landed were the Spanish companies, after The Christian them the Italians, and last of all the Germans; whom Vastius Generall of the army caused pre-army landers fently to incamp themselues, streitly commaunding, That no man should straggle from the at Guletta. camp further into the land, vntil the horsmen and great artillery were all landed. The Empefor himself bearing victory in the cheerfulnes of his countenance, landed also. In the meane time certain Companies were fent out by the Generall to view the places nigh hand, and to feek out the cifterns and fountains of fresh water thereabout, which sometime served the fa-

Vasting had now brought up the army neer to the castle of Guletta, stil casting vp a rolling trench as he came neerer therunto. therby to keep his men out of the danger of the enemies shot; which work was not don only by the pioners and gally flaues, but by foldiers of all forts, yea many of the captains alfo lavd their hands to the spade and mattock: for why, the Emperor was there a continual beholder, H and a cheerful commender of every mans labour and forwardnesse: and the busie enemy was euer ready to take the advantage, if any thing were by negligence omitted, Oftentimes fally. ing out even vnto the very tents of the Christians, there giving vnto them proud words of defiance. When the army was to be marshalled, and enery commander to be appointed to the place of his charge in this fiege of Guletta; the County of Sarne (a man famous both for the honor of his house, and for the good seruice he had lately done against the Turks at Corone) requested of Vastim the General, to have the charge of the mount neerest to the castle, which as it was a place of most danger, so was it also of greatest honor. Whereat the old Spaniards (after the maner of their proud nature) much repined. Vpon the top of this mount the County fet up his rich tent in the enemies cic, and there lay with the Italian companies ouer whom he commanded. He had not there lien long, but Sales one of the Turks famous captains, with a companie of the garifon foldiers fallied out of the castle directly upon the mount whereon the Count lay, and by making shew as if he would desperatly have assailed the same, raised a great alarme against the Italians; yet so, as after certaine vollies of shot discharged on both sides, he began to retyre as if he had bin therto constrained. Which thing the County perceiuing, being a man of greater courage than direction, in great rage with bitter words reproted certain captains who were not so forward in the pursuit of the Enemy as hee would have had them; and in his fury ran down from the mount, the rest for shame following him, and ouertaking the enemies, flew divers of them. The crafty pyrat now feeing the County drawn out of his ftrength into the plain ground, and perceiuing himselfe ftrong enough to incounterhim, K studdenly turning himself about, said to his soldiers, The advantage you wished to have of your Enemies is now offered, they are now in your danger; wherfore sow your sclues valiant men, and suffer not one of these prond fresh water soldiers to escape alive or unwounded. Which he had no sooner sayd, but they prefently made a stand, and so hardly charged them from whom they but even now feemd to fly, that the Italians not able longer to indure the fight, betook themselues to flight. The County himselse (with Belingersu his kinsman) fighting valiantly in the formost of his companies was flain many others indured the like fortune: others flying backe again to the mount, were there flain by the Turkes; who resolutely entred into the trenches with them so far, that they caried away with them the plate and riches of the Counties tent. Neither was there any of the Spaniards which lay neerest vnto them, and might easily have rescued them, L that would once ftir out of their places to help them. For it is reported, that they were nothing forry for the ouerthrow of the Italians, for a fmuch as the county had fo arrogantly craued of the General the most honorable place, which he so euil held. His head and right hand were cut off, and fent by Salec to Barbaruffa. This ouerthrow much grieued the Italians, whom Vallius comforted with cheerful speeches; imputing all that losse neither to the valour of the enemy, or cowardife of the Italians, but only to the rashnes of the County, whom he said worthily to have paid the price of his inconfiderat forwardnes. But the Spaniards he sharply reproued as mercilesse men, who vpon so light an occasion had given cause for the Italians to haue them in distrust. The Turks in the mean time by the often shooting off of their great The Spaniards ordnance, shewed the low they conceived of this victory.

It oftentimes fo falleth out, that whilst men laugh at their neighbors harms, their owne is throw are the not far off : and so it sel out with the Spaniards. For Tabacches another of the pyratical caprot far on: and to it lef out with the Spaniards. For Tabacches another of the Pyson Tabacches, tains, shortly after fallying suddenly out of the castle in the dawning of the day, was got up to the

the top of the trenches wherin the Spaniards lay, before they were aware of his comming, and there flew fome as they were afteep, fome idlely fitting fearing no harme others as they were arming themselues, and with their sudden cry caused the rest which lay neer voto that place. shamefully for fear to fly out of their trenches : where the Turkes taking such trash as they there found, and having flain and wounded many, among ft whom was one Mendoza a captaine and carving away with them the enfigne of Sarmentus which stood vpon the top of the trench, returned with victory. The alarm raised in the army was such, as that the Emperor himselfe came running to the place in his Armor, feuerely reproouing them of cowardife which had for laken the place, and grieuously offended with them which had kept such negligent watch against such an enemy, as was not for wylines, agility, and courage, to be slightly regarded of B the best and most expert soldiers. This difference of the Spaniards well comforted the Italians. to see the old soldiers no lesse ouertaken in their negligence, than they had bin in their youd. nifed forwardnes.

This tumult appealed, Valtime called into his tent the Colonels and chief Captains of the Spaniards to whom he spake in this maner:

Friends (faid he) eliwhere alwates valiant, who together with mee have by your invincible promoffe value verth gained unto our Emperor many most glorious victories; you seem unto me at this time to have need to be to the Spanish ealled upon and to be put in remembrance of your wonted and approoned valour : for as far as I can (ee. the remembrance of your antient fame is in you growne altogether cold, your hands are become faint for C fear and that which I am fory and ashamed to say, you are grown I know not how, altogether out of order, and heartleffe, shewing no courage for the subduing of these naked Pyrats. Testerday (as many say) you smiled at the unskilfull and unfortunat forwardnesse of your friends, which they bought dear , but to day they worthily laugh at your degenerat careleffe negligence : (o that it concerneth you in honor, to blot out thu lo foul and publique a diferace by some notable and worthy exploit. Wherefore I exhort you, and I streitly charge and command you, that with all speed you prepare both your minds and weapons for the atchieucment of some new honor; that if the proud enemy shall again presume to come forth and affail your trenches, you faul forthwith break out woon him and beat him backe againe quen to the gates of Gulesta. Perhaps good fortune will so attend your valiant and resolute pursuit, that you may together will their disordred men enter some of their rampiers, wher in we see their whole hope consistesth. Which if it shall D otherwise fall out than is hoped for , you shall by this your notable devoir wonderfully content the Emperor your Soueragen, and me your General, and withall couer your late dishonor,

Wherunto they all answered, That they would so bear themselves against the Enemy, as TheTarkifas, that he should not defire greater courage or contempt of danger, in men desirous of honour of duties. and commendation.

It was not long, but that the Turks incouraged with their former succes, after their woonted maner fallyed out again, conducted by Giaffer Captaine of the Ianizaries, a man of great courage and firength of body: who with the lanizaries and certain companies of Moorish ar-E chers, about noon time of the day issuing out of the castle, assailed the vttermost trenches, ho-Ping in that broiling heat to find the Christians in their stations negligent and unprepared a wherin he was nothing deceived: for the Spaniards that burning hot time of the day kept fuch negligent watch that Giaffer with his Ianizaries and archers was got up to the top of the rampiers, and discharged their shot and arrows upon the Christians in their trenches, before they were wel aware of his comming. But upon the striking up of the drum, certain Companies of harquebusiers brake out vpon them in two places at once, as Vastina had before commanded; whom he seconded with a company of halberdiers, keeping in readinesse his squadrons to rescue his harquebusiers, if they should be inforced by the enemy to retyre; and in that order expected the event of the skirmith, which was most valiantly maintained on both sides. For the Ianizaries, although they were inforced to give ground, yet as men not vsed to fly, and standing upon the honor of their order, with stood the Christians with no lesse resolution than they were by them charged ; untill that Giaffer their leader, desperately fighting a- Giaffer Capmongst the formost of the Ianizaries, was at once shot in with two bullets and slaine. both sides slaine upon his dead carkasse: yet at length they were inforced to flie, and so sierce. G ly followed by the Spaniards, that they of Guletta, when they had received in the foremon flut out almost a fourth part of their own men, for feare the Christians should together with them have entred the castle. Didacus Abila, one of the Spanish entigne bearers, advanced his enfigne vnto the top of one of the enemies rampiers, and was there flaine, but his enfigne faued by one of the fouldiers of the same band. The Christians received more losse in their retreat, then they had in all the fight; for the Turks from their rampiers then discharged their then they say they could vpon them, which they could not before doe without the like danger to their own mingled among ft them. This days work well abated the pride of the Turks, and gaue good hope to the Christians, that the Castle would without any great losse be gained:

for being neer vnto it, they perceived it not to be fo strong as they had supposed. The Emperor having spent a a few dayes in consultation about his farther proceeding, and preparing of things for the siege, resolued without further delay with all his forces to assault the castle, persuaded thereunto by many reasons: first, by the cheerfulnes of his owne soldiers, & the courage of his enemies fore danted in the last skirmish, which he was loth they should againe recouer by the comming of new supplies; besides that, hee was informed that divers companies of the Numidians were comming to Tunes, entertained by Barbars fa, whole frength was like daily to increase but that which moued him most to hasten the matter, was, for that his men began to grow fickly in his camp, being all the day time scortched as it were with the ferrient heat of the Sun, and well neere started in the night with cold and exceeding dewes wherewith they were commonly wet to the skin; neither was there either good water, I or fresh victuall by any meanes to be had in that sandie and barren soile, for the relise of the ficke, other than that was brought out of the fleet, for all the water thereabout was most vnpleasant and exceeding brackish, so that both sicke and wholewere glad when they could get a crab to quench their extreme thirst: although the Emperous did what he might to remedy these extremities, and much reliefe was in good time sent both from Sicilia and Naples: the bisket also in the ships, especially in the Spanish gallies, was growne hoary and vnwholsome. Wherefore he began to place his battery about the fifteenth of July, which was defended all along ft with Gabions, and cask filled with fand, for that the countrey soile in that place yeelded neither earth nor turfe to do it. Anria appointed to batter the Castle by sea, divided his gallies into three squadrons, which orderly succeeding one another, should by turns beat the K same : his great ships rid at anker, and out of their forecast les thundred with their great Ordnance. And Vaitim at land had divided his army into three battels; Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, euery station by themselves, in such sort, as that they might indifferently be partakers both of the danger of the affault, and of the glory of the victory. There was never frong place in the memory of man (fince guns, that fatall engine were first invented for the destru-Rion of mankind) affailed with greater force, greater preparation, or industry. The great ordnance in manner of a great earthquake, so terribly roared and thundred, that the earth seemed not only to tremble and quake vnder mens feet, but even by and by to rent in funder and swallow them vp, and the sea which was even now quiet and calme, began to rise alost, and to rage & fome as if it had bin in a great ftorm: at which time the air became thick & the skiedark- L Guinta off aul. ned with the smoke of the great artillery: from the breake of the day vntil noon, roaring cannon and culturing neuer ceased: so that the Vamures were beaten down, the castle made saultable, & the wals fo shaken, that in many places the Turks canoniers, together with their cannons lay buried in the ruins thereof. Which thing perceived, they which were before appointed to give the first affault, vpon signall given by the Emperor, presently vpon the ceasing of the great Artillery, affailed the breach, and others with their scaling ladders scaled the wals: which was done with such courage and resolution, that the Turks when they had done what they possibly could for the desence of the place, by casting down darts, wild fire, and such like things upon the Christians as they were climbing up; at length as men despairing longer to hold the place, & ouercome with a greater fortune, turned their backs & fled. Sinan & the reft M of the captains by a wooden bridge, fled out at the further fide of the caftle, into the main, and fo along it the left fide of the lake by land to Tunes, not looking behind them for haft; which way most part of his men followed him also. The rest were either slain ordriuen into the lake, where feeking to have their lives by fwimming, they were either flain in comming to land, by

A the Spanish horsemen, or else in their swimming shot at pleasure by the hat quebusiers, so that all the lake was as it were couered with the dead bodies of the Turks and Moores. The Em Galetta woon, peror with small shot thus gained the castle of Guletta, with all the warlike provision therein, un first sales. and with it all Barbarussa his great fleet and strength at sea, which he for the more safety had before put into the lake which as it was vnto the Emperor a thing most pleasant, sowas it vnto Barbarussa and his pyrate the greatest griefe and losse possible, having at once lost all their power at lea, which but a little before was no small terror to all the frontiers of the Christian countries and Islands in the Mediterranean.

Barbarussa troubled and terrified with so great a losse, with a sterne and scornefull counte. Barbarussa nance received the lew and the rest of the captains fled from Guletta, reuiling them bitterly B inhis rage, and calling them faint hearted cowards, which had in fo short a time given over so strong a place. Whereunto Sinan answered for them all, in this fort:

Haitadin (faid he) folong as we were to fight with armed men, we did as thou well knowest, and our The short an. enemies cannot deny, what well befeemed us and thy magnificent fortune. But when we were to withfland for of Sinan the Dinell and his infernall furies, which came against ve with flames of fire, and earthquakes, things of Barbarala. extreameterrour and danger it ought not to seeme strange wnto thee, if we jought to escape the voconth fury of the immortall enemies of mankinde, to do thee feruice in thy better fortune, in defence of this the sity and hing dome. Neither dowe account it any diferace to have escaped that danger, as menthat minde spaine to fight : out of which theu, a most antient and expert Commander (if I may frankely speake wate C sheethe truth) if show hadh been there present, wouldst have accounted it no dishonor, but very good discretion to band escaped in fafety.

Barbarussa repressing his fury, began in a more temperat manner to request them every one particularly, as valiant and couragious men to stand fast vnto him in that war against their enemies the Christians: telling them, that he well hoped, that after the great supplie of the Moorish footmen and Numidian horsemen were once come (which were now at hand) the enemy should not long rejoyce of the taking of Guletta. After that, he forthwish converted all his fludy and endeauour, to prepare such things as were needfull for the war, bringing forth his treasures, and bountifully bestowing the same amongst the Moors and Numidians, thereby to n confirme the friend (hip of fuch as well affected him, and with his new bounty to win the hearts of fuch as yet stood doubtfull.

In the mean time Muleaffes the exiled king, with a smal retinue of his friends and followers Muleaffes comcame from the furthest part of Numidia, into the Emperors campe; the Emperor fitting in a person royall feat in the midst of his pauillion, whereinto Muleaffes was admitted, with a myter vpon his head, in a garment of greene and blew changeable filkethe was of a tall and manly stature, of colour tawny, but so sqint-eyed, that he seemed spitefully to looke vpon them whom he beheld: whom after he had kissed the Emperors right hand, and had set himselse downe with his legs gathered close vnder him, vpon a carpet spred vpon the bare ground, after the manner of his country, he by an interpreter spake vnto the Emperor as followeth.

Thou art come in armes into this country, and art now almost conquerour of the same, (thrice mighty The Ocation of Emperour) prouoked thereunto not by any defert of mine, for that our different religion fo required; yet charles the emas I verily thinke, not without the appointment of the most high God, whom both thou and I do with like prour. demotion worship, to take revenue of the most persidious and cruell tyrant and pyrat, the mortall enemy of mankinde whom I foresee as good as already vanquished, now that Guletta is taken and his nany surprised. So that I hope he shall in short time by thy revenging hand, at once receive the just guardon of all his former villanies : which hall be fo much the more to my comfort, for that I hope the fruit of thy rare felicity and glorious victory will redound in great part to me, being restored by thee into my fathers kingdome: which I as a poore exiled Prince most humbly request of thy justice and bounty. For it shall be F unto thee athing most honourable and profitable, if thou shalt receive into thy protection me, a King roy. ally discended of a most antient progeny, strengthned with the areas alliance of Numidians and Moores. Neither do I refuse either to pay thee tribute therefore, or to acknowledge my selfe vasfall unto thee the Christian Emperor. Of which my fidelity there can be no greater assurance, than the thankefull remembrance of fo great a benefit received; which shall for ever remaine unforgotten of me and my posterity, euen for that especially that I detest and abhorre the name of an unthankefull man; and do well by experi- G ence finds, how much my state may be confirmed, and the minds of my people to me assured, by the garrious Concere at hand in Sicilia and Sardinia.

The Emperor answered, That he was come ouer into Affricke to be reuenged of enfuer is Mn- the injuries which Barbarussa had many times done vpon the frontiers of his dominions, and to root out the pyrats, of all others most mischieuous: which his good purpose had by the goodnesse of Christ his Sauior taken so good essea, that he doubted not in short time by the goodnetic of Cinta and a perfect victory; which once gained, he would then kindly grant him all things which should stand with the convenience of his affaires, and theyfe of his victory: fo that he would not falfific his faith, which he might justly suspect, if he reposed not H a speciall trust, that the remembrance of such a benefit would for cuer remaine in his heroicall mind : and was further affured, that the same power which should restore him his kingdome of curtefic, could also take it from him againe, if his vnthankefulnesse should so deserve.

Muleasses in the presence of the Emperor vsed such a gravity and grace in his speech & geflure, as well declared, that he had nothing forgotten his former estate: but towards the Generall and the other great Captaines he vied all manner of curtefic, so that he rid vp and down with them gallantly mounted, mannaging his horse, and charging and discharged his lauree with such agility and skill, as shewed him to be a very good horseman, and of great activity. At other vacant times he would subtilly reason with learned men, after the manner of Agerrois, of the nature of things, of the motion of heaven, and power of the stattes. By the Empe- I rours commandement he had a Tent appointed for him, and honourable allowance for his diet. Vallius and the rest of the chiefe Commanders of the army vsed him with all honor, and at such time as he was desirous to see the campe, curteously brought him into all places of it, that he might himselfe see what mounts they had in short time cast, what abundance there was of great artillery, what strong watch and ward was kept, what a number there was of brace and warlike fouldiers of diuers nations, differing much one from another in language, countenance, and manner of furniture : and further demanded, Whether that puissant army which the Emperour had brought ouer to his great good, were in his judgement sufficient to subdue the enemy? Where aboue all things Muleaffes wondered at the number and order of the great ordnance : and next vnto that, at the wonderfull plenty of things to be bought and fould in & the market place, and at the modest quietnesse of the souldiers in buying the same. Not long after, the expert Captaines by diligent enquiry learned of him many things well feruing for their better proceeding in that war, especially of the disposition and strength of them of Wise plainer and Tunes, of the scituation of the city, of the nature of the walls, and fortification of the Castle, of the Wels and Cisternes in the suburbes, and what strength the Moores and Numidians were of, which Barbarussa had entertained. In conclusion, he assured them (as afterwards it fell out) that Barbarn fa would neuer trust to the strength of the wals, which would easily be overthrowne with the great artillery; but would in a great brauery with enfignes displaied bring all his forces into the field, of purpose to terrifie the Christians with the fight of the multitude of his rascall soldiers, and to breake their array with his Numidian horsemen, who with L hideous and terrible cries, after the manner of that nation, would not faile to affaile them: and yet for all that would neuer bring into the battell his Turkish footmen (in whom he reposed his greatest confidence, and whom he defired most to spare) but would as a crafty and subtill Turke, by opposing of the Moores, whom he held in small regard, try by their bloud what might be done without the danger of his owne men. But as he told them, nothing could be more strange vnto the Moores his countrymen, or that they were more affraid of, than in a set battell to fight with that enemy whose squadrons comming orderly on in glistring armour, with long pikes, might scorne and easily ouerthrow the naked archers of the Moores, and the vnarmed Numidian horsmen: and that our men should find nothing more grieuous or troublesome, than the scorching heat of the Sun, and the thirst rising thereof; which might easily be M remedied by plenty of water, which by flaues and fmal boats might eafily be brought in casks and bottles from the fleet alongst the lake, and so distributed amongst the army: although not far from the walls of the city were certaine old conduit heads which would yeeld them great plenty of water, if the malicious enemy did not to his owne hurt and others, poylon

the same. These things orderly reported to the Emperour, confirmed the hope he had before conceived of the defired victory: fothat wholly bent thereupon, and carefully forecasting all things, he resolved forthwith to depart from Guletta, and with all his power to believe

But whilest he was preparing things necessary, ordering his souldiers, and discovering the enemies purposes, his souldiers had dayly divers skirmishes with the Numidians: so that once the skirmish was like to have come to a just battell which began in this fort. The Moors had planted certain field pieces among it the Olive gardens, wherewith they thot continually into the campe: for removing whereof, the Emperor leaving the Italians, with certain companies of the old Germans and Spanish soldiers, for the keeping of his campe and trenches, went forth with his horsemen and the rest of his army: fending before him Montegius, Generall of the Spanish horsemen, who for most part were but raw souldiers, such as were of the Noblemens ordinary feruants and followers, not before acquainted with the wars. These light horse- The Spanish men with divers fortune skirmished a while with the enemy; but when they saw themselves light borsain to be hardly charged, and Montegius their Generall grieuously wounded, they turned their putto flight. backs, and in the light of the Emperor shamefully fled to the men at armes which were comming after them. The manner of the enemies fight was, to give at the first a fierce and defperat charge, and vpon the encounter given, of purpose to retyre, avoiding thereby the sudden force of their enemies, and by and by to turne againe youn them with a fresh charge. The Emperour feeing the flight of his light horfemen, came on couragiously with his men at armes. C by whose comming in and valiant encounter the Turks and Moores were put to flight, and the field pieces wherewith they had before annoyed the campe, taken. In this skirmith the Emperour in person, as he stood formost in his armed troups, gaue the signall of battell himselfe. by crying with a loud voice, Saint Iames, Saint Iames, whom the Spaniards take for their Pa. The Emperour. tron; and so charging the enemy, performed the part not only of a couragious Chiefetaine, reflect the but of a resolute and valiant souldier also; rescuing with his owne hand Andreas Pontius a bis owne hand noble gentleman of Granado, whom vnhorfed and fore wounded, the enemy was ready pre-refeuth Andrefently to have flaine, had not the Emperor by his comming in faued him : deferuing thereby at Tontius of the Oken garland, which the Romans by the name of Ginica Corona, gaue as an honour to fuch as had in battell faued a citifen.

About the fame time it fortuned, that thirty thousand Moores came upon the sudden to haue furprifed a little tower standing upon a hill neere unto the ruines of old Carthage:wherin the Emperor had placed certaine foldiers for the keeping thereof, because it was neere vnto his campe, Before these Moores went a Numidian Priest, who bellowing out certain superstitious charmes cast divers scroles of paper on each side the way, wherein he cursed and banned the Christians and now they had with fire and smoake brought the Christians in that tower to great extremity, when the Emperour himselfe comming to their rescue with certaine companies of horsemen and footmen, ilew the conjuring Priest, with others, and put the rest to flight. The discomfiture of the Spanish horsemen caused many men to thinke, that if the Emperor should come to a fet battell with the enemy, he should finde his horsemen too weake, both for that they were but few in number, and not to be compared with the Numidians. For The Emperous which cause, and divers others, certaine of the Emperours grave counsellors, but none of the advised by his best foldiers, wished him not to proceed further in that dangerous war, but with speed to re-returnetome. turne out of Affricke, for as much as he had won honour enough by the taking of Guletta, and furprising the enemies fleet: whereby he had to his immortall praise, and the common good of Christendome deliuered all the frontiers of the Christian countries in the Mediterranean, from the danger and feare of those most cruell pyrats; besides that, the slix began to rage in his campe, whereof many of his fouldiers fell sicke and died daily. Whereas on the contrary Part, the mighty Numidian Princes, such as were Muleasses old enemies, were reported to come in dayly to the aid of Barbarusta. These vnseasonable speeches the Emperour thought good to represse betime; reasoning against the authors thereof with great gravity, as against men who with more feare doubted of the successe of things, and the euent of the victory, than befeemed them, whom for their constant resolution, and good opinion conceived of their discretion, he had chosen to be of his most secret counsell. Saying, That he desired not of them that their needlesse and dishonourable labour, wherein they should Therefolutea.

hew themselves more carefull of his person than of his bonour : for as much as those things which they G now alledged, should have bin said before the war was taken in hand, now by good hap halfe ended : before he ever passed over into Affricke. For he might (as he said) bave rested quietly in Spaine, and hanceas. ly nealected and rejected the injuries done upon the sea coasts, and the complaints of his subjects ; but he was (us they well knew) for most vryent causes come thither: whereas he was resolved to satustie the expetation of the World with a notable victory , or if God should otherwise appoint, there to end his day with honour. Wherefore he willed them to cease further to flatter him that was no way dismaid, or to posselfe the minds of his valiant fouldiers with a vaine forboding feare, and with resolute minds, together with him their chiefetaine, against the next day to expect what the fortune of the field should appoint for the full accomplishment of that war. For he was (as he faid) fer downeto give the enemy bastell zor if he refused the same, to batter the walls of Tunes, not doubting but that God would stand on his side in sogned H

The Emperor

The Emperour leaving a fufficient garrifon in the castle of Guletta, commanded thebresches to be repaired, and the great ordnance there taken to be laid vpon carriages, which before after the old rude sea fashion lay bound in great vnweldy pieces of timber, with yron rings fastined thereunto, and could not handsomely be handled or removed to and fro. Afterthes: when he had caused the country to be well viewed all about, which betwirt the Oliuegroues and the right fide of the lake giueth a direct passage vnto the City of Tunes; he set forward with his army in so good order, that he still marched as ready to fight, for feare of the policies and sudden assaults of the enemy. On the left hand marched the Italians next vnto the I lake; on the right hand the Spaniards neere unto the Olive groves, which in the manner of a great wood ran all alongst the country, from the ruines of Carthage, almost to the wals of Tunes: in the midst betwixt both marched the Germans; next vato them followed the great ordnance; and after it the carriages of all the army. In the vannegard was Valiu, whom the Emperour had made Generall of the army, and especially for that day : in the rereward was the Duke of Alba with certaine troups of chosen horsemen: in the middle of the main battell was the Emperor, and by his fide Lewis his brother in law the King of Portugals brother. The Italians were conducted by the Prince of Salarne, the Spaniards by Alarco an antient captain, and the Germans by Maximilian Eberstein. But the Emperor in his armor ceased not to ride from squadron to squadron, with cheerefull countenance and full of hope, recounting vnto I them the former victories which they had gotten for him : and telling them, that he did that day expect of them a most honourable daies service, forasmuch as they were to fight against the naked enemies of the Christian religion : wherefore they should with resolute minds set down themselves to endure the weight of their armor, the painfulnesse of their march, the heat of the Sun and fand, and the tediousnesse of the thirst arising thereof; untill they might joyne battel with their enemies, where they should vindoubtedly by the goodnesse of God (in whose quarrell they fought) obtaine the victory; in the meane time they should with patience ouercome all difficulties, comforting themselues with the vindoubted hope of a most rich prey, which they were to expect of the spoile of a rich city. Whereunto every squadron answered with a great shout, that he should not trouble himselse with those matters which he had be- L fore rehearfed, but to affure himfelfe, that they his fouldiers would most patiently endure all exitemities, and not deceive the expectation he had conceived of their wonted valour, but by valiant fight to make him Emperor, not of Affricke but of Asia also.

Now Passim had withdrawn two companies of harquebusiers out of the Spanish squadron, to skirmith with the Moores who continually followed in the taile of the army: whom, by those harquebusiers and certaine troups of horsemen deputed to that purpose, the duke of Alba notably repulsed in the rereward.

The army was now come vnto the Cisternes of fresh water, which Muleases and others greedwiffe of which well knew the country, had before told them of, which as foon as the fouldiers almost which well knew the country, nad before told them of; which as toon as the foundates and their march fainting under the weight of their armor, with the feorehing heat of the Sun, and extremity of M thirst, descried afar off; they for desire they had to quench their thirst, for thwith for soke their colours, and disorderly ran as fast as they could to those cisternes : Vastim the General, to the vttermost of his power laboring in vaine both by faire meanes and foule to have staid them; who faw by that difordernes of the fouldiers, a great advantage offred vnto the enemy, which then was not far off. But when the Generall could neither with words or blowes preuaile any thing with them, the Emperour himselfe was glad to hast thither, with his presence and authority to have kept them in order: yet such was the force of their intollerable thirst, that neither the fight of the Emperour, nor all that he could do, could remedy the diforder; some fainting in the fand for lacke of drinke, and some other for greedinesse ready to burst their bellies at the fountains; so that the Emperor was faine with his truncheon to beat them away. Among ft the reft, one Sullius Cicero of Arpinus, a famous captain, died at the cifterne fide with drinking too much. This extremity for want of water feemed justly to have happened vnto them, forasmuch as Vastius the day before had by generall proclamation thorow the campe. commanded that every foldier should carry with him a bottle of wine or water at his girdle: B although he caused so much water as he conveniently could, to be carried in great caskes for the common reliefe of the army, whereof the Germanes had the greatest part; some almost ready to give ouer for thirst, were glad to get a draught of cold water of their fellowes which A draught of had it for two duckets.

This diforder being with as much speed as was possible reformed, and the Army againg brought into order, the Emperor held on his march towards the enemy : for Barbaruffa with a Barbaruffa in wonderfull multitude of horiemen and footmen, and a number of enfigines (the influences of field againft the vaine feare and foolish brauery) gallantly displaied after the manner of the Moores, was come about three miles from the city and with certaine field pieces (as Muleaffes had foretold) went about to haue broken the battell of the Christians; which Pieces although they were oftentimes discharged, yet did they little or no harme by reason of the vnskillfulnesse of the Canoniers. Valtius in like manner, and for like purpose had commanded the great ordnance to be brought into the front of the battell but perceiving what time and to ile it required to have it done (for that it was drawne but by firength of men, and the wheels of the carriages funk deep in the deuouring fand, and the shot and pouder which the Mariners and gally slanes carred altogether upon their shoulders, came but softly on) he suddenly changed his purpose, and told the Emperor, That he thought it not best to stay for the great artillery in that cheerfulnesse of his army when every man defired battell, but to commit all to the valour of his resolute men. and his own good fortune, which ever favored his noble attempts: lest whilst we stay (faid he) too long voon our great ordnance (which doth not alwaies ferue to great purpose in sudden time grow cold. Whereunto the Emperor, desirous of battell, and filled with good hope, joyfully answered, Valtim, if thou so think it good (which I also like well of) in Gods name give the fignall. That shall I by and by do (said he) but first it is reason that you which sway & command a great part of the world, learne at this time to obey him, whom to his great charge and shame, you, laying a fide the imperial majesty of your selfe, have for this day made Generall and commander of fo mighty an army : wherefore (faid Vastius) I will now vie my authority, and command you, fith I may not forequest you, to depart from this place, and to get you into Vasitive comman the midst of the battell neere vnto the ensignes; lest by some vnlucky shot, the whole estate of delb the Empe ding cheerfulneffe of our foldiers (the most sure token of vndoubted vi aory) by deferring of

E the army be brought into extreame perill by the danger of one mans life. Whereat the Em. peror finiling willed him to feare no fuch thing; faying moreouer, That neuer Emperour was yet flain with a gun. For all that he departed out of the place as he was commanded, and went into the middle of the battell. Wherupon the fignall of battell was by the found of the trumpet, and striking vp of the drum, presently given, and the enemy (with more haste than the extream heat of the day required) furiously charged by the Emperors horsemen, who to avoid the danger of the great artillery, made all the hafte they could to come to handy blowes. In the formost of these horsemen was Ferdinand Genzaga, a most valiant noble man, who then serued the emperor without charge: he being fomwhat before the rest, at the first onset slew with his lance a great captain of the Moors, & presently with his sword so troubled them that were next, that he opened a way for them that followed him, to break into the enemies battell. The harquebusiers also discharged so fast vpon the enemy, that 300 of them lay dead vpon the ground before the joyning of the battell; which the rest of the footmen seeing, for sooke their great ordnance, and fled backe to Barbaruffa. Who long endured not the force or fight of the Christians; but grinding his teeth for forrow and griefe of mind, turned his horse, and with Earbarnsia sty- his Turks retired into Tunes. For now that his designes had in the beginning taken so cuill G fuccesses, he thought it not best to adventure all in one battel, knowing right well, that the en perours army could not long endure the inconveniences of the intollerable heat, and want of many things, especially of fresh water: which fed him with hope, that he should out of these his enemies distresses picke some fit occasion of advantage, if he could but a while defend the city of Tunes. The Numidians and Moores, who in great troups and companies had alwaies houered about the Emperors army, without doing any thing worth reporting, retired them. felues into the suburbes, gardens, and other places neere vnto the city.

The Emperor glad of the flight of his enemies, which were thought to have bin in number 100000, incamped with his army that night in the same place where they before lay; determining the next day to batter the wals of Tunes. In the meane time Barbarussa, surprised H with an exceeding feare, and distracted with many cares, and now become more cruell than himselfe, bad in his mind purposed a fact full of exceeding and inhuman cruelty, which was, at once to have killed all the Christian captives in the castle of Tunes; fully resolved to put Estebaraffa ia the fame in execution, had not Sinan the Iew diffuaded him from that most execuable fact. protesting such a practise to be unseemely for a man of valour, famous for his many victories, the chaffian and carrying with him the majesty of a King s whereas he would shortly after wonderfully repent him for doing fo shamefull a fact : the acking whireof, What was it else (as the lew faid) but a manifelt demonstration of his extreame feare and desperation a which two things were most dangerous to him, that was to maintaine so doubtsulfawar, and would much deface the glory of his former life: wherefore he should doe well to heware, that by the same of such a ! most horrible fact, he did not prouoke Solymans heavy displeasure against him : who devoid of all humane cruelty, had vied both to detest and reuenge fuch outrages. Wherfore he should fuffer the Christian captines to line bound in their farail chaines, so long as it were their fortunes; who being well kept, and vnarmed, might shortly after serue him to good purpose, and could no way without most certain danger moue themselues, if they should vnaduisedly lust after their valueky liberty: for by them, the expected victory could neither be given to the enemy, nor taken from him, or yet so much as hindered. At which speech the tyrant was ashamed and so sparing the lives of the poore wretches, went out of the Castle, into the greatest church of Tunes, whither he had caused to be assembled all the chiefe men of the city, to tell them what he would have done for the defence of the city, and now by persuasion to encourage them to fight: from whom, as men by him holden in distrust, he had but a little before the comming of the Christians, taken all manner of armor and weapons.

Whilest Barbarnssa was thus busied, the most joy full and happy day appeared to those miferable captines; by fortunes change, no leffe blacke and difmall to the Turks and Moores. For that hainous purpose of the cruell tyrant could not long be coursed or kept secret: so that a constant report of a danger so imminent, was run thorow the whole castle, even into deep dungeons; by the compassion of certaine manumised slaues, who detesting the sauage cruelty of Barbarussa their master, and touched with denotion, had in heart returned to their old and true Christian religion; incouraging by secret speeches the chiefe of the captines with whom they were acquainted, to lay hand now vpon their liberty. Amongst these well minded men was L one Francis a Spaniard, whom Barbarussa had from his youth brought vp as his minion, having him alwaies in great effecme by the name of Memis; and another called Vincentius Caterinas of The Christian Dalmatia, an cunuch. These two venturing a most memorable and godly attempt, set open responsible and godiyattemps, secopes the prison doores, and gaue instruments vnto the poore prisoners, ready to take the occasion the course of offered; who boldly starting vp, brake off their chains and gyues, and so by the great goodnesse of the caffic of and mercy of God, about 6000 poore naked Christians, armed with that came first in hand, but especially with stones, brake forth suddenly vpon the Turks that were in the castle. Ramadue a renegate Spaniard captain of the castle, stirred up with the vnexpected and terrible noise of so many prisoners breaking their yrons, with a few soldiers whom he had suddenly called with him run to the castile gate, where one of the prisoners (a lusty young man of Sicilia) had M with one of the bars of the gate strucke downe one or two of the Warders, and having bolted the gate, was become master thereof: him Ramadus slew, and opening the gate, made way for himselfe and his few followers, with whom he went to Barbarussa, to carry him the newes of that his hard mischance. But the Christians now loosed from their bands, and having suddenly slaine divers of the Turks, possessed themselves of all the castle, brake open the armory, and so feizing upon the kings treasure, armor, and provision, from a high turret gaue signes of victory to the Christian army by smoake and falle fires made with gunpouder; and lastly by displaying of Sarmentus his ensigne, which (as we have before declared) was by Tabacches taken from the top of the trenches at the fiege of Guletta, These fignes although the Christians in the army could not well perceive, as being too far off, yet by the fugitives which came oftentimes out of Tunes to the Emperor and Muleaffes, they were both perfuaded, that fome great tumult wis rifen among it the enemies. Where fore the Emperor fent two of his captains with their companies, who going as neere as they could to the city and the castle, should difcouer what the matter was. In the meane time, Barbaruffa almost mad for anger, in his fury blaspheming his vain gods, and bitterly cursing and banning the lew, for dissuading him from killing the captiues, came to the castle gate, with tears standing in his eys pittifully requesting the late Christian captines (which then stood upon the top of the wals and the gate, with weapons in their hands) that they would forthwith let him in faithfully promifing them their liberty with a generall and free pardon for all that they had done. But they mindfull both of their former and present fortune, and moved with just hatred, cast stones at him, and with many opprobrious words rejected his request: fo that he inraged with forrow and madnesse, shot at them with his owne hand, and feeing all past remedy, and the city not possible now to be kept, shamefully betooke himselse to slight. After him followed the Turks, in number seven thousand, with purpose to fly to the city Hippona, now called Bona, famous with the Bishopricke of that reverend Father and great Divine Augustine. For there (as in a most sure harbor) had Barbaruffa left fourteene gallies in the lake neere vnto the city, to ferue his turne whatfoeuer mischance should happen: but the tacklings, sailes, oares, and ordnance, he had laied yo

my vnto the gates of Tunes, where the magistrates of the city were ready to submit them- to the Emperor. felues vnto him, and to deliuer him the kies of the city; only requesting of him, that he would keep his foldiers incamped without the city, and not to feeke the vtter spoile and ruine thereof:promifing, that the fouldiers should want nothing that was there to be had. Mules fee also carefull of the fafety thereof, earnestly intreated the Emperor in the citisens behalfe. But he, D although he was of his own honourable disposition ready enough to have granted what they requested; yet for that he did not without cause, doubt of the Moores sidelity, and that the paiment of the mony which they of Tunes had by Muleaffes promifed for the paiment of the foldiers wages, was by them craftily delaied, expecting still the vetermost denoire of Barbarussa, he could not by any means be persuaded to promise them any certainty of their safety: moued also so to do by the discontented speeches of his foldiers, who spared not to say, That they should be hardyland vokindly dealt withall, if after so long trauell and so much paines taken both by sea and land, they should be defrauded of the reward of the victory, sith nothing but only the hope of the present spoile did relieue and feed them, being poore and miscrable, having scarce clothes to cover their nakednesse, and their bodies spent with long labour and thirst: fo that the Moores of Tunes, enemies of the Christian religion, and the perpetuall receivers of most horrible pyrats, might worthily rejoyce of the Christians victory, and the conquerors themselues for euer bewaile their owne calamities and miseries. Whilest the Emperor flood thus in doubt what to resolve vpon, Vastius with a small company came to the castle gate, and was with wonderfull joy received by the Christian captines. But as he was viewing the wealth and prouision laid up in the castle, a Ligurian captine discouered unto him where certain treasure lay hid: for Barbarussa had there cast into a well 30000 duckats sowed up in bags, which Valtim getting casily out, obtain'd them of the Emperor of gift, as he whose good feruice had well deserved them. The castle thus won by a strange chance, and the captives taking the spoile thereof the soldiers could no longer be staied, but that they entred into the ci-Tunes spoiled

F ty by heaps, running after the spoile into every part therof, the citisens fearing no such matter, bribe chris and calling in vain upon the faith of Muleaffer the old foldiers at the first entrance slew many. The Spaniards and Italians fought most after the spoile; but the Germans desiring more to glut themselues with the Mahometan bloud, fill'd all places with dead bodies, without regard of fex or age; so that the prophane temples of their vain prophet, swam with the bloud of them

It grieued him to heare, that the Christian religion should begin to take root amongst those G Pagan kings, which had not long before received the Mahometan religion: Besides that he was credibly informed, that the Portingals in these late wars he had against the Persians, had

At the same time Solyman by the persuasion of Luizis and Ajax (the Bassacs of greatest au-

aided them with certain harquebusiers, and also had fent them workemen to shew them both the making and vie of great artillery. But that which moued him most of all, was for that the Portingals by their trafficke into the Indies, had cut off all the trade of merchandife into the gulfe of Arabia, whereby the riches of the East were wont tobe transported vnto Caire, and fo to Alexandria, from whence they were afterwards by the Venetian Merchants and others dispersed into all parts of Europe: but now were carried by the great Ocean into Portingall. and from thence conucied into all parts of Christendome, to the great hindrance of his tributes and customs of Ægypt. For these causes and at the instance of Solyman Bassa an eunuch. borne in Epirus, and then Gouernour of Ægypt; Solyman caused wonderfull preparation tobe. made, for the building of a great fleet in the red fea, to go against the Portingals, All the timber whereof was cut downe in the mountaines of Cilicia, and shipped in the bay of Atralia in the bottome of the Mediterranean, from whence it was by fea transported to Pelusium and so up the river of Nilus to Caire; where after it was framed and ready to be fet together, it was with infinit labour, and no leffe charge, carried by land with Camels thorow that hor and fandy country, from Caire to Suetia, a port of the Red sea, called in antient time Arsinoe. From which place eightic miles distant from Caire, the ancient Kings of Ægypt, seeking by vaine and wonderfull workes to eternise the memory of themselves, had with incredible charge cut through all that maine land; fo that vessels of good burthen might come up the same from The Anglian Arfinoe to Caire: which great cut or ditch, Sefoftris the rich king of Egypt, and long after. him Ptolomem Philadelphm, purposed to haue made a great deale wider and deeper, and therefeature the Me- by to have let the Red sea into the Mediterranean, for the readier transportation of the Indian Merchandise to Caire and Alexandria. Which mad worke, Sesoftris preuented by death could not performe; and Ptolomess otherwise persuaded by skilfull men, in time gaue over; for feare left by letting in the great South fea into the Mediterranean, he should thereby as it were with another generall deluge have drowned the greatest part of Grecia, and many other goodly cnuntries in Asia, and with exceeding charge, in stead of honor, have purchased himfelfe eternall infamy. Yet by the fingular industry of Solyman the Eunuch, who with seuere commandement inforced all the people of the countries therabouts to the furtherance of the K building of that fleet; he had with wonderfull celerity in short time new built eighty tall ships and gallies at Arsinoe, and furnished them with men, and all things else needfull for so long a voyage. Atwhich time he vpon a quarrell pickt without cause, but not without the good liking of Solyman, most injuriously confiscated the goods of the Venetian merchants at Alexandria and Cairc, and thrust the marriners into his gallies as slaves. With which fleet in most wariake manner appointed, Solyman the Bassa, accompanied with Assam-Bee, commonly called the Moore of Alexandria, a most samous pyrat and an excellent sea-man, set forward against the Portingals: and failing thorow the Red sea, and so Eastward by the gulfe of Persia, came at length as far as the great river Indus; where with all his power he affaulted Dium a Diuma cassile of castile of the Portingals, scituate vpon the mouth of that great river: but in conclusion, after he the loringalic cattle of the Portingals, icituate upon the mouth of that great fluerious in concluming and in the Eafting had many daies be fieged the castle both by sea and land, and tried the uttermost of his strength, dist in vaine he was forepulsed by the Portingals, that he was glad to for sake the siege, & leaving his great ordnance behind him for hast, returned backe againe to Aden, a city of great trade in Arabia Fœlix : where discouraged with the euill successe he had against the Portingals, because he would be thought to have done fomething, he allured the king of that rich city to comevnto thority about him, now that Abraham was dead) turned all his forces from the Persians, as men agreeing with him in the chiefe points of his Mahometan superstition, with purpose to convert the same upon Italy : whereunto he was carnedly solicited by John Forrest the French Kings Embassador, then lying at Constantinople of purpose to incite Solyman against Charles Solymanine ind the Emperour, affuring him that he was not of fuch power, as at one time to defend Apulia Emballade to against him, and the Dukedome of Millaine against the French King, who (as he faid) was de-innade list, termined that Summer to inuade that part of Italy. And to further the matter, about the fame time one Troilsu Pignatellus, a noble gentleman, sometime commander in Charles the Emperors army, but then exiled out of Naples, fled vnto Solyman; and forasmuch as he was a man B of name, and like to do him great service in the invasion of Apulia, as one which knew the country well, and promifed vnto him good successe in that wars, was by Solyman honourably entertained among & his Mutfaracas; which is a certaine company of horfemen for their approved valor, choicn out of all nations; having the free exercise of their religion what society without controllement, and are onely bound to attend upon the person of the great Turke when he goeth to wars. The cause of his reuolt was, for that the Viceroy of Naples had executed Andrew hisbrother, one of the Knights of the Rhodes. But being now growne into great fauour with Solyman and the Baffaes, and oftentimes called to counfell in the preparation of that war casting off all natural lone of his country, ceased not by all meanes to persuade Solyman to invade the fame, affuring him, that the people of Apulia and Salerne, oppressed with gricuous tribute and exactions by the Emperors officers, would at the first revolt, especially if they faw any of the French nation to cleave unto. And that which moved him more than all the rest, the antient Turks told him into what a feare al Italy was strucken at such time as Achmetes the Basia having taken Hydruntum, had vindoutedly conquered not only the kingdome of Naples, but the city of Rome also, and all the rest of Italy, had not the vntimely death of Mahomet. his great grandfather interrupted the course of that victory. Which persuasions Solyman with wrought fuch effect in Solyman, that he, once fully refolued for the invalion of Italy, made an army of two fuch expedition both by fea and land, that he himfelfe in person was come with two hundred fand men comthousand men vnto Aulona, the most convenient port of Macedon for the transporting of his meib to Aulona army, before it was thought in Italy that he was fet forward from Constantinople: where he D had not long staid, but Lutzie Baffa his Admiral, accompanied with Barbaruffa, failing along st the coast of Peloponesus and Epirus, and so passing by Corcyra, where Hieronimus Pisaurius, Admirall of the Venetian fleet lay with his gallies (after mutuall falutation done after the manner of fea, by (hooting off their great pieces in token of friend (hip) put into the hauen of Aulona alfo. Solyman not purposing to lose any time, and having Italy now in his fight com- solyman studies manded Lutzis and Barbarussa to passe over with the seet vnto Otranto, and to prove the barussa with minds of the people; that if the first enterprise fell out well, he might presently sollow after bu steers inwith all his army. With them went also Troilus Pignatellus, as forward to the destruction of "nade Italy. his country, as any of the rest. He knowing that the great Cities of Hydruntum and Brundusium were kept with strong Garrisons of Charles the Emperour; leaving Hydruntum on E the right hand, directed the Turks to a Towne you the Sea-coast, eight miles off, called Cafrum, neere vnto which standeth a castle vpon a hill then belonging to Mercuriniu Catinariw: who being a man vnacquainted with warres, and terrified with the sudden comming of the Turks, and perfuaded by Troilus, yeelded up his Castle, upon condition, That the Turks should offer no violence or injury vnto him or his either in body or goods. Vpon which con- Caffram in Adition the Towne of Castrum was also delivered vnto them. But the Turkes, especially pulsayetted to the greedy marriners, being got into the Castle and the Towne, moved neither with the in- ibem contrary treaty of Troilus, nor the commandement of Lutzis and Barbarussa, risted the Towns and Ca. to their said file, and carried away with them Mercurinus himselfe, with all the source of the people, to poled. their gallies as prisoners. But Lutzis ashamed of such faithlesse dealing, presently set Mer-F curinua at liberty againe. At the same time also, Solyman had by night sent ouer certaine troupes of light horiemen, in great Palendars; which running all alongs the sea coast from Tarentum to Brundusium, carried away with them both the people and cattell, and whatfocuer else came in their way by the space of forty miles. So that all that Countrey of Sa The Turker

was like enough to have overwhelmed all Italy, by the comming over of Selymon with his & was like enough to make rathnesse of one Venetian captaine by vnexpected chance times that tempest from the Italians upon the Venetians themselves.

Alexander Contarenus, a valiant captain of the Venetians, meeting with certain of the Turks gallies, which would neither vaile their top failes, nor in token of reuerence and friendfhip gatties, which would here great ordinance, as of duty they ought to have done in those fear, where the Venetians commanded; offended with their proud infolency, fiercely affailed them, and in fight funke two of them: wherein V stamenes Gouernour of Callipolis, a man of no small reputation among the Turks, was reported to have perished. Which outrage don by Comarage in a most wifit time (to the great hurt of the Venetian estate, as it appeared afterward) was inputed to his owne privat grudge which he bare against the Turks, for that they intercepted H thip of his as the was comming out of the East countries laden with rich merchandile fothat it was thought, that he to pleafe himselfe in reuenging of his own privat injury, regarded not what in that dangerous time might enfue thereof to the common state.

A little before the comming ouer of the Turks into Italy, Andreas Aureathe Emperous Admirall lying at Messana in Sicilia, understanding that Selyman was come with his army to Aulona, and that his fleet was arrived there also, put to sea, directing his course towards the Islands of Caphalenia and Zacynthus, hoping (as indeed it fell out) to meet with thotaile of the Turks fleet: for there according to his expectation he chanced vpon divers of the Turks victuallers, whom he easily tooke. The marriners he chained in his owne gallies for saues, and innuleimmit furnishing his fleet with the victual, which was not for him provided, fired the ships. Whileh rwo getter, dri. Aurea was thus beating too and fro in the Ionian fea, it fortuned that Solyman fent lumbery netion upon his chiefe interpreter, a man whom he made no small account of, with two gallies on a mesthe Acreferan- fage to Lutzis his Admirall. This proud Turke comming necre vnto Corcyra, where the Venetian Admirall lay with his fleet, offered scornefully to passe, without vailing : which his pride tending to the difgrace of the Venetians, certaine of the Venetian captains not enduring, fet vpon him with such sury, that the Turks were enforced to run both their gallies on shore vpon the coast of Epirus, neere vnto the mountaines called Acroceraunii, where having escaped the danger at fea, they fell almost all into the hands of the cruell mountaine people, lining for the most part by thest, and waiting for wracks, as hawks for their prey : by these shauers the Turks were stript of all they had, and Iunusbeiss with much adoe redeeming, himselfe out of their g hands returned to Solyman. Aurea failing alongst the sea coast, chanced upon these gallies, and finding them fore brused, set fire on them.

For these vnkind parts, the Turks were wonderfully offended with the Venetians, and grieuously complained of them to Solyman: although the Venetian Admirali laboured by all means he could to appeale Iunus beius, and to excuse the matter as a thing done by great ouerfight on both fides. Vpon these small occasions, the Turks sought to breake off the league with the Venetians; which fell out so much the sooner, for that about the same time Auria failing up and down the Ionian sea, and diligently looking into every harbor to intercept such Auria takth as stragled from the Turks fleet, hapned by night to light vpon 12 of Solymans great gallies la of the Tarte necre vnto Corcyra, all filled with his Ianizaries and choise horsemen of the court, the best L gathire full of lattice of the Turks, who had by land fent their horses to the camp by their lackies, and were Salyman other comming themselves with the Ianizaries by sea. Auria falling vpon these gallies, had with them a cruell and deadly fight: for they as resolute men, wishing rather to die than to yeeld to their enemies, with inuincible courage maintained a most bloudy fight against Auria with his 30 gallies excellently appointed, untill such time as most part of them were slain, and the rest fore wounded; who seeing no remedy, but that they must needs come into the hands of their enemies, threw their seimiters ouerboord, because those choice weapons should not come into the hands of the Christians. In this conflict, Auria lost also many of his best soldiers: yet having got the victory, and possessed of the gallies, he ankered neere vnto Corcyra, there to take view of his own harmes and the enemies: but whilft he rid there at anker, he was aduertifed, that Barbaruffa was comming against him with 80 gallies. Wherefore knowing himselfe too weake to encounter fo strong an enemy, he departed thence, and returned against o Messa. na to repaire his fleet. Solyman thorowly chased with the losse of his gallies and best fouldiers, and with the double injury done vnto him by the Venetians, fellinto fuch a rage, that he curled bashareffs, as one who in thefeware had done him no good feruice and thundred out printiples throats against the Venetians; faying he was under the colour of an antient league; by them described and greatly abused, and that they were secretly consederated with Challet his enemy and had for thes cause (as they had alwaies) holpen duris with intelligence, and all things necessary, receiving him into their harbors, and by their espials giving him knowledge of the order of his fleet, that for he might at his own advantage furprischis gallies, as he had already done: Vnto which frej lumbeim his Interpreter, Barbaruffa, and Ajan, laid new coles, lanubeem; more and more increasing the tyrant, who was of himfelfe fusiciently inflamed; perfuading Afar, inferer him by all means they could, to breake the league with the Venetians. Wherein Imubeing Solyma against fought to renenge his own privat injuries; and the other two after their greater profit and creations dir gaping after the spoile of the Islands neer hand, especially of Corcyra (now called Corfu) Zacynthus and Cephalenia all fubica to the Venerian feigniory , finding the wars in Italy more dangerous and difficult than they had before imagined. For the French King came not then into Italy, as was by them expected : and it was commonly reported. That Petrus Teleta. me Viceroy of Naples, having put frong garrifons into the towns all along it the fea coaft.

was comming himselfe with a great army : beside that, the horsemen sent over from Aulona ranging about in the countrey of Salentum for spoile, were many times out off by Scipio Sommeiss a noble gentleman there Gouernor for the Emperor. Wherefore Solyman changing his solymateines purpole for the inualion of Italy, in his mad mood proclaimed war against the Venetians and to but force rifing with his army from Aulona, & marching along it the fea coast till he came over against on against the Coreyra, he incamped neer voto the mountains called Acroceraunij, where the flerce and wild Ventians.

people inhabiting the high and rough mountaine of Chimera, a part of the Acroceraunian mountains by the infligation of one Damianus a notable theefe, and very perfect in the blind and difficult passages among it the rocks and woods in those desolate mountains; conspired to attempt a most strange and desperat exploit, which was, by night to spoile Solyman in his solymi in danown pauilion. These beggetly wild rogues living for most part by murther and robbery, altogether without law or any maner of religion in hope of fo great a prey, and to become famous in the midt of in killing one of the greatest Monarchs of the world in the midst of his strength, garded with blast my fo many thousands of his foldiers; were not afraid of any danger, how great focuer, hoping in the dead time of the night to seale into the camp undiscourred, and there so to oppresse so nough to have performed, to the astonishment of the world, had it not bin by chance disco. uered : for when they had put all things in readinesse for that purpose, Damianus ringleader of these desperat sauage people, by secret water stealing downe the broken rockes of those huge mountains, and comming very neer the camp, to view the standing of Solymans paullion, with the order of the Turks watch, was by the crack of a bough efpyed by the lanizaries, where he flood in a tree prying all oner the camp : and being there taken, and afterward put to torture, and confessing what he had intended, was by the commandement of Solyman torne in pieces. Wherupon he forthwith sent a great part of his army vp into the mountaines, which hunting after these wild people as if they had bin wild beasts, slew many of them, and by Solymans appointment did what they possibly could to have quite destroied them, as an infamous people, enemy to all men.

When Solyman had thus fully reuenged himselse vpon this barbarous nation, he purposed dethethe thank to inuade the Island of Corcyra, now called Corfu, part of the Venetian Seigniory : fending of coregra. before Barbaruffa with his great Artillery, whom he had but a little before called out of Italy with his forces, Pifanras the Venetian Admirall in good time perceiving the tyrants purpose, frengthned the garrisons in both the Castles of Corfu, with new supplies of good fouldiers fent out of the gallies and knowing himfelfe vnable to incounter with the Turks great fleet at fea, withdrew himfelfe farther off from the Island, into the gulf of the Adriatick, to the intent to ioine his power with Jonnes Veturing, who kept that sea with another fleet of the Venetian gallies, and fowith ioyned forces to defend the Venetian coasts against the Turks : whom he thought himselfe strong enough for with the help of Peturim and of Amid, whose comming Was dayly expected. Solyman lending a great part of his army out of the Main, into the Island, burnt and definoyed the country villages, leading away a wonderfull number of poore courpeople into most miserable captivity. Onely the castle called S. The Turks the more to terrific them of Corfu, taking a hill not far from the city, covered the same with their generated from the rock called Maripetrus, that with their great ordnance into the town: some of them in the meane time standing close in the ruines of the suburbs, did with their harquebusies kill on wound them which appeared upon the walsthe gallies also did oftentimes out of their proweffe discharge their great pieces against the city, to the greater terror than hurtof the deserdants. Solyman perceiving that he did but lose his labour in besieging the city (as hewas told at the first by his great captains, Lutzis, Ajax, &t Barbaruffa) determined now to raise his siege, and to return to Constantinople, greatly ashamed that he had no better sped neither in Italy, K nor at the fiege of Corfu. But when he was about to have departed, it was told him how who faithfully some of his foldiers had dealt with them of Castrum in Italy, who yeekling themfelues vpon the Turks faith to them given for the safegard of their liberty and goods, wereneuertheles most injuriously spoiled of all that they had, and carried away into bondage which fact, as tending to the dishonor of his name, and the deterring of others from yeelding, soly, man took in so euill part, that for amending therof, he caused the authors of that fact to be put to death, and the captiues of Castrum to be diligently sought out, and sent home agains into their countrey; well deserving therinthe commendation of a most iust Prince, The Turks left the fiege of Corfu, and departed out of the Island about the twelfth of September, in the yere mili tot about 1537; carrying away about fixteen thouland of the Island people into perpetual captuity. L So Solyman rifing with his army marching through Acarnania and Atolia, returned through Macedonia to Constantinople having in this his expedition done great harme both in Italy and Corcyra, but yet nothing increased his empire or honour.

Before his departure, calling vnto him Lutzu his Admirall, he commanded him alfotore. turne with his fleet to Hellespontus: who passing by Zacynthus; and landing some of his men in the night, took divers of the countrey people prisoners. But understanding that the City it felfe was both strong and well manned, he departed thence to Cychera, where unfortunitely attempting to have taken the castle, and disappointed of his purpose, he made what spoyla he could upon that Island, and with 800 prisoners returned into Ageum to Agyna, a rich and for mous Island, and well peopled both with mariners and other Inhabitants, Approaching the Island, he by his messengers sent before vnto the Gouernour of the City , strempted firsh faire means, and afterwards by threats, to have had the City yeelded vnto his and not to peruailing, but perceiuing them to stand vpon their desence, he landed his men, and gave the fig-

Wherwith the Admiral grieuously offended, and still landing fresh men, even with his multitude oppressed them of the Island, being but sew in number. and weary of long fight, and so inforced them to retyre into the city.

To be revenued of this injury, the Bassa caused certain great pieces of ordnance to be Jan. As for the women, he gaue them without respect vitto the lust of his foldi. ers and mariners; whom afterwards together with the boies and young children he shipt into B the country neer Athens, to be from thence conveyed vnto Constantinople, into most miserable seruitude.

Againg thus yetterly rafed, he with much like force and cruelty raged you them of Paros and the other Islands therabouts, killing the old men and such as made resistance, & thrusting the rest into his gallies. Shortly after he came to the Isle of Naxos, where all the Island peoplewere for fear of his comming fled out of the country into the city, where landing his men hemade havock of what focuer came to hand. And in the mean time fent a meffenger to the Duke to wil him to yeeld himself and his city into the obedience of the Turkish Emperous Soliman. Which messenger admitted into the city, and brought before the duke, in blunt and plain terms, without further circumstance, deliuered his message thus:

If thou wilt without more ado yeeld thy felf thy city and territory to the Constantinopolitan Emperor. A blunt pecch thou shalt deferue his favor, and so save thy selfe with that thou halt. But if thou, otherwise aduited. Shalt of a Turk fent pow refule this grace, thou shall never have the like offer but for ever undo thy selfe thy wife & children, Nazol, thy citifens, and lubiests in generall. Here is present a most mighty fleet, with most valiant and vistorious foldiers, furnished with all the habiliments of war requisit for battell or siege. Be warned by them of Aging. Pares, and other thy neighbor Princes of the I flands. Thy hap is good if thou be not misaduited. and (warned by other mens harms) wilfully refuse to remedy thy owne; and when thou mighist be safe. wilfully cast away tby felf.

This faid he was commanded by the duke to fland a fide, and a white to expect his answer: who with the chief of his subjects there present, but much troubled, and all full of heavinesse and forrow, confulted what answer to make. But after they had according to the weightinesse of the cause, and necofficy of time fully debated the matter, it was generally agreed, That forassuch as they were not themselves of power to withstand so furious an enemy, neither to exped forhelp from others, they thould therfore yeeld into the present necessity (which otherwife threathed vitto them vited destruction) & referrie themselves vnto better rimes. Wherupon answerwas given vnro the messenger by the Duke, That he was ready to yeeld himself vnto Solyman as his Vaffet, and of him as of his Soueraign to hold his feignfory for the yearlytributed of voco duckets. Of which offer the Balla occepted, receiving in hand one yeares Naxos becomes B tribute. So was that notable Island yeelded vitto the Turkish obelfance the 11 of November stibutary vitto Annor 537. From whence Lutwis the proud Bassa, laded with the rich spoil of the Countries the Turks. and Islands he had passed by returned to Constantinople with his sleet.

Not long after, this great Bassa (then next in credit and authority to Solyman himselfe) sel at ods with his wife Solymans fifter; for that he after the unnaturall manner of that barbarous people, kept in his house a most delicate youth, in whom he took more delight than in his wife. Wherwith the Bassa moved, gave her ablow on the care, and caused her as a foolish and inquier woman to be thut up in her chamber. But she not brooking fuch abuseicame weeping to Solyman her brother, & complaining of her husband, requefled to be divorced from him, who made no more reckoning of her. Solyman thus fallen out with the Venetians, as is aforefaid; to intangle them with Wars in divers places at once, commanded his Lieutenants in every place bordering vpon the Venetian Seigniory, to vex and molest them with all hostility, which they did accordingly. In Peloponesus Cassimes besieged Nauplium and Epidaurus, two strong Cities of the Venetians. Barbarussa landing his men in Dalmatia, surprised the antient city of Botrotus, belonging to the Venetians, caried away the Citisens, and rased the City. Obroatium another city of the Venetians in Dalmatia, called in antient time Argirutum, with the Castle of Nadin, were taken by Vitref, Solymans Lieutenant in Illyria.

The Venetians thus inuaded on every fide, required them again with the like. Fifantist and Veturim the Venetian Admirals landing their men, besieged Scardona a city of the Turkes in the borders of Dalmatia, which they took by force, put the Turks to the sword, & ouenthew the wals of the city, because it should be no more a refuge vnto the Turks. They sent also another of their captains called Gabriel Ribess, to besiege Obroatium, who vponthe comming of Amurathes one of Vstrefs Captaines, cowardly fled, and in flight lost most of his men. For which his cowardise Pisaurius caused his head to be strook off aboord the Admiral gally. And Camillus Vrsinus, appointed by the Venetian state governor of Iadera, a strong Town sponthe K. frontiers of their territory in Dalmatia, took from the Turks the town of Oftovizza, which he burnt down to the ground. He recovered also Obroatium, which was a little before loft; and by commandement from the Senat veterly rafed it, as a place not well to be kept against the

The same Autumn that Solyman having wasted Cornyra, returned to Constantinople; and the Venetians held wars with the Turks for the towns and castles in Dalmatia; King Feeds. nand received such an overthrow at Exek by the Turks, as a greater or more shamefull vnto the name of the Christians was hardly seen in that age, if the instead the choice souldiours and Captains of four great Nations, with the shameful flight of the General bewell considered. After the battell of Mohatez, wher in King Lewis was loft, the Turka having gotten the L victory, kept vnto themselues, that part of Hungary which is called Possega, because thereby they had a fit paffage from Belgrade farther into Hungary. The two great Rivers of Saus and Dranus running almost with equall distance from the Worth, taking with them divers other smaller Rivers, before they fall into the great River of Danubius Hastward, do on both fides inclose this countrey of Pollega, being a rich and plentiful! Countrey, and wonderfully well peopled. It bordereth upon the Provinces of Groatia and Corbania, which intimes past were in continuall warres with the Turkish Garrisons there by in Ellyran, and also in

Mahometes

At that time one Mahameter a most valiant captain of the Turktimes governor of Belgrades to whom for his approoued valour and wifedome salymen had specimised the keeping of M those Fronticts, and the protection of the kingdomof Hungary in the behalft of Kingdom. He the year before had fo wied the marry, that what by force, what by policy he had taken from the Christians about thirty small Castles in the Country (which was formetime apart of the patrimony of the Despot of Rassia) and had bined them to the regiment of Bossia

A One of these castles among st the rest, called Exck, for the commodious scituation therof he frongly fortified, as that which might give him passage over the river Dranus into Hungary from whence he fet infinit preys out of King Ferdinands country neer vnto him. Yet was there at that time a certain league betwixt Solyman and Ferdinand, which notwithstanding af. An evil allo ter the old custom of those Countries, for the exercise of the garrison soldiers, did bear with red Linguis, thetaking of booty, and light skirmi (hes, without any breach thereof: fo that it were done without any great power or field pieces. Which wrong-named peace Mathias & other kings of Hungary had of long time vled with the Turks, doing them with their nimble light horsemen no lesse harm than they received. But the Germans now vsing no such light horsemen. but feruing vpon great horses, and charged with heavy armour, received great hurt by those B light skirmishes; the Turks with their light horses casily shunning their charge, and again at their pleasure charging them asresh, when they saw the heavy German horses almost wearie

and fpent: by which means the German horimen were oftentimes by the Turks light horfemen ouerthrown, and so either slain or taken. King Ferdinand not well brooking these conti- K. Ferdinand nual injuries, and grieued in mind at the league which Solyman had to his profit made with with the Terbe him at his going into Persia, finding the same both unprofitable and hurtfull to himselfe, determined to take vp arms, with purpose that if he could drive the Turks out of the Country of Possega, then forthwith to passe ouer Dranus, and to go directly to Buda against king John, It fill flucke in his minde, how that kingdome was taken from him by Solyman, and that more was, as it were in difgrace of him and the House of Austria, bestowed upon a stranger, which had neither right thereo, nor was any way royally descended. Yet there were some that wished him not rashly to enter into arms against so mighty an Enemy, as was not to be vanqui-

thed but by the vnited forces of all the Christian Princes of Europ. For they forefaw, that Soliman fo prouoked, would not put it vp, but for the hatred he bare against the Christians, and for his honour, feeke more cruell revenge: as he had of late don against the Venetians, with whom youn a light occasion he had broke an antient League, for finking one or two of his gallies for which he would admit no excuse or satisfaction. All this Ferdinand knew to bee true: yer all the people of his dominions lay fo carneftly vpon him to take that war in hand, that they faid plainly, they would neuer bear arms more against the Turks, if he omitted that occasion. For they of Carinthia, Stiria, Croatia and Noricum, subject to the invasion of the D Turks, & daily receiving great harms, thought the Turks might eafily be driven out of Posfega, for somuch as Mahametes had no great power, nor like to haue any greater, Autumn now almost spent. 1. So King Ferdinand with the wonderful rejoicing of his subjects, caused soldiers to be takenvp in all parts of his kingdom, fending for most of his nobility and best captaines, as to a Religious War: and in a very short space had raised a good Army, yet supposed of greater Arength than number, as confishing most of select men. The footmen were for most part Germanes; towhom were joined as wings certaine Companies of Italians, harquebusiers, whom Lewis Lodronius, a valiant captain, and General of the footmen, had raifed in Rhetia and those parcrof Italy which lie neer unto the Alps. The horfmen were of Bohemia, Silefia, Moravia, Stiria, Carinthia, and some also out of Hungain; all conducted by their several captains. All these horsmen were in number 8000, but the sootmen were a 6000 strong, with great store of artillery of all fores. This army for the experenes and valor of the foldiers, was thought sufficient to have met the greatest army of the Turks in field, if it had been conducted by a politique General, and (as he had at other times bin) fortunatiwhich was one John CazZianer a no- cazzianer Gebleman of Croatia, whom as one of great experience, and famous for the late defence of Vimeral of King enna, King Ferdinand had made General of his Army. For Fordinand by the aduice of his best Ferdinand army. friends neuer vsed to aduenture his person vnto the danger of any battell, especially against the Turks, by whom many Christian Kings had in former time bin vanquished and slain, but performed all his wars by his lieutenants: which he was thought to do not fo much for want p of courage, as moued with the fatal mishap of so many Christian Kings. Mahometes gouernor Mahometes go of Belgrade vaderstanding of this preparation made against him, sent for divers companies of were of action the garrison sould like which have point the borders near hand, her required aid of the Gouer-the other Tara nours of the Turks prouince thereabouts, and was especially holpen by Pfref Gouernour of till captains, Bosna, who of all Solymans Lieutenants in Europ, was able to bring into the field most good Mmm 3

horsemen, he sent him Amurathes a samous Captaine with a great companie of gallant horse. G men, vnto whom were joined certain companies of footmen of the wild and mountain people of Dalmatia, entertained for pay; which rough and rude kinde of people were governed and of Dailitatia, the train companies of Ianizaries drawn out of the garrifon towns as farre as Belgrade and Samandria. After whom followed many out of Servia and Rascia, some for pay, some for prey: the Turks Receiver liberally paying to such as were: willing to serve, two months pay before hand. Neither wanted he aid of the Hungarians from Buda. So that the Turkish governors on every side putting to their helping hands, Mahometes, had in short time gathered such an army, as for number and strength was not much inferior to King Ferdinandi, and resolved to expect the comming of his enemies at Exek. Cazzianer was now come as far on his way as Caprunza, a town vpon the river Dranus; having before well and conveniently H prouided for the victualling of his army, if they whom he put in truft, and had taken the mat. ter voon them, had with like speed and diligence performed their charge: for they were the chief men of all the Countrey; who all followed the direction of Symon Bishop of Zagrabia; who inflamed with zeal aboue measure, or else for want of judgement deceiued, had promifed to fetue the whole Campe with plenty of victuals at a very low rate. Which thing the Country people which were to bring in the victual, some by wagon, some by boats along the Rivers, many difficulties now arifing, were not able to perform; which was not to be remedied by reason of the neernesse of the enemy; and also for that Mahometes with small gallies in both Rivers, and his troups of horimen pricking up and down the country, did either flay the country people from bringing of victuall, or els allured them for a greater price to bring it to his I. own Camp, where they received ready money. Cazzianer fetting forward from Cantumes. hardly came in ten dayes to the Castle of Veruza, which is about forty miles distant from Caprunza; being inforced to make short marches, by reason of the troublesome carriere of some great pieces of Artillery for battery. The wifer fort began even then to missionbt the want of victuals, both for the reasons before alledged, and for that such victuals as they losked for came not, although they marched very foftly; fo that they were then inforced to fpend fuch victuall as they had prouided not for the beginning, but for the difficulties of a long protracted War. Wherof Gazzdaner wrot sharply to the Bishop, and to the others who had taken upon them the charge of prouiding vi Quall for the Army commanding them to vie all possible diligence and speed, and not to let the hope of a most assured victory to be less E through their negligence, for want of victuall, rather than the valout of the enemy. In the mean time Cazzianer thought good there to stay, and to expect the comming of victuali, ferding before him Paulus Bachitius with a thouland Hungarian light horimen, and certain companies of Italian harquebusiers, as far as the Gastle of Zopia, to the intent he might of such prisoners as he could take, learn somthing of the enemies purpose. The Turks in the Castle of Zopia descrying the comming of Bachitims, and thinking the whole Army of the Christian ans had bin at hand, fet fire on the Castle, which they thought they could not keeps, and by boats fled down the river Dranus. Yet for all their haft, Bachitism took some of them in their flight, of whom Cazzianer learned that which he before knew by his own espials, That Make metes and the Turks lay incamped at Exek, with a full resolution to give him bastell. Called L. ner fetting forward again, still keeping alongst the river of Dranus, came in eight daies to the castle of Walpowhere by the way he was glad to stay seven daies at the river Czassus, which falleth into Dranus, vntill fuch time as a bridge was made for the transporting of his Army, for that the river was not to be waded over rin which time Gazzianer entred oftentimes into counsell with the other Captains, what course to hold for the better proceeding in that war. Where divers men were of divers opinions: fome faid it were best to leave Exek, and to be fiege a cattle of the enomies thereby, called Villach. Others more waty than the reft, were of opinion, That it were better there to flay vntil the rest of the aid and wish until which they expected dayly, were come. But the greater number (which also prevailed) viged the first determination, of going directly to the enemy at Exek, for that longer delay would but breed M further danger; and there was in the Camp (as they faid) both ftrength and widwal fufficient for the obtaining of the victory, if they would make an end of their needlesse Consultations, and not protract the Warre vntill that Winter were come on swherby they did nothing elle but cause most of the soldiers to think that they were assaid to meet the Briemy , and secretly

A to fleat back again into their countries. Wheras if they would like resolute men march on forward against the enemy, who at other times trusting most vnto his multitudes, and now hauing no great power, would neuer abide the fight of the Christian Army, bringing with it fo much Artillery, but forthwith forfake the place and neuer shew his face : forasmuch as the Christian men at Armes would (as they said) easily breake thorow and ouerthrow the naked Turkish horsmen, if they durst abide the field. The yong fouldiers, who had never made proof as vet of the Turks maner of fight, did with fuch cheerfulnes like of this resolution that they thought two daies stay a long delay of so ready and easie a victory. Wherfore it was resolned voon presently to set forward, and therupon the Army was mustred : where voon view taken there was found to be 10000 horsmen (for divers troups of Germans were come vnto the B Camp after the time of the first setting sorward of the Army) a more gallant company of horsmen, both for the strength of the horses, and goodly furniture of the men, had seldom bin feen in an Army fo suddedly raised. But the footmen, selected out of all the provinces, were greatly diminished, being now in number scarce 8000 strong; for many were sick in the camp: others weary of the long journy, lingring behind were ftoln away : and generally al they that were left, moy led with dirt and myre by reason of the deepnes of the rotten way, wet thorow with rain, and almost started with cold, and therto pinched with hunger, were thought scarce able to endure the hardnesse of the present War. After that, commandement was given, that every foldier should carry with him three dayes victuall; and proclamation made, That no man should voon pain of death take any Turke prisoner, although he yeelded himselfe, or C charge himself with any spoil before the battel were fully ended; for that the Captains would afterwards divide the spoil of the enemy amongst the fouldiers. This proclamation made thorow the camp, they let forward towards Exek, and the third day they came to a certain valley about three miles from Exek, where the incamped. The next day a company of Turks fhewed themselues, who were by the great ordnance repulsed. The day following, the enemy fallied out of the Towne, and skirmished oftentimes with the Christians: in which skir-skirmish with mishes many were slain on both sides, but more wounded of the Christians, for that the Turks the Christiante had politiquely mingled certain Ianizaries, harquebusiers, and archers, with their horsemen : who, vied to that maner of fight, fore gauled the Christian horsemen. For which cause the Generall forbad all fuch light skirmilher, as purposing to keep his strength whole against the D generall day of battell: commaunding his Cannoniers fo to place the great Ordnance as might most annoy the enemy if he should shew himselfe by troups within the danger of the shorwhich was so wel performed, that the Turks fallying forth received thereby great hurt, the great shot flying through the midst of their companies. The same day Symon Bishop of Zagrabia came into the Camp with his horimen, and a certain prouision of victuall, whereby the fear of the want before conceiued, was wel eased. Mahametes perceiuing that the Christianswere not longer to be drawn to those harmful skirmishes, but that he must bring himself within the danger of the great shot; to annoy them by another means, sent many small Boats manned with harquebusiers and small pieces of ordnance, into the lake neer vnto the Campe, fo to keep the Christians from warring there, and with those small pieces shot oftentimes in-E to the campi Neer to the vally where the Christians lay, was a hill, wherupon stood a village, wherinwere placed certain Companies of Turks, to skirmish as occasion should serue with the Christians: for displacing of whom, the whole Army was straitway pur in order of battel, and the great Artillery bent vpon them, that they should not with their light skirmishes, after the Turkish manner of fight, trouble the order of the Army. Which thing the Turks perceiting, and that they were not able to hold the place, fet fire on the towne, and so retyred to Exek. The Christians keeping on their march, came to the top of the hill, for whence they The Christians might fee Exek stand about two miles off in a fair plain neer to the bank of Dranus: all which some within low ground betwire the hil and Exek was fo subject to the castle, that it was thought a mat- fabre of Exek. ter too ful of danger, to attempt that way to batter the castle, and expose the army to the ine-F vitable fury of the enemies shot. Wherfore descrying a rising ground on the farther side of the city, equal with the top of the wals, they thought it belt to remove their camp thither, &c on that fide to plant their battery against the city. But to come to that place was thought very troublesome; for they must fet a compasse three miles on the right hand thorow a forrest by a foul and trouble for way, before they could come to the place they defired for the army was not so great to besiege the city round; wherin were not (as is reported) about 16000 men, G neither was there such store of victuals in the camp, but that the Army was like soon to feel the want therof, without a continual supply, which would hardly be had, the enemy stil befer. ting every passage, and with his light horsmen scouring about all the country, of purpose to keep them from victual. For which cause some were of opinion, that it was best to stay where they were, till such time as both more aid and better store of victuals were come to them:but others of the contrary mind, said the enemy was but barely stored with victual himselfe, and therefore could not long hold out. Which they faid they understood by certain Christian fugitiues; and that Mahometes had put his chief substance into certain boats, to be conueyed down the river, as purposing to fly, and would not hold out the siege aboue three daies. As so the forrest, they thought it might wel enough be past thorow, if they would couragiously set H forward. Besides that, the time of the year suffered no delay, winter comming fast on, and except some notable thing were don quickly, they should be inforced by the very time of the year to return with shame, without doing any thing. This opinion was best liked of, as more honorable, and better beseeming men of valor, than to ly stil in one place: wherupon the next day the Army remoued, and in good order marched thorow the forrest. Which thing Mahe. The Turks thir metes quickly perceiuing, presently sent out a thousand light horsmen, and certain companies of lanizaries, harquebusiers, to trouble the Christians in their passage: who by a neerer & wel Christian par. known way ouertaking the Army, suddenly charged the rereward, wherin the Italian and Bo. hemians marched. The Bohemians quickly fled, and the Italians had much ado to endure the charge: but being relieued by the Carinthian men at arms, they notably repulsed the Turks, and put them to flight. So the army with small losse passed the forrest, and came to the place they defired where after they had incamped themselves, and in good order placed all things needful for the fiege, they in feemly order offered the enemy battel, but he keeping himfelie within the town, that at the Christians with his great ordnance: and they to requite him, with two great pieces which they had placed vpon the hil, fhot thorow both the wals of the Town and the bulwark alfo, to the great terror of the defendants. The Christians in the mean time having flood almost al the day in order of battel in fight of the enemy, vainly expecting when he should come forth to give them battel, returned at night into their Camp. For Mahometer vpon great confideration kept in his foldiers, although they were most desirous to fight, vnto fight with derstanding right wel of the want of victual in the Christian camp; and besides that (as the K. fugitiues reported) beeing streitly commanded by letters from Solyman, That he should not vpon pain of a most shamefull death for sake the place, but to defend it to the last. Now the Christians desirous of battel, being thus delayed and deceived of their expectation, had in a few daies spent the smal store of victuals they had, and began to feel a general want: norwas there any apparant means how they should be relieved. So that every man beganto feare fome general mischief to ensue. When Balthazar Pamphilm a noble Hungarian, and a Captain of great experience, fitting in counsel with the rest, entred into this speech :

Balthazar hu Captains (faid he) we do all that we do, unaduisedly: for whilf we consult at large how more may onercomfelfore. Come our ensmies, the strength of our army is in the mean time so weakned for want of withank, that the L fouldiers are neither well able to stand on their legs, nor to hold their weapons in their feeble hands : and generally even they which are of greatest courage begin now to quaile, and despairing of battell, set hat they must miserably and shamefully perish for want. Wherefore in my opinion wee ought first and about all things most speedily to provide for this want, which so gricususly pincheth us, and presently to remove hence unto the caftle of Hermande, that with the prouision theref, which is not like to be little, we may to, > town. Wherin fortune to fauoured him, that it was at his first comming surrendred vato him. but when he had it, he found not therein any such store of corne or victuall as hee had hoped fiesh our whole army and so relieved to proceed further as occasion shall require. This castle was about ten miles from Exek, whereinto many of the Turks had conveyed their wives and children, and chiefest substance, being kept with a small garrison of 20 Turks. Fast by the castlewas a pretty little walled town without flankers, after the maner of the old M fortifying: which town and caftle Balthazar faid would eafily be won. This his counsel was wel liked of all men, and he himself sent with certain Companies of souldiers to take in the

A for, yet he took there certain vessels of wine, to the great relief of the weak souldiers. Voor the news of the taking of this town, the camp removed from Exek about ten a clock at night, but so disorderly, that the soldiers scarce knowing their own ensignes, seemed rather to have fled for fear, than marched for spoil. Yet the Turks for all that moved not out of Exek, misdoubting some deceit, and loth to attempt any thing rashly in the night. When the Army was come to the town, the captains took order that the victual there found was equally divided among ft the foldiers; and the next morning battery laid against the Castle, which those few Turks valiantly defended half a day, and then by composition yeelded it. But when the The castle of castlewas taken, there was found in it but two barrels of meal, and other two of Millet. Then ded to the Chris might a man haue seen the captains themselues hanging their heads, as men strucken with a sians, sudden sear, who in stead of a great prey, & victual to have served many daics, sound nothing but a few women & children, and scarce so much victual both in the town and castle as would ferue the army two daies. Yet they diffembled the matter, and fed the foldiers with hope of better store after the bridge was once repaired, that they might passe the river of Bodrog. which ran by the town: which bridge the Turks had before, for their own defence, broken, by plucking voof certain piles, and taking away of the planks, wherfore the carpenters being fet onworke, and enery man putting to his helping hand, the bridge was with continual labor in 3 daies repaired. The fourth day the wagons and smaller pieces of Ordnance passed over the bridge, and after them fixe of the great pieces for battery; but the bridge ouercharged with the feuenth, which was of a wonderful weight, and much greater than the reft, began to break: C so that the captains were inforced to break that fair piece of ordnance, & so by pieces to cary it away, that the enemy should not get so great a spoil. All things being thus wel past ouer, the piles were again cut down, and the planks struck off, to the intent the enemy should not that way pursue them; and other way there was none, but to fetch a compasse about the great Lake, which was many miles about. Here the captains began to consult, whether it were best to break the great pieces of Ordnance, that fo they might more speedily march away, or not. Of which opinion was Cazzianer himself, promising of his own charge to new cast them. As cazzianer to for the scaling ladders and other like things provided for the siege, they burnt, because they retite more bethould not come into the enemies hand, or trouble themselves in their march. But most of the Captains were of opinion, that it was not best so dishonourably to breake those goodly treat ordinates D pieces, the greatest ornament and defence of their Country; but to hold on their march tho-

row Possega, vntil they came to Itivanea, where they should find great store both of Corne and wine:which town with the castle of Gara fast by it, stored with all manner of provision, they faid would eafily be taken before the Turkes could possibly come so far about the Lake from Exek; and that it were a great shame so to returne without doing any thing. Cazzianer thus perfuaded, fet forward, and with great toil (by teafon of the deepnes of the way, and heavines of the great ordnance) came by night to Iuvanca, which was but three miles off; where the Turks having with incredible celeritie passed a long journey, arrived at the same time also. Neer vnto this castle was a little town out of which all the Turks were fled the towns men being Christians, opened the gates and received in the souldiers; who there filled themselves abundantly with wine and could hardly be driven out thence by their captains to the Camp.

The same night the Turks burnt the same town, and what soeuer the Christians had left therin; and enery manbetook him to his armor in the camp, for the enemy was then at hand, and in the dawning of the day began horly to skirmish in divers places with the Christians, but especially in that quarter of the camp where the Bohemians lay. Wherwith Petrm Rafthimus general of the Bohemians being grieued, set voon them with a troup of his best horsinen, and inforced them to fly : but the Turks after the maner of their fight quickely returning againe, and relieued by the comming in of their fellows, befet the Bohemians on every fide, and flew many of them. Raschinius the Generall fighting most valiantly, was there slain with his follow wers. The Christian captains purposing to retyre home, placed on each side of the army four ranks of wagons for defence on both fides. In the vauward were placed the weak & fick men, yet fo, that in the front of the army were certain companies of lufty tall fouldiers; but in the rereward was placed the greatest strength both of horse and foot. The army thus marching as it were on both fides intrenched, as it oft times met with wooddy hills hindring their way, fodid the same fiely serve the Christians, that the Turks could not well affaile them in their

The larks fore march, both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiuing, sent before certain come G panies of Janizaries and nimble footmen which knew the country and paffages wel, with cer. panies of familiaries and mail pieces, to take the streits wherby the army was to passe, and foto gaul them in their paffage; and when they could keep the place, no longer, to fly backtoano. ther, and fo from place to place : and in the open places he had his troups of light horsemen, which were euer busse in one place or another of the army. By which meanes the Christians in their march received much harm, which grieved them the more, for that no great power of the Turks was any where to be feen together, but stragling companies; which as they were commanded, fomtime would come on with a fierce charge, and by and by retyre again, & with their arrows and falcon shot from places of advantage affail them. From one of these streits formwhat bigger than the rest, Paulus Bachitius one of the Hungarian Captains, in whome the H foldiers generally reposed their greatest trust, was slain with a falcon shot, with divers others of the valiant Hungarians; who seeing there a greater number of the Turkes than they had feen in other places, thought to have don fome good feruice vpon them. His death brought a general fear vpon the whole army, for a fmuch as then and at other times without him they neuer had any good fucces against the Turks. Yet in that skirmish, the Hungarians to revenge the death of their Captain, did with such force repulse the enemy, that they caused him after he had lost many of his men, to run away and leave his small pieces behind him. But such was the weaknes or cowardife of the Christian footmen, and the agility of the Turkes, especially the lanizaries, that they with their shot out of the woods staid the Hungarian horsmen from the pursuit of their fellowes, and recourred their small field, pieces before they could be care ried away by the Christian footmen; wherwith they did again fore run the Army still tron-. agentral fear bling it as before. The Christians beset with these dangers, and almost spent for want of vi-Qual; feeing no means to relieue their weak bodies, nor any hope to comfort their fainting spirits, did generally fear some extream calamitie to ensue; and so much the more for that it was reported, that Mahometer ftil expected fresh supplies from Belgrade, Samandria, and Nicopolis : and many of the Hungarian light horimen stole away from them, as careful of their own safety. Neither did they see any comfort in the dismaid captains, who at other times were wont with cheerful and couragious speeches to relieue the fouldiers, if they saw them any thing discouraged. But when they were come into a fair open field neer to a town called Gara, they were aduertised. That the Enemy had in the woods before them, wherby they were & to passe, cut downe great trees crosse the waies, so that neither their great Ordnance nor wagons, nor yet their horimen could possibly passe that way, but that they must needs breake much the more, for that Ladiflaus Moreus, and others which knew the country well, fain there was but two waies to escape 3 the one thorow the Woods about ten miles space to Walpo, which by reason of the trees cut down crosse the waies by the Turks, was not to be passed, but they must needs leave behind them their great ordnance and carriages the other towards the castle of Zenthuerzebeth, which was in Ladiflaus Morens his Countrey, certaine miles distant of necessitie be inforced to give ouer his pursuit. Yet for all that, it was in Councell resolued vpon, to take the way thorow the Woods of Walpo, for that there was there victualls enough, and in the Castle of Walpo was kept money fent from King Ferdinand, sufficient to pay the foldiers for all that Winter. And so leaving the great Ordnance behind them, and burning the pouder and what locuer els could not well be caried on horlebacke, to fet forward with all speed: as for the trees, they said they would bee wel enough remodued, and the way oppgad by the pioners and wagoners. Wherfore every captain was commanded to have his Chillians toe. foldiers in readines to fet forward upon figne given, which was by the found of a fhalm or hofrage the Turks boy, which when it should be given, was referred to the discretion of the General. There were she Turks durst neuer in iust fight incounter with the Christian men agarms, but like theeves. affail them vpon a sudden at some advantage, and by and by be gon again, and that the some

This once bruted thorow the army, filled them all with heavine fle and desperation; and so from Gara: by taking of which way, the enemy by reason of the streitnes of the passage, must L many which wonderfully disliked of this resolution, and said openly, that the enemy was few- M er in number than their horfmen, and pinched almost with like want of wictual : besides, That of Garawhere the enemy lay incamped, was not fo ftrong but that it might be worth herfore

all things were to be proudd, and fome great matter to be attempted of valuant men, pinched with wants for that to ran away, would be not only a dishonor vato the Captains themselves. who ought always to profer their honor before their lines, but alfodangerous to them, which respected ribeting buelife. And if they should fer forward in the night, many would be lost in the worlds and valour in the darke could not be known from cowardife : befides that when Emilie (asthen faid) lay fo nigh; that it was not possible to depart without their knowledge, efnecially if they should burn the ponder, or break the great Ordnance. For which canfer they thought it bedier to fight a battell with them, and not to beleeve the falle reports of new funoffice combolito them; and that God would undoubtedly glue them aid, which were ready to law down their lives for their Religion and glory of the Christian name. After all this they began to confult what was now to be done with the fick and wounded fouldiers, which were before carried inwaggons or among the other baggage of the atmy : for it was like, that fo great a multitude of fick and wounded men, understanding what was decreed concerning the departure of the army, would as milbrable forfaken men, fill the camp with lamentation and mourning, which is was shought would be also increased by the weeping and wailing of them which should acute afterwards see their brethren, kinsmen, fellows, or friends, so miserably and (hartefully left behind wid forfaken; the noise wheref, must need s come to the east of the Turks, which lay within a small gun shot. Wherefore it was determined, that these sidk and wounded foldiers should be carried upon the waggons and care horses; and that such as were not able to flay themselves, should beholden up by others of more strength riding behinde C them voon the buttocks of the horse. In fine, to color the matter, they which were so defirous to go, faid that this their manner of departure grounded vpon good reason, was not to be accounted a shamefull flight (as some would tearm it) but a right honest and necessary manner of retiring: for fine much us they were stronger than their enemies in horsmen, and equal also (if not fronger) in footmen, although they were fore weakned with ficknes. Whilft thefe things were in counsell diverfly discoursed, and the resolution set down as is before said, the matter was brought to this passe, that every captain with troubled judgement conceived in himself feciet cogitations, far from the common good; and without regard of thame & dishonor, bethought himselse how he might betake himselse to flight, the vicertain hope of desired life. On the contrary part, Mahometes vsing most certain spies, and advertised every houre of all the The vigilance distresses of the Christians, and therefore presaging his structure of All hy most distance of Mahometers. D distresses of the Christians, and therefore presaging his future victory; did by most diligent watch and eroups of horimen, befetting the passages far and neer, most vigilantly attend eucry motion in the Christian camp of purpose, that when the army should rise and fet forward, heafter his wonted manner might in the straits (fit for his purpose) set voon them being divided and dispersed one from another, as they must needs in those troublesome passages: for he had so placed his horsmen and footmen in the known tracts of those woods, that he had shut up the Christians as it were in a toile. It was now almost midnight, & the army taking no rest, fo carefully expected the figne of fetting forward, that every little delay feemed to most men both tedious and dangerous: so that many great captains upon a cowardly conceit would ftay The Christian no longer, but hasted to depart, and to go before the rest, without any leave of the general: the fully slie, lone beginning of this mischeuous departure, is reported to have bin begun by the common Hun- one way, some garian horimen, which knowing the passages & waies through the woods, made hast to Walpo. Ladiflaus Moreus dishonorably following their example, went the other way to his Castle Zenthuerzebeth. After them followed in great haste the Stirian horsemen, without regard of shame, led by John Hunganot their Generall, who was appointed to have guarded the rereward. Simen Bishop of Zagrabia fled in like manner, knowne by his great lanthorn wandring in the wood: yet with leffe shame than the rest, because he being a clergy man, thought it not to belong to his vocation to put on armes, or to go into battell. In the mean time it was fearefully told to Gazzianer, That the Hungarian horimen were fled, and that Ladiflaus & Hung mos , with the Stirian troups were gon also, and that al the rest of the army not expecting the appointed P figuall, were in like manner upon flying: with which report, the cowardly and difmaid Genetall was fo terrified, that he presently got to horse; quite forgetting the signals he should have The differencegiuen (for that he thought all the reft, as he afterwards faid, to have been gone before) and carrier of the head has only him falls to flight leaving helf of him falls to fl as he was vnarmed, betooke himfelfe to flight, leaving behind him for hafte his Tent flored with place and other sich furniture. The larks fore march, both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiving, sent before certain come G panies of Lanizaries and nimble footmen which knew the country and paffages wel, with cerpanies of faultaites and mail pieces, to take the streits wherby the army was to passe, and for gaul them in their passage; and when they could keep the place no longer, to sly backtoano. ther, and so from place to place : and in the open places he had his troups of light horsemen. which were cuer busse in one place or another of the army. By which meanes the Christians in their march received much harm, which grieved them the more, for that no great power of the Turks was any where to be feen together, but stragling companies, which as they were commanded, fomtime would come on with a fierce charge, and by and by retyre again, & with their arrows and falcon shot from places of advantage affail them. From one of these streits formwhat bigger than the rest, Paulus Bachitius one of the Hungarian Captains, in whome the H foldiers generally reposed their greatest trust, was slain with a falcon shot, with divers others of the valiant Hungarians; who feeing there a greater number of the Turkes than they had feen in other places, thought to have don fome good feruice vpon them. His death brought general fear vpon the whole army, for a fmuch as then and at other times without him they neuer had any good fucces against the Turks. Yet in that skirmish, the Hungarians to revenge the death of their Captain, did with such force repulse the enemy, that they caused him after he had lost many of his men, to run away and leave his small pieces behind him. But such was the weaknes or cowardife of the Christian footmen, and the agility of the Turkes, especially the lanizaries, that they with their shot out of the woods staid the Hungarian horsmen from the pursuit of their fellowes, and recourred their small field, pieces before they could be care to ried away by the Christian footmen; wherwith they did again fore run the Army, still trouageneral fear bling it as before. The Christians beset with these dangers, and almost spent for want of vi-Qual; feeing no means to relieve their weak bodies, nor any hope to comfort their fainting spirits, did generally fear some extream calamitie to ensue, and so much the more, for that it was reported, that Mahometer ftil expected fresh supplies from Belgrade, Samandria and Nicopolis and many of the Hungarian light horimen stole away from them, as careful of their own fafety. Neither did they see any comfort in the dismaid captains, who at other times were wont with cheerful and couragious speeches to relieve the fouldiers, if they saw them any thing discouraged. But when they were come into a fair open field neer to a town called Gara, they were aduertifed, That the Enemy had in the woods before them, wherby they were K to passe, cut downe great trees crosse the waies, so that neither their great Ordnance nor wagons, nor yet their horimen could possibly passe that way, but that they must needs breake

This once bruted thorow the army, filled them all with heavine fle and desperation; and so much the more, for that Ladiflaus Moreus, and others which knew the country well, fain there was but two wates to escape the one thorow the Woods about ten miles space to Walpo, which by reason of the trees cut down crossethe waies by the Turks, was not to be passed, but they must needs leave behind them their great ordnance and carriages the other towards the castle of Zenthuerzebeth, which was in Ladiflaus Morens his Country, certaine miles distant from Gara: by taking of which way, the enemy by reason of the streitnes of the passage, must L of necessitie be inforced to give over his pursuit. Yet for all that, it was in Councell tefolued vpon, to take the way thorow the Woods of Walpo, for that there was there vidualis enough, and in the Castle of Walpo was kept money fent from King Ferdinand, sufficient to pay the foldiers for all that Winter. And fo leaving the great Ordnance behind them, and burning the pouder and what focuer els could not wel be caried on horsebacke, to fet forward with all speed; as for the trees, they faid they, would bee wel enough removued, and the way oppred by the pioners and wagoners. Wherfore every captain was commanded to have his christians toe. foldiges in readines to let forward upon figne given, which was by the found of a shalm or hoscape the Turks boy, which when it should be given, was referred to the discretion of the General. There were many which wonderfully difliked of this resolution, and said openly, that the enemy was sew- M er in number than their horfmen, and pinched almost with like want of victual : besides, That the Turks durft neuer in iust fight incounter with the Christian men agarms, but like theeves. affail them upon a sudden at some advantage, and by and by be gon again, and that the some of Garawhere the enemy lay incamped, was not fo firong but that it might be worth herfore

As for himself, who had bin their happy General in many battels, he said he was resolutely set down by repulfing the enemy to bring them into a place of fafety, or els valiantly fighting together . with them to end his daies. As Ledreniss was yet thus incouraging the footmen, the horfmen of Carinchia, Saxony, Austria, and Bohemia, who mindful of their duty, had in vain expected the appointed fignal from the Generall, came vnto Lodranian, as vnto the most valiant captain. befeeching him in flead of their trecherous Generall, to take upon him the place: promiling to do what locuer he commanded, and to fight as men against those Infidels, for their Religio on and King, to long as they were able to hold up their weapons. It is reported, that as Lodronius was incouraging the footmen, and earneftly inneighing a gainst shamefull flight, an old German soldier was so bold, as bluntly, yet sharply to say vito him : Worthy Lodionius, thou canst neuer be thought to fly shamefully, with a horse of such aprice emder thee. Lodronius perceiving the old foldiers meaning, alighted, and with his fword hoxed his horse; saying aloud, This day, valiant soldiers, shall you have me both your Generall and fellow fouldier, fighting on foot as one of your felues: fee now that you deceive not my expe-Chation, but let vs either with glorious victory or honoumble death and this war together, yet fo, as that we die not vnreuenged. All his other horses be gaue away vnto such sick and wounded souldiers as he best knew amongst whom was one Picenard of Cremona, a Captaine who was then in an extreme fit of an ague, & had hardly escaped the hands of the enemy. The first L troups of horfmen and bands of footmen, were feareely out of the camp with their enligns, but the Turks comming on with a hideous cry, affailed them on every fide, and many tharp skirmifhes were given vnto the horlmen as they marched, with fuch event that the Christians fometime valiantly receiving the enemies charge, and fometime charging them again, see pulled the proud enemy still busie with them. In these continuall skirmishes, Amins Maner Fuchftat, Generall of the Carinthian horfmen, fighting valiantly was flein, heing for his brane armor supposed by the Turks to have bin the General of the field. And by like mishap foure and twenty horfmen of great name were also flain, and their guidon taken, among it these were three noblemen , Andreas Reschins, Christophorus Harnais, and Georgius Bimelbergus. which were not fled before the battell, were to be feen dead upon the ground. This fampefull organizer Brick was reported to have exceeded the most grievous overthrowed that the Christians had received in any former timesfor the flower both of horse and footalieseling by the rathinesse and fault of an unlucky Generall, rather than by the valor of the enemy ruthfully perified to that many proninces were filled with heavineffe and mourning For it never chanced before (as was to be feen by the vnfortunat battels of Sigilmund the Emperox and king Ladiflam) that the Turks got such a victory without some losse: so that they which fell almost vireuenged at Exek, may feeme to have augmented that losse by the great infamy thereof. Mabonetes having thus almost without the bloud of his soldiers, obtained so great a victory, and taken the spoile of the Christian camp, pitched his tents in a little medow being clenged of the dead bodies, and after he had merrily feafted with his captains, commanded the chiefe prifemers, the goodly spoiles, and fairest ensignes to be brought vnto him; and openly commend in the captaines who had that day done any good feruice commanding diners bags of mony to be brought vnto him by the receivers, he with his owne hand rewarded the foldiers fomewith gold, fome with filter, according to their deferts: And caufing all the prisoners which were not common souldiers to be brought forth, he diligently viewed them. and profently canfed energy one of their names, and the office they bare, to be involled by his. clerks: and ynto fuch as brought in the heads, eares, or hands of the Christians with rings vpon them he forthwith caused one reward or other to be given. Ledronim, when as by reason of Ledronim Rein his deadly wounds he was thought vnable to indure trauell, or to be brought aliue with the other prifoners to Constantinople, was staine by his keepers, and his head afterward sent thither. But Cazzidaer flying to his owne caffle, was of all men accused as a wicked for saker of cazzidaer list owne campe and enlighes, and commonly railed upon, as the eternal linfamy of his coun-

In the mean time the Venetians, prouoked by the Turks with divers injuries both by fee and land (when as Solyman but a little before hardly befieged Corcyra, and with most barbarous E cruelty wasting the Island, had broken the league, & euen then by has Lieutenant Casingus Bassa besieged Epidaurus and Nauplium, two of their cities in Peloponesus) resolued without delay to make war likewise vpon him, who for a small trespas would admit no excuse or recompence. Wherunto they were also animated both by Charles the Emperor, and Paulan the great Bishop: who warned by the late and dangerous attempts of Selyman and Barbarussa, thought it more for the lafety of their estates, by giving aid to the Venetians, to keep the Turks busied further off, than to fuffer them to acquaint themselves too much with the ports of Italy and Sicilia. Wherefore all the Winter following they labored by their Embassadors, to set down what number and what manner of thips, what fouldiers, what mony was to be prouided, and how to be according to their estates apportioned, for the fetting forth of a strong fleet against L The Empereur, the next Summer, to be fent into Grecia against the Turks. At last it was agreed amough these confederat Princes, by their Embassadors at Rome, That the Emperor should furnish and set of Rome, easer forth 82 gallies, the Venetians the like number, and the Bishop 36; to make up the number of two hundred gallies; that the Venetians should lend unto the Bishon so many gallies ready rigged, as he should defire, to be furnished by him with marriners and soldiers; and that the Emperor and the State of Genoa should find sufficient shipping for the transportation of the land forces and victuall. The Generals also of this great fleet to be fet forth, were at the same time appointed: Andreas Auria for the Emperour, Vancentius Capellus for the Venetians; and Marcus Grimmanus Patriarch of Aquilea for the Bishop; to whom was joyned Panlas Is, stimianus one of the chiefe Senatours, a man of great experience in sea marters. It was also se agreed, that Ferdinand Gonzaga Viceroy of Sicily, should have the commanding of the land forces; and that what focuer was got from the Turks in that expedition in Grecia; the Islands, or Dalmatia, should be all faithfully deliuered to the Venetians, who had received so many injuries from the Turks. The Emperouralfoof his liberality promifed vnto the other ConA federats, that they should for reasonable price have as much wheat as they would out of Sicilia, without paying any custome. Solaman violerstanding of this confederation and preparation made against him by these 1538 Christian Princes, commanded Barbarussa his Admirall to make ready his fleet to goe against Solyman (rathefeenemies, and to do all the harme he could whon the Island's subject to the Venetian state. But Grittus one of the losses Venetian Senatours then kept the City with a firong garrifon, who from the walls and bulwarks theroffo plagued the Turks with great and small shot, and the fallying out of two companies of Italians, that Barbaruffa having loft many of his men, was faine to retire againe to his fleet in such hast that he left behind him 1000 of his Turks, which were gone further into the Island after booty, who were afterwards all slaine by them of Creet. After that, he attempted to have taken divers places in the Island, and was every where notably repulsed. For Barbarussa then lay with the Turks fleet in the bay of Ambracia, expecting when the Christians should enter the streit entrance therof, where he had on both fides placed divers pieces of great ordnance, to have funk them in their comming in : for Grimanus the Patriarch, a little before departing from Corcyra, had with the great Bishops gallies begun to besiege Preuesa, a towne vpon the promontory of Actium fait by that fireit, and landing some of his souldiers, with three great pieces of artillery so battered the castle of Preuesa, that he was like enough to have taken it, had not the Turks from Ætolia D come to relieue it with a strong power both of horse and soot. Wherfore the Patriarch shipping againe his men and ordnance, returned to the fleet at Corcyra, not repenting him of his journy, for that he had well viewed the streits of that Bay, and all the enemies fleet riding at anchor within it. Upon the returne of the Patriarch, and relation made, what he had both done and seene, the great commanders of the Christian sleet entred into counsell, what course were best to take for the better proceeding in that great action. Gonzaga the Viceroy, Generall of Gonzaga bia the land forces, was of opinion, That it were best to land the fouldiers and great ordnance, and opinion, with all their force to affault the castle of Preuesa: which once taken, and their ordnance there planted, the enemies fleet might in the Bay be veterly defeated, for that all paffage to fea might easily be taken from them, by finking one of the great thips in the mouth of the B Streit, and by moaring there of three great Gallions full of Artillery: fo that if Barbaruffa would desperatly aduenture to come out, hee must needs be sunke in the mouth of the Bay. Whereunto Auria replied, That Gonzaga his counsell was in words and shew glorious, but to Auria of ans. put in execution most dangerous i for that first to land the souldiers and great artillery, he ther opinion. faid was a thing too too full of hazard and perill : for it was to be thought, that the Turks in Etolia would as they had before done, come with speed with their horsemen to relieue the besieged in the castle; whose force the Christian footmen could hardly abide. Besides that, if the fleet should by force of weather be constrained to leave that coast, (as it wel might, Autumne now comming fast on) after the fouldiers were landed, From whence should they then get victuall in the enemies country? Or what reliefe should they hope for, if they should hap to be diffressed; being on every side beset with their enemies, and their friends by tempest driuen from them . Wherefore he thought it best, if the enemy could not be drawne out of the Bay to battell, to go directly to the Bay of Naupa Cum, and to take that towns which was not greatly fortified, and to ransacke and spoile all the Townes, even to the bottome of the Bay

course it might fall out, that Barbarussa mooned with the danger of his friends, would for G fhame come out and joyne with them in battell. This counfell of Auria was best liked both of Capelliss and the Patriarch, being far more defirous to fight with their enemies at sea, than at

Auria having put in order his fleet, came to Preuefa, and fo to the fireit of the bay of Ambre, cia, where he so placed the whole fleet, which was in number 250 faile, that it might easily of the enemy be numbred. Which fight (as it was reported) wonderfully troubled Barbaruffa. who although he was of a couragious disposition, and such a man as greatly feared not either the valor or martial discipline of the Christians, yet was he exceedingly moued with the fight of fo great a fleet fo well appointed; for a greater had not of long time bin feene in the Jonian Earbaruffa re- fea. So that an Eunuch of Solymans court, fent by him as Barbaruffa his companion, feeing him H proud of tow to delay the time as a man halfe discouraged, did with most vinciuil and proud words take him the Turkes Ev. vp, because he would not forthwith go out of the bay and fight with the Christians which lav at the mouth thereof daring of them: wherein he was not (as he faid) to regard his own fafe. ty (who as a coward would not endure the fight of the enemy) but the honour of Solyman his Soueraigne, who would not take it well, to have the glory of his name stained with so shame. full a delay: for if he were a valiant and martiall man, as he professed himselfe to be, he ought neuer to despaire of victory : and if it should so fall out, that fortune should frown vponthem. and not to answer their desires, yet should not Solyman therefore want captains and soldiers better than they, if they were ouercome; and the woods of Pontus would afford him timber enough to build twice fo great and strong a fleet. And for a conclusion, the infolent Eunuch 1 willed Barbaruffa to beware, that whilest he feared a most honourable death (which was vocertaine, though the battell were loft) he drew not upon himselfe the cettaine danger of a most shamefull death by the displeasure of Solyman. At which speech Barbarussa turning himselfe about to Sales, one of the arch pyrats, a famous king demy man. And so presently commanded all his fleet to weigh anchor, at the same time that Auria had hoised saile, and was on his way toward the bay of Naupactus, thinking that the enemy durst not for feare have come out of the bay of Ambracia. Auria keeping on his

Auria somewhat troubled with this sudden comming out of the enemy, as with a thing which he then least expected, yet notably staid himselse, and commanded all the seet to pre-They in file pare themselves to battel, and to follow his Admiral gally. Now all the Turks fleet was come into the open sea into such order, that Barbarussa himselse was in the middle battell; where his L Admirall gally was to be seene with many purple flags and streamers flying gallantly in the winde: on his right hand was Tabacches, and Salec on the left, both men of great fame, every one of them having almost like number of gallies, which were in all 150. Vnto the middle battell were joyned two wings, in such order, that which way soeuer the Admirall turned, they turning alfo, still represented the forme of a flying Eagle: fo that (as Auria himselfe afterwards confessed) a more firme or orderly ficet could not have bin brought out by any expert captain. Before the fleet came about 20 nimble gallies conducted by Drogut (or Dragut) an arch pyrat, famous afterwards for the great harme he did vnto the Christians. Capellius the Venetian Admirall came in his long boat to Auria, requesting him. That he with his gallies might give the first charge vpon the enemy: to whom Auria gaue great thanks, and praising his forward. M nes, requested him to follow him, to whom he would in good time give a figne what he would have done. The formost of the Turks light gallies was now come to the great galleon of Bendelmerius, which was the formost of the Christian fleet, whereunto were fent also certaine gallies from Salee, to helpe to affaile that tall ship, which shooting a far off, did no harme, neither Bondelmerim them; who would not suffer one piece to be discharged; for he being an expert fea man, and loth to shoot in vain, expected that they should come necret vnto him, and then woon the sudden to discharge all his great ordnance vpon them. Neither was he deceived in that his expectation, for the Turks comming neere vino him, were so overwhelmed with the great and small thot out of the galleon, that they were glad to stay their course and retyre. In the meane time Auria called backe again his thips which were gon before and caused his galkeon to be towed out; and by boats of purpose sent out, charged the captains of the gallies to make themselves ready to fight, vpon signall given by the sound of the trumper, & displaying of the Admirals enfigne: yet was not Auria of mind to fight, with his gallies without his thing. Which thing the erafty enemy well perceived, and therefore fought by all meanes to joyne B battel with the gallies, before the comming in or the tal thips, which were as castles in refrect of the gallies : for it was then fuch a calme, that the ships were not able to keepe way with the gallies, and the smooth water seemed to offer a fit opportunity for battell which so well pleafed the Parriarch, that many heard him cry aloud to Auria to give the fignall; and marvelled much why he deferred to give battell. For he fetching a great compaffe, and houering about his thips, with his gallies kept fuch a courfe, that many thought he would voon a fudden haue don fome ftrange and wnexpected exploit your the enemy : but Auria held that ftrange course Auria bu pollof purpose to have drawne the enemies gallies within the danger of his great ships, who thun. * quetonife. dring among at them with their great ordnance, might have eafily fore beaten and difordered them, and opened a way to his gallies to have gotten a most certaine victory. But the crafty old Tarke doubting by the strangenesse of Anria's course, to be circumvented with some finenesse changed his course, and lay still with his owne squadron of gallies, warily expecting to what purpose that strange course of the enemy tended. In the meane time, both the wings of his fleet had a little before Sun-fet, begun in divers places to encounter with the Christians: fome were in vaine flill affailing Bondelmerius his great galleon; others with their great ordnance had fo fore beaten two tall (hips (wherin Buccaniera and Mongaia, two Spanish captains. were embarked with their companies) that they were given for loft, many of the foldiers and mariners being flain. Two other thips loded with victuall, the one of Venice, the other of Dalmatia, were burnt by the Turks, & some sew of the men saued by their shipboats, and by swimming to the ships neerest vnto them. In the shutting in of the evening Sales tooke two gallies

was taken his fon a yong gentleman, and beautified with all the good gifts of nature; who af-

three veres miferable imprisonment, obtained his poore fathers liberty, and fent him well rewarded home again into Spaine. Whilst both the fleets were thus expecting how they might sparing neither faile nor oare, that it seemed rather a shamefull flight, than an orderly retreat.

So that Auria, a man of fo great fame at fea, as that he was called a fecond Neptune, was that day accounted no captain. It is reported that Barbarussa with the same wind pursued the Christi-

ansa while, and being not able longer to see what course they held, by reason of the darknesse of the night, to have staied his course: for the Admirals had caused their lights which they vied to carry in the poups of their gallies, to be put out. Wherat Barbaruffa heartily laughing, how by flight to escape. When they were come to Corcyra, they were all generally of opi-

stals, especially the Genowaies, to excuse Auria, imputed the cause of so shameful a flight vnto

the Venetians, who would not from the beginning receive any Spanish souldiers into their gallies, the better to have with flood the enemy, and that Auria therefore doubting of the Venetians, refrained from joyning battell; and the rather, because that vpon the comming forth Nnn 2

Shortly as they might at their pleasure carry ter came Barbarus with all his fleet to the Island of Paxus, about four leagues from Coreys Barbara Jabra Eastward, brauing the Christians as if he would have fought with them, if they durst come out Wherat Genzaga the Viceroy fretting, went to every one of the three great commanders, tequesting them for the honor of the Christians, to represse that proud Turks insolency. At last the matter was brought to that passe, that the Venetians having taken in certain compa nics of Spaniards, the fleet should be divided into foure squadrons, and so to give battell, sur this confultation was fo long protracting, that Barkaruffa fearing the tempefluous Autumne weather hoised faile, and about the seuenth of October returned again into the bay of Ambre cia. After the departing of Barbaruffa, the Generals of the Christian fleet directed their course H into the bay called Sinus Risonicus, to besiege Castronovum, or New-castle, a strong towne of the Turks standing in that bey, and bordering vpon the Venetian Seigniory. The Inhabia tants were part Dalmatians, part Epirots, which had renounced the Christian religion, and fome Turks, living most part by merchandise. Vnto this town the Christians laid siege and in short time won it, where they had a great prey, and a wonderfull number of captiues of all forts. Three daies after the taking of the towne, the castle was also yeelded by the Turks garrison, couenanting in vaine to depart with life and liberty.

This towne taken by common force, ought of right by the couenants of the league to have been deliuered to the Venetians; yet was it for all that by, Auria and Gonzaga referred for the Emperor, and Franciscus Sarmentsus with foure thousand Spaniards all old soldiers, lest there in I garrison: Capelliss the Venetian Admirall vrging in vaine the right of the Venetians. Which thing so much grieued the Senat, (who ever had the ambitious Spaniard in suspect, and now assured of him as an euill neighbour to their towne of Catarum) that repenting themselus of the league with the Emperor, they decreed to fue to Solyman for peace : which they afterwards casily obtained, for a short space, by Laurentim Grittm their Dukes son, and by the helpeof Antonius Rinem the French Kings Embassador; who then lying at Constantinople, in good time told the great Bassa's, that the league the Venetlans had made with the Emperour, was made without the consent of the greatest part of the Senat, and that was taken in hand against

Whilst these things were in doing, Barbarussa put to sea againe to have relieved Castrono-K vum : but being at fea, many of his gallies were by the violence of a sudden tempest driven ypon the Acroceraunian rocks, and there cast away. It is reported that he lost there 20000 men, which with the broken pieces of his gallies were found almost all alongst the coast of Dalmatia. This shipwracke being certainly knowne, Capellius would have persuaded Auria to have Aurianglest presently pursued Barbarussa sodistressed : which motion Gonzaga wel liked, as a man desirous ing to furface by fome notable exploit to recompence the difgrace before received at Leucade. But Auris Barbarnya, Te for divers causes not liking of the matter, was so set down upon his return to Italy, that he prely, to the guife fently hoised faile, leaving the Venetian Admirall in such a rage, that he detested himselfe, for fubmitting himselfe to another mans power; and wished the captains there present, hener to subject themselues to the command of a stranger, forasmuch as that. Genoway, either vpon [cowardise or malicious mind, as an old enemy to the Venetian State, would not prosecute so manifest a victory, but put vp so shamefull a disgrace as he had before received. But of all this Auria made small reckoning, referring all that he both said and did, so far vnto the Emperors commodity, that Valerius Vrsinus a noble gentleman then serving in the Venetian pay, merrily faid, That Auria had done nothing but wifely and politickly, in fetting the Venetians together by the ears with the Turks, and opening a gate for a long war, whether the Venetians would or not : fo as the emperor himself could not have better wished, and that without the losse one gally. For it was thought by many, that the long wars betwint the Turks and the Venetians would fort to the great good of the emperor, when as the Venetians worne out and spent with those long and chargeable wars against so mighty an enemy, should be stripped of their lands M and territories either by force, or fome hard composition wrung from them by necessity.

Castronovum thus taken, and Sarmentus with a garrison of foure thousand Spaniards there placed, as is aforesaid, and the Christian fleet dissolved, Solyman tooke the matter so grievous fly, that he determined to besiege it againe both by sea and land: and in his sury, caused Nauplium and Epidaurus, two of the Venetian cities in the country of Peloponesus, to bee Araitly befreged. Yet tooke he fingular pleasure, that Barbarussa his Admirall, in all respects worse furnished, had driven out of the sea the great fleet of the Christians, which he before that time had made too great account of. Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring, which 1539 was in the yeare 1539, Barbaruffa by his commandement repaired agains his fleet, and notably Barbaruffa fent furnished it with all maner of warlike prouision; manning his gallies for the most part with Ia. by Solyman to nizaries and other fuch felect foldiers. With this fleet Barbaruffa (Summer now wel come on) neum, departed out of the Hellespontus, and came to the bay Risonicus; at which time also Vlames the Persian then Gouernor of Bosna, shewed himselse with his forces upon the mountaines, as he had in charge from Solyman. Barbaruffa before he entred the streits of the bay, fent before him Dragut and Corfetus, two notable pirats, with thirty galliots, who landing their men neere unto Castronovum (as they were commanded) were valiantly encountered by Sarment with his Spaniards, and forced agains to their galliots, many of the Turks being flaine and taken orisoners. After that came Barbarussa with 90 gallies and 3 tal ships which carried the artillery for battery and other necessary prouision for the campe; where he spent three daies landing his great ordnance and casting up trenches, which could not be done but by night by reafon of the continual! Barbarussa proud of this victory, began forthwith to gape after Cattarus a City of the Venetians in the bottome of the same bay; and thereupon writthreatning letters to leannes Bembusone of the Venetian Senators then Gouernour of the city, presently to deliver the city; which he would (as he faid) otherwise affault by force. Whereunto Bembus answered againe by letters, that in so doing he should violate the league lately made with Solyman, and that he should find him ready by force to repell his forces. Wherewith Barbaraffa displeased, fent certaine gallies into the bottome of the bay, who discharging certain great pieces at the city, made thew as if they had come to be liege it. fo, to who soeuer could recouer it; being defirous to have sent his head for a Present to Solyman. Barbaruffa proud of this victory, began forthwith to gape after Cattarus a City of the Venetians in the bottome of the same bay; and thereupon writthreatning letters to toannes Bembus one of the Venetian Senators then Governour of the city, presently to deliver the city; which he would (as he said) otherwise assault by force. Whereunto Bembus answered againe by letters, that in so doing he should violate the league lately made with Solyman, and that he should find him ready by force to repell his forces. Wherewith Barbaruff a displeased, sent certaine gallies into the bottome of the bay, who discharging certain great pieces at the city, made thew as if they had come to beliege it. At whom Bembus as a man of good courage F caused as many moe like pieces to be discharged, and shewed his men upon the wals: Which

thing Barbaru Ja perceiuing staid his course, and calling backe his gallies, returned to Castronovum, from whence (better appealed with Pielents afterwards sent from Bembus) he departed out of that bay.

The long wars betwirt Charles the Emperous and Francis the French King, were now well pacified :

pacified, and such friendship (at least wise in shew) now growne betwirt these two great Prin. G pactico, and tech intermediate property of the pactico, they would now at length with united forces goe against the great and dangerous enemy of Christendome: which opinion Appendix. Va. not altogether of the wifer fort beleeued, was yet at this time wonderfully confirmed by many film and Have extraordinary and rare courtefies then passing betweene them, which concerne not this He bestadors from flory; as also, in that two of their most famous captains, Alphonsus Vastinu, and Hanebald, were the Emperor & as it were with one consent by them both sent embassadors to Venice: to have drawn the Ve. the France of netians into the confederation of that war against the Turke. Which zwo renowned captains comming to Venice, most gallantly, accompanied, were by Landan the Duke, and the whole State, with great magnificence received, the people after their wonted manner flocking together in euery place to behold them so noble captaines sent from such mighty Princes 3 but ef. H pecially Valtim, whose fame having many times before filled their cares, made them now the more defirous to fatisfie their cies also with the beholding of his tail and comely person, Which two famous captains admitted into the Senate, for that purpose fully affembled, and audience giuen : Vastius arising from the Dukes side, in these or like words deliuered their emand the second of the second o

It is come to passe (as I suppose) by the great providence of Almighty God, and of all the Dinine power tion to the ve-action Senat. Crs (most noble Duke and honourable Senators) that two of the most mighty Kings of Birope, why of late had of long time made mortall wars one upon another, touched with the zeale of religion; are become ercat friends: undoubtedly to that purpose only, that having made a firme peace, they may bring such a 1 generall quietneffe to the long troubled and aflicted flate of Christendome, as best befeineth their great neffe; and saking in hand a facred war to revenge fo many calamisies received from the Infidelit bas this might be made knowne anto you (most noble Venetians) shese mighty Monarchs have sent as hisberid good time to kindle in you the like zeale, wherewith it is well knowne you have alwaies for the bonone of your State bin inflamed : far you of all others, which are of such power and valour at sea, they wish for, as their fellowes and confederats in this facred war and hoped victory; and thinke you worthy, which flould enjoy the especiall fruit of all that labour. For asmuch as the Christian forces once renewed, and so great and strong a ficet once assembled, enery man feeth that the Turks must needs be too weake: although they brag. That they carried away the victory of late at Acteum, when as they then escaped the victorious hands of our men, not by their owne valour, but by the unexpetted hap of a sudden storme. For all the pow- K ers of heaven and earth, and of the sea also, will be propitions unto us, uniting so great forces, in regard of our facred religion, and will so take away the hearts of the Insidels, that they shall learne to be our come. As for our land forces, we are to hope nothing but well, for a much as wate these which the Empereur of late brought into the field at Vienna, and caused the Turkish Emperour to sty, shall be joyned not onely all the horsemen and infantery of France (a wonderfull strength) but Sigismund also King of Polonia will without delay bring forth his armies, wherewith he hath beene weed in the quarrell of the Christian Religion happily to fight against the Insidels: fothat it is not to be doubted of a most certaine and affured victory. Wherefore the victorious Emperour and most Christian King Francis most instantly request you to enter into the like godly cogitations, conceived for the generall good of the Christian name, and religioully to embrace the hope of a most true and glorious victory : and further exhort you, by a wholesome de- L crecto anert your religious and couragious hearts from the friendship of the Infidels: for it may worthily seeme unto your most honourable minds, a most foule and shamefull thing, to have renewed your league, and to have preferred an infamous and uncertaine peace, before a most religious and just war. Neither doth it beseeme this most wealthy State to be terrified from that which is good and right, with any charges of war, be they never so great: for if we shall once overcome, which is incident to this present and long wished occasion, we shall by the profit of one victory either by seaor land, to your incomparable praise, recompence all the loffes by ws in former times received.

Whereunto the Duke in the name of the whole State answered, That there never happened M the dakets Va- any thing at any time vnto the Venetian Senat more honorable, for the manner of the embaffage, or for the publike security of their state, more to be desired than the hope of such a peace: after that two most mighty kings by two such famous captains their embassadors, did certifie them of their attonement & affured peace, most glorious to themselues, to their eternal praise,

A wholesome also to the Venetian State, befet with so many dangers, and wonderfully to be withed for of all other Princes of Christendome, if they would fincerely and religiously with their forces by common confent vnited, resolue vpon that sacred war: for then would not the Venetians be wanting: to themselves or the Christian common weale, but end the league they had with the Turke, not with a dishonourable peace, but with armes and vixory. Wherefore it was to be requested of Almighty God by praier, That those puissant Kings would with religious and happy euent speedily and seriously sulfill all that hope of peace, which they had by their mutuall discourses and embracings in shew promised vnto the World.

In few daies after, certain of the fele & Senators fitting in counfell, after the manner of that State, called the embaffadors vnto them, and asked them, Whother they knew any thing of the B articles and capitulations wherin that league and confederation was to be concluded? and by the way. Whether they thought the Emperour in regard of that peace would give vnto the French kings fon the Dukedom of Millan, as was reported > Whereunto Hanebald the French embassador answering nothing, Vastim said, that he knew nothing more, but that the two great Vastimble and embaliator affecting bottomic, some felues, and that the Emperour had defired the peace, as furt to the deone willing to help the afflicted and declining state of the Christian common weale: which venerian sething any man might fee could not be effected or brought to paffe, but the Emperour must majors, in many things yeeld to the requests of the French King, and redeeme his good will: for the noblemind (faid he) worthy Senators, can eafily make light of the greatest losse of his owne things, when it forefeeth a large way opened thereby to eternall fame and glory. These words C were very glorious and gratious to the hearers; but they, as men of great experience, could not let it finke in their minds, that the Emperor whom they had often deeply founded, would euer part with the Dukedome of Millan, which only thing the French King required, and had for the recovering thereof unfortunatly striven almost 20 yeares, to the trouble and disquiet of a great part of the World. The nobility and authority of this embassage more moued the Senat than did the other former Embaffadors, Didaco Mendoza a Spaniard, and Gulielmus Pelliceriss a Frenchman, then both present: yet was it much suspected by the Venetians, because it contained no certaine resolution, but only the bare hope of a suture peace; so that it was by many men supposed to be but a matter deuised to deceive others, and to serve the Emperours turne to his great profit. Yet all the cunning seemed to rest in this point, That the Venetians D ledon with the hope of this league, should negled the renewing of the league they had the yeare before taken with Solyman, which was now almost expired. Upon which uncertainty of other mens resolutions, the grave Senators thought too dangerous a matter to depend.

Vponthis question of this new league and confederation to be made with these Christian The Venetian Princes against the Turke, the Senat was wonderfully divided: some favouring the Emperors Senatore directly affected request, enueighed against the renewing of that shameful league with the Insidels, which they towards the faidwas nothing els, but as much as in them lay to betray unto them the other parts of Chri-confederation flendom, and especially Italy, destitute of their help, and yet not to be obtained without great with the Empecharge; and with many reasons viged the honorable confederation with these Christian Prin. Franch King. ces: others of a deeper reach, confidering what infinit harmes they had from time to time re. galaft Solymans E ceiued by falling out with the Turks, & suspending also the Emperors drift; and joining therunto the confideration of the great dearth then reigning in the city, which was not to be relieued but out of Macedonia & Grecia, the Turk's countries; the emperor having at that time as it were of purpose imposed so great a custome vpon all corne to be transported out of Sicily, that the very custome came to as much as both the price of the corne and the fraight together all which mischies they said were to be preuented by renewing the league with Solyman. This matterwas with great heat debated in the Senat too & fro, either part having great faultours: fo that the Senators spent almost whole Winter nights in the court in discoursing and consulting what were best to be don: but what soeuer was there said or decreed, was sorthwith by one of the factions or other made known, not only to the Embassadors present in the city,

F but by letters also discouered into provinces far off:a thing neuer before in that state known, which had ever vied as it were with a religious filence to keep fecret what soever was there decreed. Which thing Marcus Foscarus, an old Senator and a man of great wisedom, perceiuing, Foscarus faid openly, That the state was betraied by the multitude and corruption of voices, and must grave seneeds shortly perish, if it were not speedily committed to the grave and faithfull judgment of natour.

fome few : for there were almost two hundred of them which gaue voices, reducing the mult G titude to the number of fifty, who for their experience and loue toward their country, were holden for men of greatest grauity and secrecy : sowas the madnesse of many stated by the discretion of a sew. But Foscaras shortly after fell into such hatred of the multitude, grieuing to be as light headed men without discretion, so excluded out of the counsell; that he was by the voices of the multitude first thrust out of the counsell himselfe, and by them kept a great while after from all the preferments and honours of the city: being indeed one of the granest Schatours, and a man of deepest judgement. Which disgrace turned afterward to his great honour and credit, as one that had forescene much, after they were once found out and condemned which had traiterously reucaled the secrets of the State.

But this long confultation concerning the confederation, came to this end, That the Sena. H find Aboption tors doubting the vision of those two great princes, and yet willing to expect the euent, decreed Embassadures forthwith to send three Embassadors; whereof two should be sent to the Emperour and the Solyman, 1000.

French king to discouer their designes; and the third, which was Aloysius Badoerius, a wise and well spoken man, was with all speed dispatched away to Solyman, to preuent the same of the distrust to be conceived of the agreement of these great Christian Princes, and if he could by any means, to spare for no cost, ro saue vnto the Venetians their cities of Nauplium and Epidaurus, which Solyman required of them before he would grant them peace. Which if it could not be obtained of the proud and crafty tyrant, then to yeeld vnto necessity, and to conclude a peace with him vpon any conditions; which course the Decem-viri thought to be most expedient for the State: yet concerning the yeelding vp of the cities, they gaue him secret infructions and warrant, fearing forfooth the force and tumult of the headstrong multitude, who if they had knowneany fuch thing, would undoubtedly thereupon haue taken occasion to haue croffed and ouerthrowne that most wholesome decree : for there was no doubt, that if they had delaied the matter, and fought for peace too late, but that Solyman would vpon another mans weaknesse and necessity have increased his vnsatiable desire, and not granted them peace, being brought low and for faken, except they would deliuer vnto him the Islands of Cephalenia. Zacinthus, and Corcyra, a matter no leffe grieuous than the destruction of the very city of Venice it selfe. So that the great Embassadors Vastius and Hanebald, who came of purpole to have hindered the league with the Turke, by their great diligence wrought nothing more effectually, than that the Venetians the better foreseeing the danger of their state, should K as they did, make hast to conclude the same for it falleth out in mens purposes & actions, That a good and happy successe otherwise well hoped for, is oftentimes marred with too much diligence and care. Neither was it any doubt, but that Hanebaldwas fent by the French King but for fashion sake, and secretly underhand by Pellicerius the old Embassador, persuaded the Venetians to hasten the conclusion of a peace with Solyman. Which as Badoerius their embasfador was carefully foliciting the matter at Constantinople, & being loth to yeeld the strong The mass secret cities which Solyman required, offering vnto him in stead of themagreat sum of mony: Soly-Vinitian Schaff man took him up with threatning words as a shamefull dissembler, earnestly protesting, That made knowne he would neuer grant him peace, without the yeelding of those cities; rehearling vnto him the most secretest points of his embassage, and how that he was authorised from the Decem-viri L to yeeld them vnto him : which thing the Embaffador did little thinke Solyman had knowne. Wherfore Badoerius fo shamefully reproued and standing in doubt of his life, seeing the greatest secrets of his embassage renealed to Solyman and his Bassaes, was glad to accept of peace, by yeelding vnto him Nauplium and Epidaurus, two cities in Peloponesus, and with them Nadium and Labrania, two castles of Dalmatia, to the great griese of the whole Senat: for granting whereof the common people ignorant of the secret decree of the Decem-viri, and supposing that Badoerius had given away that which he had no authority to give, were so inraged against him at his returne, that there was much ado to faue the guiltlesse man from exile, and his goods from confication, although the traitors were then knowne which had diffeour-The traitours red the fecrets of the flate vnto the Turks. Thefe were Mapheus Leonius a Senatour, and Con- M flaminus Cobatius, Secretary to the colledge of the Decem viri, and Franciscus Valerius, one of the Verrian the Senatours base sonnes, the traiterous disperser of the Turks mony for the corruption of others: who with other his complices were for the fame fact hanged in the market place, when as Leonins and Cobatins were a little before fled into France.

Abont

About the same time, which was in the yeare of our Lord 1540, died Ioannes Sepusius King of Hungary, Solymans tributary, after whose death onfued great wars in Hungary, and the lamentable subuction of that flourishing kingdome: for the better conceiuing whereof it shall not be amisse with as much breuity as the plainenesse of the history will permit, to open the causes and grounds of the endiesse catamities which afterwards ensued, and neuer tooke end. untill that warlike kingdome was to the great weakning of Christendome vetterly subuerted.

King Ferdinand and this eributary King John, had with like defire of peace and quietneffe. made betweene them a league profitable to them both as their effates then flood, rather than honorable ver most welcome to the Hungarians, who divided into factions, and having followed formethe one king, and fome the other, enjoyed nevertheleffe their lands and goods by B the benefit of this peace; the rownes and castles being still kept by them in whose possession they then were at the making of the peace. In the capitulations of which peace, it was comprified. That Ferdinand should from thenceforth call John by the name of a king; whereas before he had bothin his common talke and letters called him by the name of a Vayuod only : Ir was also exprestly fer downe in the same arcicles of peace, and subscribed by the bands of disersof the notifity of Hungary, That if king John (hould die, king Ferdinand (hould succeed him in the whole king dome of Hungary: Which condition was suppressed and kept very secret for feare of sulpmin, who accounted of that kingdome as of his owne, gotten by law of armes and bestewed woonking tobs as upon his vassaile : neither was it to have been thought, that if he should have known thereof (being of a hauty mind by hature, and not able to indure C any injury) he would have suffered that kingdome, got and defended with so great danger and

coft to be by the Will of an vnthankfull man, transferred vnto his enemy. This matter of fo great importance, was (as it is reported) by Hieronymus Lafeus emballados The fieret emfor king Ferdinand to Gonstantinople, reuealed vnto Selyman and the Basses, to bring King twist ting Fer-John into harred So much did this noble gentleman, for his rare vertues otherwife greatly to disand & ting have beene commended, yeeld vnto his griefe, and defire of revenge : when after the death of Isharentalid. Aloyfus Grittin, no fell from the friendship of king John, being (as is before declared) by him committed to prison, and hardly afterwards inlarged at the request of king Sigismund. Whoreupon Solyman being exceedingly angry with king John, called him vnthankfull churle, and tustping himfelfe about to Lutzis Bassa his brother in law, said, How voworthily doe these two D Christian kings weare their crownes voon their faithlesse heads; who as shamefull deceivers are not afraid, either for worldly shame or feare of God, for their profit to falsifie their faith? But king Islim understanding therof, & wonderfully fearing his own estate, did by good friends and rich Presents, pacific Solyman againe, laying all the blame upon king Ferdinand, as better able to beare it. Not long after, king John having fet his kingdome in good order, and firengly King John in fortified the city of Buda; being now far striken in yeares, at the earnest request of most of buda yeares the nobility of Hungary, and other his best friends, married Isabella the daughter of Sigismund la King Sigis king of Polonia, a gracious lady and of great spirit: which King Sigismund, had long before munds daughmarried Barbara king Johns fifter, after whose death he maried the lady Bona Sfortia, the daughter of Ioannes Galleacius Duke of Millain, by whom he had this lady Isabella whom king Iohn

E now married. Which marriage Solyman liked well of having many times by way of talke before condemned the fingle life of the king : but King Ferdinand liked thereof nothing at all, plainly forefeeing, that the Hungarians (if the king fhould chance to have a fon) would forthwith looke you him as their naturall king and reject himselfe as but a stranger.

This yong queene in thort time (as he had feared) conceived with child, and was now very The Queene big:when king John was inforced to make an expedition in person himselfe against Maylat (fa- with tilla. mous for the death of Aloghm Grittm) and Balas both Gouernours of Transylvania swhereof Maylat not contented with the name of Vayuod or Gouernor, fought to make himselfe King. But Solyman detelling the impudent arrogancy of the faithlesse man, and hating him for the death of Grittm, and the Turks flaine with him, advertised king lohn of all the matter, wishing F him to be more circumspect, whom he trusted with the government of so great and rich a country. So Maylar thamefully rejected of Solyman, and out of hope of a kingdome, fearing also to be thrust quite our of his government by King John, thought it bolk for his owne, safety toraise up all the province into rebellion, and to take partwith king Ferdinand ; which thing Ferdinand by his divers agents secretly furthered to the vetermost. For these two Kings, al-

ble Embassador, Joannes Exechius Bishop of Quinque Ecclesiæ, and Stephansus Verbetius the Embassadours though they were at peace the one with the other, and in words and they made femblance of G ble Embanaous, tonners and seat years; carying with them ten boles of pure gold curiously wrought, one of thangary friendship, yet in heart they enuied and hated each other, as if they should presently have wa-Chancelos, Services of purple filk & cloth of gold for Turks gowns, ged war. At that fame time king lobnexacted of his subjects, and especially of them of Tranand 50 % of coined gold to be paid in the name of two years tribute. Which Embassadours fluania, a great fum of mony, to pay the Turks his tribute, then two yeares behind : Which and 50 directly from Sibynium ouer Danubius into Servia, and so trauelling thorow Thrathing ferued Maylas and his complices, as a fit occasion to raise the people into rebellion, perpaning the Conftantinople. In the meane time the dead body of the King was with much funding them, that there was no reason to pay vnto the Turke such a tribute; as would seme cia, came to control Sibynium to Alba Regalis, most of the army following it, and there beauines carried from Sibynium to Alba Regalis, most of the army following it, wel to wage ten yeres honorable war against him: so that by that and such like persuasions all with great folemnitie buried. After this the yong king was christned and called Stephen, and the prouince was in an vprore, little differing from manifest rebellion. To appeale there danwith great received with the antient Crown of king Stephen, who first erected that King- A yong childe gerous troubles thus arising, king lohn fent certaine of his chiefe mobility and best captaines more presently and without which the Hungarians neuer accounted their Kings lawfully crowned. Yet crowned bing with a great power into Transylvania, following after himselfe in his charges, not yet well rethe Royal dignity was by common consent of the Nobility given vnto the Queen; with concovered of his late fickenesse. These noblemen entering in two places into Translutania and H dition, that in al publique writings the names of the fon and the mother should be joined, and fecuring vp and downe the country, had in (hort time to vied the matter, that what by force, the Kings mony coined with the same inscription. But the chief authority rested in George what by policy, the tumultwas well pacified, and divers of the chiefe offenders worthily exethe Bishop, for he was Treasurer, and had at his command the castles & strong holds: yet were cuted. Maylas the ambitious author of this fedition, not able to hold the field against the kine. the foldiers with their enfigues and furniture at the denotion of Valentinus Thuracus. In the and feeing himselfe beset on every side with his enemies, retired himselfe with all his wealth middle betwixt these twowas placed Peter Vicebe the Kings kinsman, and by the old king apinto a towne called Fogaras, a place of great frength, which the kings power shortly after pointed for one of the tutors of his yong ton, suspected of neither part, honored with the rihardly belieged : the king himfelfe then lying at Sibynium, the chiefe sity of Transluania. tleof the high Conftable. But because the name of this George the Bishop was most famous about a mile distant from Fogaras, sicke of an ague, wher into he was againe fallen through too in this woful war which we are about to write, I thought it worth the labor to speak somthing much care and paines taken in trauelling in that hot time of the years, the daies being then at of his nature and disposition; that it may be known to all posterity, by what policie this war the longest. Whilest he thus lay sicke at Sibynium, and his army fast by at the siege of Roge. C was managed, & how this flourishing kingdom by the madnes of the Hungarians came into Rume Ifabel. 182, newes was brought vitto him from the court, That the Queene his wife was delivered of a the Turks hands. This George was born in Croatia, and brought up from his youth in the house of king John, George Bishop where vertue and industry neuer wanted relief; when as he vnaduifedly before had entred into of Vradum d

faire young fon : which was no fooner bruted abroad, but the flungasians as men ourrjoyed, came flocking to the court where the king lay, discharging their pieces in stiumph, with all other fignes of joy and mirch they could possibly deuties the noblemen came from the camp to rejoyce with the king, and all the army was filled with gladnesse, And for the greater folemnity of this fo common a joy, a royall feast was prepared, which the noblemen would needs have the king to honour with his presence, though he were thereto unwilling, being as yet but a little recoursed a howbeit yeelding to their importunity, he suffered himselfe to be Querruled and brought to the feaft by them, which was vnto him the merriest and the last that euer he made: for willing to shew his inward joy, and to content his nobility there present. be forgot himselfe and eat and dranke more liberally than was for the health of his weake bo- K dy : whereby the feater which had but a little before left him, was againe renewed, in such fort, as that he well perceived he could not long endure. Wherefore feeling his end to draw fast on, he made his Will, appointing his yong fon to be his heire, whom he committed to the tuition of George Bishop of Veradium, and Peter Vicche a noble gentleman and hisneere kinsman, vntill he came to age: requesting the rest of the noblemen to prefer his son in the succession of the kingdom, before a stranger; telling them, That Salyman would vadoubtedly take vpon him the protection both of the kingdome and of his fonne, if they would in time fend Embassadors vnto him with presents, and promise for his son, that he should reigne as his tributary, as he had done before : and fo presently after died,

This king was of a courteous and gentle nature, bountifull, and in all his doings just, of no L fierce and rough disposition, as the Hungarians commonly are, but of a most civill behaviour, garnished with good letters, and thorowly schooled in the divers chances of both fortunes: not measuring his actions by the strength of his power, but by the exact rule of discretion; for in time of bulinesse no man was more circumspect or vigilant than he, nor in time of re-The benemable creation any man more courteous or pleasant. He vied oftentimes to fay, That the fauor and fering of ting love of valiant men gotten by bounty and courtefie, was the best treasures of a Prince for that courreous and thankfull men, did oftentimes in some one worthy piece of service, plentifully repay what focuer had been bestowed woon them : as for such as were vnthankefull, they did to their shame beare the restimony of another mans vertue.

The kings death was kept fecret vntill such time as the noblemen had agreed with Maylas, M. that he should take an oath of his faithfull allegiance to the king, and his fon his lawful heire, and fo still to injoy his former place & gouernment: which offer Maylat gladly accepted. Then calling together the counsell, it was decreed to fend the same Bubassage to Solyman, which was appointed the old king yet living. So were prefently dispatched away two most honourathe orders of a monastical! life, and weary too late of the streitnes therof, had for saken his profession. Wherfore being of a very pleasing nature, and still following King Iehn driven out of his kingdom, and long lining in exile, he won such credit and commendation for his fidelity, integrity, and ready counsel in the kings most doubtful & dangerous affairs, that after Sabacthe that worthy bithop was by the trechery of Aloyfin Grittus flain at Baxovia, he obtained the great Bishoprick of Veradium. After that, when he had strengthned his credit with great

D wealth, he always as a faithful counsellor swaied and happily ruled both the court and kingdom, to the profit of the king. But he was of fuch a divers and pliant nature, that performing mall actions all the parts of a most ready and excellent man, he seemed to be made of contratyqualities, and born to do any things for in faying of his prieftly feruice, and performing the other ceremonies of the Christian Religion, hae shewed, or at least counterfeited such a contition in his denout countenance and speech, that a man would have thought it could not possibly be the same man, who in the most weighty affairs both of war and peace, did most floutly thew the wonderful force of a pregnant and couragious wit: for he vied to keep whole companies of most excellent & ready horsmen, and would oft times come forth into the battelarmed; he would with often banquets and rewards win the hearts of the foldiers, and after E the maner of great chieftains, maintain the honor, and credit of his name, both with punishthent & reward, as occasion required. Beside that, no man looked into the wealth of the king-

dommore diligently than he : no man did to more profit let to farm the customs, old mines, feedings, and falt pits no man could deuife finer means to raife mony, of all others the readiestway to credit: insomuch as King John would confesse himself to reign by the special indufry of that one man. And King Ferdinand would many times fay, that he envied at King 10hm for nothing he had, but for one booded fellow, which was better for the defence of a kingdom than 1000 with helmets out heir heads. Wherefore this Bishop having taken upon him the trition of the yong King, was ftil builed in all the weighty causes of the kingdom both civil and martial. He labored with great care, that the Hungarians should agree together in lone

F and unity, and did what he might, providently to forefee, that no tumult or rebellion should any where arife, wherby the beginning of the kingdoin, yet but weak; might any way be troubled. But king Ferdinand hearing of the death of king John, thought it now a fit time for him to recouer again the kingdom of Hungary, which he had fo long defired. Where he was also 000

But they had (as they said) before given their faith vnto him, as to a vertuous and faithfull prince, whom they had preferred before one that was a natural Hungarian born: wherfore he should do both vnaduisedly and vnkindly, if letting flip the occasion presented, he should defer to make war. For, what could be more dishonorable to him so great a King, and also Emperour elect, than by shameful delay to forfake them, being noble & valiant gentlemen, which had followed his part, and were then teady with strong troups of horsmen to do him the best service they could.

The German captains in like maner perfuaded him to take the matter in hand, who as martial men, expeding some one preferment, some another, in the Army, were desirous of honor, pay and prey, the chief comforts of their trauell and peril.

Yet for all that, King Ferdinand persisting in his former purpose, made with all preparation K. Ferdinand forwars, trufting vpon the aid of the emperor his brother, and the comming ouer of the Hungarians, who euer thought it cause honest enough for them to revolt, if it so stood with their the singdom of present profit. But before he would enter into open wars, he sent Nicolas County of Salma to Hungary of the the Queen, to shew her the instruments of the last league betwixt the king her late husband and him, & to exhort her to yeeld up the kingdom, which by the late league was another mans right, and not by delaying the matter to hurt both her felf & her fon. For King Fardinand of-C fered to give vnto the child the province of Sepulia, as was before agreed betwire the two Kings expressly in the league : and to the queen a greater reuenue, and what soeuer els she had in dowry. But if the should forget that lawful league, he threatned, that neither the Emperor Charles his brother, nor he, wanted force wherwith to recouer by strong hand the kingdom, annexed to the house of Austria both by antient right, and the new consent of most of the Hungarian nobility. The County of Salmabeing received at Buda, hardly obtained to be admitted to the presence of the queen : for George the Bishop, and Vicehe, mistrusting her womanly courage, faid the was not to be spoken withall, for that the was so ful of heavines and forrow: & that they were of authority as the kings tutors, & ready to give him both audience & anfwer. Which opinion of her weaknes and want of judgment, the queen, being a woman of an D heroical and royal spirit, took as tending so much to her disgrace, that she said she would kil her self, if the Embassadors were not permitted to come into her chamber, which was a dark

Herupon King Ferdinand, furnished with mony from Charles the Emperour, without delay raised a great army, which he sent down the river Danubius to Strigonium, which City had all the reign of king John continued faithful to king Ferdinand. The General of his army was Leonardus Velsus a Nobleman of Rhetia, who for many causes thought it expedient, first to H open the way to Buda; for almost in the middle of the way stood Vicegrade, with a goodly cafle vpon the top of a hil by the river; which town, but not the caftle, Veljian after nine dayes fiege took, with the losse of about 200 of his men, all the garison soldiers therin being either flain or taken prisoners, with Valentinus Litteratus their Captain. From Vicegrade he passed ouer the river Danubius to Pesth, which he took, being for saken of the enemy. With like succes he took the city of Vacia without loffe. And remouing thence, and croffing again the Ri-Ruda befriged. uer with his fleet, came and incamped before Buda, fo to terrifie the Citifens, and to discouer as far as he could, the purpose of the queen. Where Perenus, Stephanus Rascaius, and Franciscus Francepanes Bishop of Agria, all men of great nobility among the Hungarians, revolted from the Queen to king Ferdinand. The Bishop was reputed a man of great integrity, & vpon meer 1 conscience went ouer to K. Ferdinand: yet was he by letters from George the kings tutor, challenged to have revolted, in hope by means of Charles the Emperor to be made a Cardinal, Vel. fins lay with his army at the hot baths, about a mile and a half from the city, as if he would rather besiege it than assault it. The Germans lying there did setch in booty round about the country: which was taken in euil part by the Hungarians on their side, who seeing their own cattel or their friends driven away, the villages burnt, and the poore husbandmen bound and taken prisoners, fel together by the cars oftentimes with the Germans. On the other side they of Buda fending out their troups of horfmen, skirmitht with the Germans, if they did but flir out of the camp, and wel defended the villages from the injury of the enemy. For Valentinus Thursaceus General of the Queens power, had taken into the city a wonderful number of light K horsmen. Whilst the army lay thus incamped, it fortuned that Baliha Xar Pamphilus a Noble Hungarian, straying out of the camp even unto the gates of Buda, defired the Warders at the gate to give him leave to talk with Valentinus their Generall, for that he defired to fee his old friend, and to confer with him of certain matters concerning the good of the common state. Which thing being granted by the General, he was immediatly received into the City with his troup of horfmen. Shortly after returning again into the camp, he reported how hee had bin entertained by his old acquaintance in the city: where viewing the garison, the great Artillery, and fortification of the city, he perceiued it was not to be taken without a greater power, and in a more scasonable time of the year. Which thing so mooned Velsius, by nature sufpitious, and doubtful of the fidelity of a stranger, that he commanded him in anger to avoid 1 the Camp, because he had without his leave gon into the city, and vpon his owne insolencie had conference with the Enemy, and by amplifying their strength, to have discouraged the The kingtorms Army, by putting them out of hope of victorie. Wherfore Velsius neuerattempting to alfault the City, returned again to Vicegrade, to besiege the higher Castle (wherin the antient Crown of King Stephen, wherewith the Hungarian Kings were euer after him crowned, was kept) which Castic he also took with somthing lesse losse than he had don the lower Towne-Not long after, he marched with his Army unto Alba-Regalis, the City where the Hungarian Kings were vivally crowned and buried: which town by the means of Perenau was deliuered vnto him, and a Garrison put into it for King Ferdinand. These things thus done, Velsius retyred againe to Strigonium: which he did the rather, because the Germanes and Hunga- M rians, two rough Nations, could by no meanes agree together; infomuch as that Velsim the Generall in parting them was wounded in the thigh, and Perenus was hurt with, a stone. Befides that, Winterwas now come far on, and the Souldiours cried out forwant of pay. For which causes Velsins (being also sick of the Stone) billetted his Souldiors for that Winter

At such time as King Ferdinand was leuying his forces for the inuation of Hungary, the Queen by the counsell of the Bishop had in good time craued aid of the Turks lieutenants in the countries bordering vpon Hungary; especially of Vftref governor of Bosna (a very aged man and of great honour, who had maried one of the daughters of BajaZet the old Emperour) as also of Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade, and Amurathes who had the charge of the frontiers of Dalmatia. From whom she received one answer, That they might in no case without expres commandement from Solyman depart from the places committed to their charge. Be-B fides that, Mahometes was by rewards ouercome by Lascus, as he passed by Belgrade to Confantinople, not to stir or aid the Queen. Wherfore she, rejected by these great Captains, cer- The queen eratified Solyman by her Embassadors, in what danger her self, her son, and the kingdom was, cra- uetbaild of Souing his speedy aid. Lasen was not yet come to Constantinople, being faln sick by the way ; but had fent before Ptolemens his physitian to the great Bassa's, and especially vnto Lutzis his old acquaintance, vpon whom he had bestowed great gifts, and was in hope by him to have obtained what he defired; but all in vain: for Solyman, who thought it much for his honour to defend his own right, and that he had before given vnto King Ibhi; thought also that it would redound both to his great profit and glory, if he should as it were vpon charity take vpon him the protection of the widow and fatherles child, in their fo great distresse and danger. Wher-C forecalling to him the Embassadors, the three great Bassa's standing by, he said, That he had of his meer bounty before given the kingdome of Hungary vnto King John deceased, to descend to his posterity, so long as they should retain the kind remembrance of so great a benefit. Wherfore to declare his constancy inseparable from his bounty, hee said he would take Selman are fuch a course in the matter, as that the Germans his enemies should not long reiouce of the misting year wars they had begun. And in token of friendship, and that he had taken upon him the prote. and ber fon, a... ction of the yong King, he caused to be deliuered vnto the Embassadors a royal robe of pur- sains Ferdiple and gold, a buckler with the boffe most curiously wrought, a horsmans mace with a han present to the dle of gold, and a scimiter with the scabberd richly set with stones. And afterwards wrotes. Jung King. fectually to V firef and Mahometes his lieutenants, That they should without delay give aid to D the Queen and not to make excuse because it was winter; threatning them, That if she took any harm through their default and negligence, it (hould cost them their heads. The Queens Embassadors glad of their good dispatch, were scarce departed from the Turks Court, when Lase we came to Constantinople, and understanding by his physician the succes of the Hungarian Embassadors, proceeded for all that in his businesse, and deliuered his message, and vpon reasonable conditions requested the kingdom for king Ferdinand. But when hee in speaking had oftentimes made mention of Charles the Emperor, as if hee would with all the power of Germany aid his brother; Solyman was so mooued therwith, that he was presently taken away and committed to prison the great Bassa's but especially Rustan, Solymans son in law, a proud Lifeus K. Ferand furious young man, chiding him, and shaking him up as worthy of death, for offending ball der impri-E with his liberty of speech the majesty of so courteous a Prince, and as it were mocking the sould by Solyking of kings, requiring friend (hip, when in the mean time his mafter most impudently made """ wars in Hungary.

Vilref and Mahometes the Baffa's aforefaid having received fuch streit commandment from Solyman, affembled their dispersed souldiers, and by shipping brought them down the rivers Savus and Dranus, into Danubius. For it is a hard matter to perform any great thing by wars in Hungary, without the helpe of a great fleet, for conveying of the great Ordnance, victuall, and other such necessaries of the army, from one side of the great rivers to the other, as occasion requireth. But as then being the midst of winter, and the North wind blowing hard, Danubius was so frosen on both sides, that the middle of the river was scarse open; so that the Turks F not able to passe for the extremity of the weather, nor daring to return for the streit command of Solyman, were inforced in their Tents there to abide the hardnes of Winter, to shew their readines. It is almost incredible to be spoken, with what patience and resolution the soldiers endured all the extremity of the time in sobare a place, their horses, which of all other things they hold most dear, staruing for cold and want of meat.

From thence they refin in vaine remound to Pefth, which was fovaliantly defended by Barcecius and Fatifem, the one of them befreged by the an Hungarian captain, the other a German; that the Turks dispairing of the winning of the city, and not wel relieued with victual from the Queen then, fearing future want, passed again ouer Danubius, & faithfully restoring the great ordnance without any more doing, returned

But in their retyring, the Hungarians by the leading of Feren tius Gnarus flew many of them; among whom was one Achemates, one of their best and valida-King Ferdinand advertised of the Turks departure, returned again to his old hope of recouering the kingdom; perfuading the Emperor his brother, not to give ouer thewar fo fortunatly begun, especially now that the Turks having for saken the Queen, were departed &cgon. Wherfore the new forces lately before raifed in Austria, Bohemia, Silesia, and Moravia, for a K. Ferdinand new supply of Velsius his army, were presently sent into Hungary, under the leading of the lord William Regenderff Reward of the Kings houle, who was then gon as fat as Poffonium, to have 1 with an Army relieved them of Pessh; vnto whom, as a more antient and honourable Generall, Velsus gave place. He, furnished with these new supplies, three months victuals, and great Aftillery from Vienna, joining with the old Aimy marched directly to Buda and befieged it. Ouer against the flately castle of Buda, wherin the Queen lay, was a great hil called 8. Gerrards mount, fo high, that the middle therof was equall with the highest place of the eastle; and from the top therof they might look into the freets of the City: betwire which hil and the Caftle was great valley and deep ditch. Vpon this hil, Rogendorff to beat the Castle, and to terrific the Queen planted his battery, and fo shook a new built tower therof, that it was thought that it would have suddenly fallen: which if it had, yet was it supposed a dangerous matter to have affaulted it, because it was walled about with a treble wal. But the sumptuous turrers and the K princely galleries of the Kings palace in the Castle, which enery man faw Regenderff might haue beaten down with his great ordnance, he spared : but whither of himself, or essemmant ded by the King (as loth to destroy such goodly buildings as could not without great charge be in long time again repaired) was uncertain. Wherfore by divers heralds fent to the queen, he wished her to breake in sunder those gyves and fetters wherin the Bishop vnder colour of protection had fast bound her fon and her, and to accept of K. Fardinandi offer, who was reading to beflow upon her a goodly feignfory, wherin the might most honourably live in quiet, and bring up her fon in fafety. Which thing if the as a fimple woman ignorant of her owne danger, should refuse, and obstinatly contemn the peril wherein the stood, he would forthwith in most terible maner beat down the palace about her ears. Wherunto the Bishop in the queens L behalf answered, That she was not such a fool to exchange the kingdom of Hungary for the principality of Sepusia: and that she thought Rogendorff a very dotting and mad old man, who being once before wel beaten in those dirches, came now again like a fool to receive his veter destruction in full guerdon of his rash folly. Wherefore hee should cease to terrific valiant men, fighting with discretion for their natural King and country, against his drunken company; for that they were nothing troubled with the noise of his great shor. But yet he said, that he would about all the rest, by way of prinat curtosie, gently request Rogendorff to discharge his pieces with a little leffe noise, because he had a sow at home great with pigs, which terrified with the thundring of his guns, would farrow he doubted before her time, to the grief of his guells. For the Bishop was of a sharpe and taunting spirit; and such a contemner of the M Germans, that when two of them were taken in the Kings or chards, burning certain or chards, he inderision caused two hogs to be hanged upon the same gallows with them. Not long after, Regardorff removed his camp from S. Gerrards mount, to a more convenient place for the battering of the City, called the Iewes Granes, neere vnto the Gate called the Iewes Gate.

Which thing the Bishop seeing, after his quipping manner requested of Rogendorff to pardon him in that he had of late wrongfully called him a doting old man; for that in removing his camp into a more commodious place, he feemed to be a proper wife man, and of good differetion now that he had pitched his tents in a most fit place amongst the dead, both for himself being an old man, and almost worn with vain labor; and for his army condemned to dy there withhim. Rogendorff thus incamped, began in two places to batter the wals : Perenus with the Hungarians and the Bohemians neer vnto the gate called Sabatina in one place, and hee himself with the Germans betwixt the lews gate and the Castle in another which was done with such violence, that a great part of the wal was beaten down; and another part therof ouerchatged with earth, which the defendants had cast up on the inner side for the strengthning there-B. of was at the fame rime born quite out and fo fel downe, to the wonderfull difmaying of all A great breash that were in the city. Which fair opportunitie to have taken the city Rogendorff let flip, ei. in the walls of thet not wel aware therof, by reason of the great smoke of the artillery on both sides, and the dust arising with the fall of the wall, which covered all; or els according to his natural dispofition doing all things leifurely and fuspitiously; so that a little delay bereft him of the prefeht apprehension of to sudden a resolution: and the Germans, vied more to standing battells than to affaults, were not to be fo eafily brought on to affault the breach you the fudden, as were the Spaniards, Italians, or French. The wall was opened in that place almost two hundred paces in length, yet flanding almost the hight of a man, which might easily have bin scaled with (hort ladders t but night was comming now fast on, wherin the Germans would not C attempt any dangerous matter; to that the affault was deferred til the next morning. Wheras they of Buda in the mean time taking advantage of the enemies delay, with incredible diligence and labor in that night raifed up a new rampier in stead of the wal that was fallen, euery man without exception putting his hand to the work. In the morning the Germans com. The Germante ming to the breach, gaue fuch a fierce affault vnto the new made rampier, that Otho Fatifius affaulting the desperatly entred into a shattered house which joyned unto the wall, and certain other companies, one foldier helping up another, had almost recovered the top of the tampier, and were 'offthere ready to fet up their entignes. When they of Buda with wonderful confrancie and refolution withflood the affailants, George the Bifhop incouraging them, and fighting among ft them: who having laid afide his hood, was now to be seen with his helmet on his head, runp fling to and fro as need required all along ft the rampier. At length the Germans feeing themselues to strine in vain against resolute men, were inforced to retyre. In this assault Rogendorff loft aboue 800 men. Perenus was alfo in like maner, but with leffe loffe, repulsed at the other breach he had made at the gate Sabatina. After that, Rogendorff attempted by undermining to have taken the city, but was by countermines disappointed of his purpose. The Germans could not go so closely, but that by the clattering of their Armor and the light of their matches they were descried by the Watch : who asking for the word, and they not giving it, presently raised an Alarm : but now all too late, the City being as good as half taken, had the Germanes well conducted resolutely gon on with the matter so wel begun : but they ignorant of the way, and now deare discovered scried and chased with their own fear, ran backe agains to the postern in such hast, that one of chaistendied, them miserably wrung another, in Ariuing who should get out first and their passage was much letted by the pikes and weapons which they which fled first had cast crosse the way. to run the lighter into the camp. Ram places of Mahometes another of his great Baffa's he fent into Hungary to relieue the hefieged Queen. And after him Ffref Baffa (which was the fourth of his chiefe Baffa's) with another Army to flay at Belgrade, in readinesse to aid the other great Bassa sent before him, as occasion should require, if he should find his enemies too strong. Vnto Barbaruff's hee committed his Navy, for the defence of Grecia and Epirus against Auria; who but a little before (aided by M the Gallies of Sicilia and Naples) had driven the Turks and Moors (which took part with the Turkes) out of Clupea, Neapolis, Adrumentum, Ruspina, Tapsus, and all alongst that coast of Africke which the Moores call Mahomedia, except the City of Leptis, and caufed those Cities to submit themselves vntothe gouernment of Mutes fes King of Tunes.

A These cities are at this day called Calabia, Susa, Mahometa, Monasterim, Sfaxia, and Africa. And because Solyman understood, that Maylas the Vayuod of Transylvania tooke part with King Ferdinand, he fent against him Achomates gouernor of Nicopolis, and commanded Peter of Moldavia, Prince of Valachia, to aid him, who afterwards accordingly came vnto him with 20000 horsmen. He himself also doubting the purposes of the Christian princes, and especially of Charles the emperor, more than he had need, came to Hadrianople, and in the countries therabouts raifed a third army, to aid the two Bassa's sent before him into Hungary, keeping. with him his fon in law Rastan, whom he had made one of the four great Bassa's of his Counfel having thrust out Lufisbeius, whom the Turks cal Lutzis, his brother in law, and exiled him into Macedonia for euil intreating and striking his wife, which was Solymans fister, as is before faid.but was at this time don. Mahometes the Bassa desirous to do his great master the best service he could, entred into atthemetes Hungary with his Army about the middle of lune, in the year 1541, taking with him in his Baffa comes way the other Mahometes gouernor of Belgrade, who gaue the Christians that thameful ouer- with an army " throw not farre from Exek; ioyning also with him the power of Bosna, now commanded by Vlemus the Persian, for that V stref the old Bassa was lately dead. The captains of the Christian army hearing of the comming of the Turks, entered into counsell, whether they should continue the fiege, or els go and meet them by the way and give them battel. But the period of the Hungarian kingdom drawing fast on, and the inevitable destiny therof so requiring, the opinion of Rogendorff prevailed against the rest for continuing of the siege; he seeming more willing to die, than to crosse ouer the river to Pesth, or to retyre to Vicegrade or Strigonium, as divers would have persuaded him. Wherfore he removed from the place where he lay be- The order of fore, and incamped his army on the further fide of the city, at the foot of S. Gerrards Mount; K. Ferdinands where the hil lying between Buda & the camp, & departing from the river, leaves a fair plain toward the East; of purpose that the Turks (whom he knew would not go far from the River and their fleet) should be inforced dangerously to passe by the mouth of his great Ordnance, which he had aptly placed upon the front of his trenches: for fuch was the nature of the place that the camp lay defended on the right hand with the steep hil, on the left hand with the riuer, and behind toward the city with a strong bulwark. Vpon the right hand, vpon a little rifing ground he placed the leffer camp, wherin were the Hungarians which fauored king Fer-D dinand, and then followed his enfignes. He made also a bridge from his camp into a little Isle which lay in the river, and with a fort wel planted with ordnance commanded both the River and the plain, so to beat the enemies fleet comming up the river, and themselves also as they should march alongst the plain. Hee was about also to have made a bridge of lighters and boats quite ouer the river from his Camp to Pesth; and in this order to expect the comming of new supplies from king Ferdinand, and to repel the enemy who was comming, and with long fiege to weary them in Buda: for there was such store both of victual and all other warlike prouision in Pesth, as would wel haue sufficed his army vntil winter had bin spent. As soone as the Turks were come nighthe city. Valentinus as an Embassador from the Queen, met them with two thousand horse, and fully instructed both the Mahomets, what the Christians did,

E what strength they were of and how they might most conveniently incamp their army: wherfore the Bassa marching on boldly forward, came within half a mile of the Christian Camp, The Bassa's Arwhere he quickly intrenched himselfe round with a strong trench, filling a great part of the my intreacheth plain with his Tents. But the other Mahometes Gouernor of Belgrade, a most politick cap. mile of K. Fertain, took the higher ground towards the rifing of the hill, neerer vnto the tents of the Hun. dinands army garians than of the Germanes. Vnto these two Armies thus incamped, belonged also two fleets; the Christian fleet consisted of four and twenty Galliots, about four core small pinna. ces, and little leffe than 100 ships of burthen, and other great boats. Wheras the Turks fleet was not thought to be past half so great. Neervnto the little Island, joined as we have before said by a bridge to the Christian Campe, beneath in the river had the Turkes taken another F Island called Cepellia, ouer against their own Camp, where casting vp a great bulwark in the vppermoftend therof, and planting it with great ordnance, they from thence shot at the fort which the Christians held in the little Island, and at their Vessells passing to and fro in the River, as the Christians did at them likewise. This Island of Cepellia lieth somwhat more

that if Rogendorff had at the first taken it, and fortified it before the comming of the Turks, as G the Hungarians perfuaded him to haue don, the Turks could by no means haue incamped in the plain, but must needs have for saken their fleet, setching a great compasse about more toward the Well, farther off from the river, which would have turned to the Turks great difaduantage. But no man is fowife as to foresee all things, when as the enill succes, be the plot neuer fo well land, shal of it self besides the losse, leave unto the unfortunate man the note of the want of provident forefight and discretion. But Rogendorff was not willing to divide his forces until he had some new Supply from King Ferdinand. Whilst the armies lay thus neer one to another, there were some light skirmishes made every day, either by the horsmen or footmen, and sometime one brave man challenging forth another hand to hand, whom he thought by his armour, or fome other figne of his worth, to be like to himfelf: which was so pleasant a fight to behold, that both H the armies vpon a military curtefie, as if it had bin fo agreed, would many times for certaine hours forbear to shoot any shot, of purpose to see those gallants, with true prowesse to proue their valor and manhood one vpon another with their spears and swords only. In which light skirmithes the German horimen were oftentimes put to the worft, who mounted vpon heavy horses, fitter for a set battell, could neither so readily charge the enemy, nor pursue him in his flight, as could the Turks with their nimble ready light horsmen, so wel acquainted with that maner of flying fight, that they would with wheeling about easily frustrat the first charge of the heavy horimen, and by and by come voon them again with a fresh charge, and so often retyre and come on again, vntil they had either wearied or ouerthrown them. But the Hungarians acquainted with that manner of fight as well as they, and also better armed, dideasily encounter the Turks and foil them, although they were in number moe.

There was among it the German captains a nobleman called Eckius Raylchachius, whose son (a valiant vong gentleman) being got out of the Army without his fathers knowledge, bare himself so gallantly in fight against the enemy, in the sight of his father and of the army, that he was highly commended of all men, but especially of his father, who knew him not at all: vet before he could cleer himselfe he was compassed in of the enemy, and valiantly fighting flain. Raylchachius exceedingly mooued with the death of so braue a man, ignorant how neer it touched himself, turning about to the other captains, said, This worthy gentleman, what soener he be, is worthy of eternal commendation, and to be most honorably buried by the whole army. As the rest of the captains were with like compassion approuing his speech, the dead K body of the vnfortunat fon rescued, was presented to the most miserable father, which caused all that were there present to shed tears : but such a sudden and inward griefe surprised the aged father, and ftrook so to his heart, that after he had stood a while speechles, with his eyes fet in his head, he fuddenly fell down dead. From that time the General commanded, That no man should upon pain of death go out of the army to skirmish with the enemy without leaue: wherin he was so seucre, that he hanged up one or two that presumed to transgresse his commandment. Which thing much discouraged his own men, and so incouraged the enemy, that they would somtime braue the Christians upon the top of their own trenches.

Many daies had now passed since the comming of the Bassa, the Turkes and they of Buda daily increasing both in strength and courage, when as on the other side, faint courage, weake L frength, troubled counsel, vncertaine resolution, the ominous signes of an vndoubted overthrow, were easie to be seen and hope it self, the stay of all human actions, especially of martial affairs, almost lost: the only things which veheld their fainting hearts, were, the often Letters of king Ferdinand; and the firm opinion they had conceiued, That Charles the Emperour would not in so great a danger fail to aid his brother both with men and mony; and last of all, the firm resolution of a General, which far passed al reason, the sooner to draw him to his end. The armies lying in this order, the Turkes from the higher ground and out of Ceppellia, perceiuing the Germans in the little Island as carelesse men to keep but slight watch, agreed amonght themselves, at one instant out of both their Camps to assail divers of their forts: and the Turks fuel fo by break of the day landed with their fleet fo closely and fuddenly to the Island, that they M deals affaithe had flain almost soo of the Germans before they were throwly awake or could wel arm them sclucs. Wherwith the rest were put in such a fear, that they fled to the Campe in such haste, that many of them fel beside the bridge, and were drowned in the River. All the Camp was

railing the alarm in divers places at once: yet for all that certain German Companie sin one of the forts neerest vnto the river, and the foldiers in the fleet, wel declared their present resolution and valiant courage, in recovering again of the Island. For Herbestulfus the Camp mafler persuading them not to suffer the Christian ensignes and great ordnance to be so shamefully caried away by the Turks, & Marine the Admiral at the fame time landing divers companies in the Island with his pinnaces and great boats; they so couragiously charged the Turks, then busied in spoiling the dead bodies, and drawing away of the great ordnance, that they draue them again to their boats, leaving vnto them as victors both the Island and Ordnance; having before their departure received no lesse losse themselves, than had the Germans before.

It was reported, that the Turks fleet might that day have bin quite overthrown, if the Christians vsing the victory, and holpen with the course of that swift river, had couragiously purfued them and landed with them. But many things after a matter is don are eafily feen, which inthe very heat and hurle of the danger canot be forefeen; forasmuch as sudden accidents attended with great peril, do oftentimes dasse the minds of right wise and valiant captains: yet four of the Turks pinnaces were funke, and three taken, and many of the Turks flain or drowned in the river. Shortly after, the Turks more and more incouraged with the multitude of themselues, and the fearfulnes they perceived in their enemies, did at fundry times so insolently trouble and affail the camp of the Christians on every fide, that they left them almost no time of rest, one company stil succeeding another; so that they were almost in dispair to 6 beable long to defend their camp, the enemy ftil growing both in strength and courage. For the Baffathat lay at Belgrade stil taking vnto him the fick and wounded soldiers, sent continually fresh men in their stead : and Palentinus taking to him a company of the Turks harquebuliers, had driven Perense with the Hungarian horimen out of the vpper camp. So that they in the nother camp were now hardly befet by their enemies on every fide : yet were they well holpen by the great Artillery from Pesth, which much troubled Valentinus and his horsemen in affailing the camp on that fide.

Some report, that Valentium, not greatly angry with the Hungarian banished men, but with Valentinui the the Germans, did by the way of privat curtefie or friendship, by a faithful souldier with Pere- queen curtefie the Germans, and by the way of privat curtene or triendinip, by a natural foliation with Fere-nus, speedily to provide for the lafety of himselfe and of the Hungarians with him; for that am of Solythere was a great beaft comming which would at one morcel deuour them al. For Solyman ad-mans comming uertised of the doings of the Emperour and King Ferdinand, thinking that they would have come down to Buda with a puissant army, was resolued to be present himself at so notable a battel, and was therfore comming thither with his Army in all haft. Wherfore Perenn thus forewarned, faid plainly to Regendorff and the other captains, that except they would prefently rife with the army and depart, he would now whilst he had yet time make shift for himself and his countrymen. Their opinions diverfly delivered, at last they all agreed, that it was best the next night to passe ouer the river to Pessh. Only the General by fatal obstinacy said, He would not without King Ferdinands commandement depart from Buda: and therefore fent County Salma with a swift pinnace up the river to Vienna, to know his pleasure therin. In the mean time vrged with fear, Perenia fretting at their long flay, it was resoluted upon, that they should the next night, after the Moon was downe, passe ouer the river with four convoyes to Pesth. In the first were to passe ouer the Hungarians with their great ordnance. In the second the German and Bohemian horfinen, and in the other two, the footmen and baggage of the army: for it was not fo easie a matter to make a bridge ouer Danubius, as they had at first supposed: for after they had begun it & almost planked it, there rise such a wind and tempest, and the violent river became fo rough, that the timber wherwish the bridge was fastned together was broken, the joints valosed, and many of the boats wherof the bridge was framed, their cables being broken, were carried away by the force of the ftream. The first and second convoy The Christiani fortune fo fauored that they wel paffed over; for although they of Budgand the Turkes, fee. departs night ing in the day in a few shall bigh places their flow days for covering together into one clace migh.

F ing in the day time from their high places their fleet drawing together into one place, might haue some suspicion of the matter, some ghessing one thing, and some another, yet could they forescenothing of that sudden departure of the enemy. But that multitude of ships and boats now palling to and fro, could not long be hid from the attentive and vigilant Enemy; and so much the leffe, for that two sugitive Hungarians even then discovered to the Bishop, the flight of the Germans; who presently certified the Bassa,and the other Mahometes therof. G which without further delay came almost with all their power to assault the Christians in their camp: the great ordnance was brought forth, and after the Ianizaries and other footmen. followed the horimen, difmounted from their horses to do the better service; who all with a horribly cry affailed the trenches. Then began the Germans to quaile, their flight being now discovered vet did they with the the Bohemians for a while notably resist the enemy. Al the campe was filled with tumultand confusion, and especially at the river side, every man in that great feare fixiuing to get aboord, without regard of order or shame : for the dead time of the night then covered with darke and thicke clouds, made all things more terrible, even vnto them which were of best courage: the authority of Rogendorff the General (in the darknesse of the night, and so great clamour both of his owne people and of the enemy, and the thundring H of theoremance) was as nothing: he (besides that he was then sick in mind) lay in his bed wounded by a wonderfull and fatall chance; for as he was writing letters to the king, a faulcon those out of the enemies camp falling in his tent, and firiking in funder a cheft which flood there. wounded him gricuously in the left shoulder with a splinter of the same. The other captaines of the footmen enuying that the horfmen were fo wel escaped, stood as men more carefull of themselves, than of the common danger, faintly resisking the enemy. The upper tents wherin Perenus lay, were first taken by Mahometes of Belgrade, and Valentinius, & the German sootmen chased all over S. Gerrards mount. They of Buda also fallied out, and entred the camp on that fide which was next voto the City, and with wild fire burne the Tents, a little before forfaken A milebiscious by the Germans. And the Bishop at the same time caused a great stacke of straw standing by the kings fables, neer unto the rivers side, to be fet on fire, which gave such a light that a man might have feen all over Danubius vnto the wals of Pefth, as if it had bin light day:whereby the great confusion of the Christian army by land, as well as the shameful flight by water, was of the Turks plainly discoucred. Then was the great artillery on enery side discharged upon the flying fleet, as wel from Buda, as the Turkes Campe. And to increase the feare, Calin the Turks Admiral rowing with his light boats against the stream, set you the ships crossing the river to Peffh, where he took certain boats loded with fouldiers, and his great ordnance funke divers others: fo the river was filled with dead bodies, and the miferable company of mariners and foldiers, laboring to faue their lives by swimming : for at such time as the lanizaries having flain the first companies, were broken into the lower Campe; and the rest of the Ger- K mans flying ouer the bridge into the Island, were there slain without mercy, by the Turks purfuing them, many of them leapt into the river and there perished. Three hundred sail of one fort of thips and other were fo mingled together, that Danubius feemed that night to be couered ouer as if it had bin with a great bridge. But the Christian fleet seeing all lost, cleered them selves so soon as they could of the Turkes; and so beating them backe with their great ordnance out of the poups of their ships, got up the river to Comora. The rest of the Forces endured the same fortune by land in the Campe, of whom the Bohemians died most honous rably flain by the enemy in fight. Many falling into the hands of them of Buda were faued or flain, as it was their fortune to fall into the power of a mercifull or mercileffe man. But the Sunnerifing, plainely discovered the slaughter of the Christians, and the victory of the L Turks, not so well before known. There was about 3000 men of one fort and other, who in warlike maner had taken a little hil by S. Gerrards Church, and there food vpon their gard; untill fuch time as more than two thousand of them were flaine: the rest casting away their weapons, yeelded, in hope of life, and were referred for a spectacle more grieuous than death it felfe.

At the same time Cafen with his victorious fleet comming to the shore of Pesth, brought fuch a fear upon them that were escaped thither, and might easily have defended the Walls, (only with the cry of his foldiers, and thundring of his artillery) that the horfmen for haft to get out, were like to ouer-run one another. The Germanes had at that time formuch forgot their wonted valor, and so trembled at the name of the Turkes, that as soone as they saw their M white caps in their thips they ran away as men difmaied marmed, leaving behind them their plate, their cariages, and what soeuer good thing they had els. Yet some Hungarian horsmen, more desirous of the spoile, than afraid of death, staid behinde rifling the merchants shops; for Pesth was become a very rich mart town for all kind of merchandile, merchants resorting thither thither from all other places of the troubled country, as to a strong and commodious city, and of more fafety than the reft. But Cafen now entring without refistance, flew fome of those Peth taken by greedy Hungarians, and ran thorow the towne with such barbarous cruelty and thirst of the Calon Admirate Christian bloud, that he spared neither man, woman, nor child, except some few, which either But. for their beauty or firength of body were referred for the Turks beaftly luft, or flauish labor: fothat in this war it is reported, more than 20000 Christians were one way and other by diuers chances flaine. There were taken at Pefth, in the campe and in the Island, 36 great pieces for battery, of wonderfull beauty; and of leffer field pieces 150. As for thor, powder, armor; weapons, and victuall provided for Winter, such store was found, that the Turks accounted it for the greatest part of their victory. Rogendorff the unfortunat Generall, at such time as the B Turks having won the trenches, were fighting in the midft of his camp, defiring rather to be flaine in his rent, than to live after fo great an overthrow, was against his will by strong hand Regender free flaine in his tent, than to live after to great an outstation, was against the would not leave him faint by will carried aboord a little pinnace by his physitian and chamber laine, which would not leave him faint by will carried about the carried as he lay, and was so conveighed up the river to the Island of Comora; where he shortly after, bu philiand partly for the painefulneffe of his wound, but more for griefe of minde, died in a little coun. Chamberlain, 19 tryvillage called Samarium, leaving vnto the Germans a wofull remembrance of his accurred dieth. obstinacy and pride. Solyman still doubting the comming of Charles the Emperour and King Ferdinand to Buda, was comming with his army from Hadrianople in such haft, that he caufed the lanizaties, his boft footmen, contrary to their manner, to march as fast as his horsemen: but understanding by the way, of the late victory obtained by his captaines, he tooke more C leifure, and came with a great power to Buda in August, and there incamped on the other side solyman come of the city, to auoid the noisome sauour of the dead bodies, which lay yet vnburied. Where method and a calling vnto him the other army, and making one huge campe of both, he highly commended all his captaines, but especially the two Mahometes. And understanding that the victory was especially gotten by the meanes of Mahametes Gouernour of Belgrage, he made him Generall of all his Europeian horsemen, one of the most honourable preferments of the Turkish Empire: the other captaines he rewarded according as they had deferued, and withall augmented their pay.

After that, he caused the prisoners, in number about eight hundred, to be brought out who Tartist erabound in long ropes, were in derifion led all along it the army, ranged in order of battell, and elly D afterward by his commandement flain by his yong foldiers : faying with feuere countenance, that they were worthy of such death, which by Embassadours dissemblingly entreating of peace, had in the meane time craftily waged war. Among it these prisoners was one souldier of Bauaria of an exceeding high stature & him in despight of the German nation, he deliuered to a little dwarfe (whom his fonnes made great account of) to be flaine, whose head was scarce so high as the knees of the tall captive; with that cruell fpight to aggravate the indignity of his death; when as that goodly tall man, mangled about the legs a long time by that apish dwarfe with his little scimeter, as if it had bin in disport, sell downe, and was with many seeble blowes hardly at last slaine by that wretch, still heartened on by others, to satisfie the eies of the Princes, beholding it as their sport.

This barbarous and cruell execution done, Solyman fent his Embassadors with presents to the yong king, which were three beautifull horses, with their bridles of gold, and their trappings richly fee with pretious stones, and three royall robes of cloth of gold, & vnto the chiefe of the nobility he fent rich gownes and chains of gold. The embassadors which brought these presents, in curteous manner requested of the Queene, to send the yong king her son, attended Solyman stade with his nobility, into the campe, and without all feare, to hope that all fhould go well both for the young with her and her fon: for that Solyman, who exceeded all other kings, not in power and fortune King his the things, not in power and fortune campe. only, but in vertue and voright dealing also, was of such an heroicall disposition, that he would not onely defend the childe, whom in the right of his father he had once thought worthy his protection and fauor, vi cory confirming the same, but would also augment his estate, with the largest bounds of his antient kingdome. Wherefore he was desirous to see the yong king, and to behold him in the representation of his father, and with his own hand to deliuer him to be imbraced of his fons; that of his protection renewed, so happily begun, might be grounded a firme and perpetuall friendship with the Othoman kings and that he would alwaies account of heras of his daughter. But the cause why he came not to see her, which hedid in curtesse defire, was for that by antient custome the Otheman Kings were forbidden that point of surrefle, G to visit other mens wives in their houses. Besides that, Selyman (they said) was not to forgetful of his modesty and honour, as to receive into his pauillion the daughter of a Kingrhia tierd and allie, and the the late wife of a King his friend and tributary, and the faire young mother of a sonne, growing in the hope of like regall dignity, for feare he should draw into any suferition the inuiclate name of her chastity, which in Queenes was to be guarded with an especial all and wonderfull care. Whereunto the Queene (a manifest feare confounding the tender fences in her motherly affe Rion) answered very doubtfully : but the Bishop persuading her. and inflantly requesting her, not to give the Turks occasion to suspect, that she them in The Queenfen distrust, by her little and unprofitable delay; sent her young son in Princely swathing clothes. deto the young in a rich chariot, with his nurse and certaine great ladies voto the campe, attended upon with H King be: Jon to Solyman in the almost all the nobility to whom Solyman had sent Presents. In his comming to the campe, he with the Nabi. was for honours fake mer upon the way by certaine gallant troups of the Turks braue horfemen : and all the way as he passed in the camp, orderly stood the lanizaries of solymans guard. Solyman curte. As soone as he was brought into the campe, Solyman courteously looked wpon him, and familia sully receiteth arly talked with the nurse, and commanded his sons there present to take him in their armes and to kiffe him, in certaine token of the love they would beare him; whom they were in time to have their friend and tributary, when he was growne to mans chate: thele were selimin and Baia (ct, begotten of his faire concubine Revolute) bearing the names the one of his grandfau ther, the other of his great grandfather. As for Muftaphathis eldeft fonne by his Circaffan wife, he then lived in Magnesia a great way off , who though he was a Prince of sogreat hope. I as neuer any of the Turkish kings had a sonne of greater, and was therefore exceedingly be. loued of the men of war; yet was he not fo well liked of his father brought out of favour with him by Roxelana, as if he had traiteroully gone about to take the Empire from him, yetliving as did Selymus his grandfather from Bajazer: for which cause Solyman secretly purposed to take him away, as afterwards he did, and to appoint Selymon for his funcessource hereafter shall

But Solyman at such time as the Noblemen of Huragary were dining merrily with the Basfa's, had commanded certain companies (towhom he had before given inftructions what he would have done) vider the colour of feeing the city, to take one of the gates called Sabating. and the chiefe Rreets : which was done fo quietly and cunningly, that a wary watchman standing there, and beholding the manner of the Turks comming and going too and fro, could hardly have perceived how the gate was taken, untill it was too late. For many of the Turkes walking faire and foftly by great companies into the city, asif it had bin but for pleafure, to haue feen it; and otherfome to colour the matter, walking likewife backe againe, as if they had fufficiently viewed the city; by that meanes they wirhout any tumult or ftirre quickely tooke the appointed gate, with the market place and chiefe streets of the city. Which so finely done, the captaine of the Ianizaries caused proclamation to be made in all parts of the city, That the citisens should without seare keepe themselves within their houses, and forthwith, as they would have their lives, liberty, and goods faued, to deliver all their weapons: which they feeing no remedy, did and having delivered their armes, and taken the Turks faith for 1 their fecurity, they received them into their houses as their vnwelcome ghefts. But suchwas the quietnes and modesty of the Turks, by reason of the severity of their martiall discipline, that no citisen which tooke them into their houses, was by them wronged by word or deed. Solyman understanding that the city was thus quietly and without relistance taken, fent the Solymen detai- childe backe againe vinto the Queene, although it was now almost night; but the chiefe noblemethibe Noble- men he retained ftill with him these were George the Bishop and Freasuret, Prirm Vicche the men of Hunga. Hell the tectumed that with alternative were George the Dianopand Freshus Visione the ryin bit campe, young Kings nigh kinfman and one of his Tutors, Valentinus Tutacesus Generall of the Queens forces, Stephanus Verbetius Chancellor, and Bacianus Vrbaneu Governour of thecity of Buda. This fudden and vnexpected change exceedingly troubled all their mindes, and so much the more; for that the great Baffa's with changed countenance began to picke quarrels with them, M and as it were streightly and impudently to examine them, and to call them to account for all that they had done. The Queene feeing the city focraftily surprised, and the nobility injuriously detained in the campe, troubled with seare and gricse, by humble letters requested Selyman not to forget the faith he had long before given unto her, and even of late confirmed

A by his Embassadors; but mindfull both thereof, and of his wonted elemency, to send backe untoher the Noblemen, who for their fidelity and valiant service had well deserved both of him and hersthis shedid by Rustemes Bassa, whom she had loded with gifts, and among st other things of great price, had fent him a faire coronet of her owne, and a goodly jewell fet with rich stone, to send unto his wife (Solymans daughter) for a Present. After that, Solyman confulted with his Bassacs foure daies, what order to take concerning The great Bas-

the kingdome of Hungary: in discourse whereof his great Bassacs were of divers opinions.

Mahometes aduised him to carry away with him to Constantinople, both the young childe disposing of the and all the Nobility, and to leave such a governour in Buda, as by his wise and moderate go. Hungar, nernment, rather than by rigour, might put the people out of feare of feruitude and bondage. B by defeading them from wrong, and yet by little and little lay upon them the yoke of the Turkish gouernement. But Rustemes Bassa (before corrupted, and a man in greater fauour than the rest, because he was Solymans Son in law, and therefore further from all suspition of flattery; flood altogether vpon tearmes of honour; faying, That nothing could be more dif. honourable ynto fo great and mighty a Monarch, who neuer had at any time with any foot or flaine blemished the glory of his name, than after victory, against all right and reason to breake his faith at once with a weake woman and filly infant, whom he had before taken voon him to protect and defend. On the other fide, Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade (an old mortall enemy of the Christians, of all the rest best acquainted with the state of Hungarv, and for his great experience and approued valour, then extraordinarily admitted by Selv-G man into counfell among the great Baffaes) difliked of both the former opinions, as too full oflenity; and beeing asked his owne, delivered it in this mischieuous manner as follow-

D your designes and the Imperiall state: for of right I may desire you to yeeld a little to my yeares, and (if I may by your good favour fo fay) to that I have already done : when as 1, now growne anold man in wars against these Hungarians, have by experience learned those things of the state and strength of this kingdome, and the diffosition of the people, which being here laid downe, may much availe for your better determination of this fower thy a cause as admitteth no repentance if you shall now be overseene therein. Tou have now within the pace of these twenty yeares come in wars your selfe in person five times into this country, when as I no obscure captaine or souldier, was in all those warres and battels ever present, of pur. page, as I suppose, to revenge your injuries, to inlarge your empire, and in briefe to assure you of a good peace, which could never be but by force of armes and victory. And therefore you valiantly won Belgrade, the infamous dwelling place and receptacle of most outragious theeues and robbers, and in former time famous for the unfortunat attempts of your ancestors : when as from thence the Hungarians in time of peace had at their pleasure, whilest your father was then occupied in the Persian war, spoiled the borders of Seruta, and Illyria. The same Hungarians about fine yeares after, for that they had in cruell manner slaine your Embassadors, you overthreso in battell, and slew their King: and possessed of Buda, to manifest and make knowne by a notable demonstration, the mag nificence of your heroicall minde, even unto the remotest nemies of our name, did chuse out of the reliques of that various shed Nation, one whom you might grace with the honour of the regall Crowne, although not borne of Royall bloud, or unto you knowne for any other defert, than that he was a little before both your publike and privat enemy; and comming against you with a frong power out of Transfluania, he had in the meane time loft hisbrother, abetter manthan him-Selfe, staine with our fword. After that, rose up the Austrian King, a new enemy, to expulse this Han-F garian, reigning by your coursefle, and so you tooke in hand the third warre against the Germanes, which Jonfo effectually projecused, that having forthwith restored the King, you carried the terrour of your selfe not enely to the wals of Vienna, but into the very heart of Germany. But two yeares scarcely past, the same King (nenerlong consented with peace or warres) supported by the power of his brother Charles, and in vaine befreging Buda, defended by your garrifons, flirred you up againe to revenge the injury, flaugh. G to rand poste by his fouldiers done : for that you thought it to fland with your honour, to protect him with your power wkom you had of your rare bounty made a King , and then defired about all things, to fight a noble but ell with the two brethren for the Empire of the West. But they at such time as you with fire and fivor dran thorow their antient king domes, endured not the noise of your comming. After that, ensued appeace betweene the Hungarians and the Germans, your Majesty permitting and approving it, at such time as you made hafte to goe against the Persians : but the Germane King so broke that peace, that had not I in good time reuenged his treachery, by the overthrow of a great army of his at Exek, you must of necessity have beene sent for from Babylon your selfe, as but now you were glad to come in hast, by long and painefull journies from Constantinople, to aid us in time, and as I werely hope to make an end for all that all things (et in firme order in Hungary, the inconveniences of so many labours and so great charge, sue H times undertaken for another mans profit, might now at length take end: except (as I fee some wish) you be in minde neuer to give over the protection of the childe and widow, a matter full of infinite labour and perill, not to be counternailed with that glorious shew of honour, which by these (in my opinion) too too wife men is pretended to your haughty minde, ener desirous of honour and fame. But I as a blunt man understand not this high point of wisedome, abounding with glory, which in the very course thereof cutteth in funder the finewes of wittery, and is never by politique Generals admitted into their camps. In which doing, as I wish you more fortunate than your ancestors, who have united eighteene king domes to the your Empire, so would I not have you more wise than they : for what can be a more unwise part, than alwaise to play the unwife man? that is to say, alwaies to be carefull of other mens affaires, and in the meane time oficationes to indanger his owne estate, his health, his wealth, bis honour . You have satisfied, and that (in my opinion) plentifully the duties both of charity, fidelity, and if it must needs be so, of honor and plory alfo ; if it be to be gotten rather by courtefie, elemency, and lenity, than by the inuincible strength of wise policy, and the constant resolution of a martiall mind for by those in struments, and none other hath worthy vertues alwaies promoted and supported the Othoman kings. Wherefore let those vaine shews (4) seemeth vato me) of counterfeit honour delight the minds of idle and slothfull kings : asuredly they nener pleased your armed ancestors; but after the enemy was quite ouerthrowne, the triumph made, and the trophics of victory crected. But let this be as best pleaseth your high wisdome and judgement, whereanto the greatest wits give place. Truly I (if I well foresee the chances of war, and the affured enents of things) will not follow that manner of counfell which the pleasure of my mind persuadeth me unto ; when as negetsity, which ruleth all things, presently forceth me & sheweth me a far better course. The Hungarians abone K all other things notably warne us not to trust them, who infamous for their inconstancy after reuelt and trechery, are still at variance among & them selves ; and their banished men are continually setting on the Germans to inuade the country, and the weake power of the Queene and the child is not fuch as may withstand soncere and so mighty an enemy : so that another mans king dome must of necessity be defended by our helpe, which may not be leffe than a firong army, without our great perill. To be briefe, entry yeare to take in hand so long an expedition of sogreat labour and travell, with an army furnished with horsemen, footmen, artillery, and a fleet of Ships for the defence of another man, as commonly we do feemeth unto me mecremadneffe : neither do I thinke it to standwith the Majesty of the Othoman Emperors, thus tobe moued energy care at the request of a puling woman, crying for helpe: except you thinke it more profitable and honourable to maintaine a defensine than an inualine war: Wherefore (in my opinion) it is best to turn this kine dome (so often conquered and defended by law of Armes) after the manner of your ancestors, into the forme of a province : the Queene I would have fent to her father, and the boy ber fonne brought up in your court at Constantinople, and thereinstructed in our religion: the nobility of the country I wish to be Name, and their castles rased, and the notable families which bare the brauest minds, to be carried away out of all parts of the country into Afia : as for the base multitude. I would have kept under with good gariefons, to till the ground, and inhabit the cities . By this only means (mighty Solyman) hall both the Hungerians perceine shemfelues conquered, and the Germans glad to forbeare comming into Hungary, vinleffe they will rashly and unfortunatly hazard both Sigria and Austria.

But Solyman thinking it good to doe facrifice before he would resolutely determine of so M treib Budathe great a matter, entred into Buda with his two fonnes, Selymus and Baje Zes, the thirtieth of Au-1541, & three gust in the yeare 1541; and there in the Cathedrall Church dedicated to the Virgin May fin fairfieib (being beforeby his priests purified after the manner of their superficion) facilities the first

A Mahometan facrifice in Buda. Shortly after, he as it were moderating the opinions of his great counsellors, provided out of them all both for his owne security and honour, and publithed a decree, the fatall doome of that flourishing kingdome, where vnder it yet groaneth at this day; That Buda should from that day be kept with a garrison of Turks, and the kingdome The downe of connected into a Produce of the Turkish Empire; and the queene with her yong son thould Hungary. presently depart the City, and live in Lippa, in a fertile and quiet Country beyond the river of Tibifcus, which fomething to comfort her, was neere unto the borders of her father Sigifmund his kingdome, to be fafely conducted thither with all her wealth and jewels by his lanidaries. Wherefore the Queene and her Son, according to this Decree, with teares and mour. The Queene al. ning, detecting in her heart the Tyrants perfidious dealing (which necessity inforced her then Parleth out of to diffemble) departed from Buda, constrained by the Turks to Icaue behind her all the ord. Sonne. nance in the castle and city, with all other the warlike provision and store of vi auall. The Nobleman went with her alfo, who although they went forrowfull for this wofull and vnexpected change of things, yet were they very glad of their liberty and fafety, whereof they had for the frace of three daies dispaired. Only Valentinus was kept in safe custody in the campe, because hewas a martiall man of greatest power amongst the Hungarians; and besides that, much hered of the Turks for the hard pursuit of Cafen and his horsemen, slaine at Storamberg in Au-Aria. Thus the royall city of Buda fell into the hands of the Turks, whereupon not long afterensued the finall ruine of that kingdome, sometime the strong Bulwarke of Christendome. but loft to the great weakning of the Christian Common-weale; which may justly be imputted to the pride, ambition, and diffention of the Hungarians among ft themselves, and the calling in of the common enemy: the due confideration of whose onely comming, might well have sufficed to have set them agreed.

Whilest these things were doing at Buda, King Ferdinand expecting the cuent of this war at Vienna, & hearing of the shamefull losse of his army, and that the Generall deadly wounded was fled to Comara, and that Solyman (fame increasing the euill newes) was comming towards Vienna; fent Leonardus Velsius (who neuer liked of the siege of Buda) to Comara, to stay the further flight of the foldlers, and to gather together fo well as he could the disperfed reliques of the scattered army, and to comfort agains the discouraged men with the hope of new supplies and of pay. And somewhat to stay Solyman, who as it was thought would suddenly come K. Ferdinand n to Vienna, he fent County Salma; and Sigismund Lethestaine, a noble and grave counsellor, his senderbembas-Embaffadors, with Prefents and new conditions of peace to Solyman. The prefents were a high fadors and pre-standing cup of gold after the German fashion, curiously set with stones; and a wonderfull globe of filmer of a most rare & curious denice, daily expressing the hoursly passing of the time, the motion of the planets, the change and full of the Moone, the motion of the superious orbes, ever mounting by certaine wheeles or weights couriously conveied within the same, and exactly keeping due time and motion; lively expressing the wonderful motions and conversions of the coelestiall frame. A most curious and strange piece of worke, devised and perfe-Red by the most cunning Astronomers for Maximilian the Emperour, whose noble minde neuer spared for any cost to obtaine things of fare and strange deuise. The Embassadors passing E downe the river of Danubius, were at their landing first received by Cason the Admirall of Solymans fleet, and by him brought into a rich tent, the ground under their feet being all couered with rich carpets: to whom Ruftan Baffa fent fuch good cheere as the campe afforded, but especially most excellent wine, no lesse forbidden the Turks by their law, than desired of the Germans. The next day after the great Bassacs seasted the Embassadors, Solyman himselfe dy-

ning not far off in his pauillion: at which feast the Bassaes for the more courtesse dined with the embaffadors, not fitting with their legs gathered under them flat upon the ground, as their maner was, but fitting in chaires at a high table, after the manner of the Christians: only Mahometer Gouernour of Belgrade, for his age and valour an extraordinary ghest, sat downer upon a cushion beneath the Bassaes. Their cheere was only Rice and Mutton, and that so plainly and The Pugas sparingly dressed, as if they had thereby noted our gourmandise and excesse; who measure tweet. not our cheere by that which nature requireth, but that which greedy appetite defireth, as if therein consisted the greatest nobility: and the drinke for the great Bassaes themselves, right case to be had, was faire water out of the river Danubius. After dinner the embassadors were brought in vnto Solyman, each of them led betwirt two Bassaes holding them fast by the

armes as it had been for honours fake, and fo brought to kiffe his hand. For the Turks fuffer G no stranger otherwise to come vnto the presence of their suspicious Emperour, but first they fearch him that he haue no weapon about him, and so clasping him by the armes vader the colour of doing him honour, diffemblingly bereaue him of the vie of his hands, left he should offer him any violence: yet hath he alwaies as he fitteth in his Throne, lying at hand ready by him, a targuet, a seimiter, an yron mase, with bow and arrowes. The great Globe was also brought in by twelue of the Embassadors servants, which with the strangenesse thereof filled the minde of Solyman, and the eies of his Bassaes with admiration : for Solyman was of so tharpe a wit, that he was not learned onely in such bookes as contained the lawes and rites of the Mahometane superstition, but had also curiously studied Astronomy, and especially Cos. mography, in which profitable and pleasant study he much recreated himselse as his leisure H The request of served. The Embassadors desired that he would give the kingdome of Hungary to King Ferthe imbaffadors dinand, almost upon the same conditions that Laseus had before required it for him at Conin the behalf of francinople, paying him fuch yearely tribute as King John had viually paid, and promifing farther to draw Gharles the Emperor his brother into the same league: so that Solyman delivered of all feare that way, might at his pleasure turne his forces upon the Persian, which it was thought he most desired. Besides that, they said he should deale neither honourably nor indifferently, if he should prefer the young child before King Ferdinand, who beside his antienr right vnto that kingdome, (which they were not now to vrge, as oppressed by his happy vido. ries, but might in time be reuliued) had also a late interest by a league betwirt him and King John, wherein he had expresly couenanted by the solemne consent of the greatest part of his I Nobility, that King Ferdinand (hould succeed him in the kingdome. Whereby they excused him of the late war, as justly taken in hand against the Queene and her Son vsurping vpon his right; which King John knowing to be good, and moued with conscience, had by his solemne act acknowledged, though to the great offence and prejudice of Solyman his fetter vp and defender, as also to the touching of himselfe in honour, to have so vnthankefully and fraudulently dealt with his Patron to whom he was by the oath of obedience bound. Wherefore they requested, that sith he being a Prince of all others most mighty and magnificent; standing vpon his vpright dealing both in peace and war, had so lightly regarded the fly dealing of so ungratefull a man; he would rather accept of King Rerdinand fo many waies injured, as his friend and tributary, than to have him his perpetuall enemy. Concluding, That nothing K could be vnto him, for the good report of his justice more commendable, or for the affurance of a perpenuall peace more profitable, or to the immortall praise of his bounty more honourable, than to call a King of a most antient discent, famous for his vertue and fidelity, chosen for a king by the Bohemians, defired for a King by the Hungarians, Emperor elect of the Romane Empire bythe Germans, and the naturallibrother of the great Emperous, his tributary King of Hungary, Solyman with cheerefull countenance aggerting and commending of the Presents, answered them two daies after by Russanthe Bassahis son in law, that this was his re-Solymaniproud folute condition of peace and friendship; If King, Ferdinandwould forthwith reflore all the eriver to that cities, townes, and castles, which were before belonging to King Lond; and for euer after ab-Embasadeurs. Staine from Hungary : and whereas he had beene so often promoked by him to warre, and had I therein bestowed so great charges, and taken so much travellihe could for that be content with an casse paine (which should be for his great honour) to impose an casse tribute vpon Austria: vpon which conditions he was content to enter into league with them; but if so be that those conditions seemed vnto them too heavy, and that they would rather make choice of warthan peace, he would bring to passe by continuals war, that such things as they had taken from the kingdome of Hungary, should be required with the destruction of Austria. But the Embassa. dours, although they were much moued at the proud demand of tribute for Austria, as that wherein the two brethren of mighty power, Charles the Emperor and King Ferdinandwere difdainefully abused; to keepe the best course of their negotiation, and to win some time in so hard estate of things; required a truce vntill such time as King Ferdinand and the Emperour M his brother might be made acquainted with the matter, VV hich their repuest, the Turke (perceiuing their drift & purpose) would in no case grant, for Winter was now fast comming on. It was lawfull for the Embassadours all the time they were in the Turks campe, to view cuery part thereof, Rustan Bassa conducting them from place to place where abone all things, they most wondred at the perpetuall and dumbe silence of so great a multitude, the souldiers The Turkes being foready and attentine, that they were no otherwife commanded but by the becking of endered. thehand, or a nod of their commanders: they maruelled also at the exquisit order and sweet. nesse of the Turks campe, finding therein nothing disordered or noysome; so that it seemed not the campe of fuch a rude and barbarous nation, but rather of them which were the authors of martiall discipline. The Embassadors being rewarded and so sent away, Solyman commanded the old Gouernor of Belgrade to spoile the borders of Austria all along & Danubius: Ca-Con also Generall of the voluntary horsemen, he sent into Morauia for like purpose; who neither of them did any great harme, by reason of the sudden rising of the great rivers, with the abundance of raine then falling in Autumne. After that, Solyman appointed one Solyman an Hungarian (who taken prisoner in his youth by the Turks, had from that time followed the Mahometan superstition) Gouernor of Buda: who by the vpright administration of justice. and the courteous vsing of the people, with Verbetius the old Chancellor, should do what was possible to put the people in hope of long peace and tranquility. Which things done, after he Solyman return pomble to partie partie partie partie partie to return again einto Thracia, because the neib towards confamination rainof Autumna & the cold of Winter was now come in : and was also in doubt tobe shut in with the rifing of the great rivers, wherewith the country of Hungary is in every place fo watered and on every fide fo compassed, that it is a hard mutter to passe. By the way he fet Laseus, Laseus et at the tered, and on every inde to companied, that it is a natu mutter to pane. By the way no tel papers, and the berty by Saly-King Ferdinands embassador, again at liberty, whom he had left in prison at Belgrade: but he berty by Saly-man, Bortly af. long injoyed not that benefit: for shortly after returning into Polonia, he died of the flix; ret dieth. which caused many to suppose, that he was poisoned by the Turks. A man for his vertue and learning famous, worthy of a longer life, whose death the King himselfe much lamented.

As Solyman was returning into Thracia, and was come to the river Dranus, it was told him. That Stephen Maylat, Vayuod of Transyluania, who tooke King Ferdinand his part, a professed enemy of the Turks, was taken, by the cunning of Peter of Moldania, and Prince of Valachia; and that all the country of Transylvania was well pacified, and yeelded to his obedience. Of which newes Solyman was passing glad; for he exceedingly hated Maylat, a martiall man of a froward nature, defirous of rule, and ready upon any occasion to reuolt; forasmuch as he remembred Grittus his Legat, and the Turks by him flaine; and knew alfo, that the Transylvanians, an inuincible people, borne to trouble, and more delighting in vncertain war than affured peace, was by him faired up, whom he wished rather by gentlenesse to appeale, than by force of armes and frong hand to subdue. But because we have oftentimes before made mention of this Maylat, of whose taking Solyman so much rejoyced, it shall not be amisse in few words to declare in what finenesse he sell into the hands of this treacherous and blottdy man, Peter of

This Moldauian by the commandement of Solyman (as is aforefaid) had joyned his forces with Achmitted; Gouernot of Nicopolis, against Maylat; which being vnited, were in number 50000 horsemen beside footmen; which after thomannor of those countries, were not many, cuery manufemoft in the country, be he never to poore, keeping a horfe to ferne upon. Achomates comming thither with his power, and perceiving the place was not to be battered or taken by force, but with much labour and long time thought it belt, to affey if he could ouercome him by craft and deceir. Wherefore he lent a mellenger vnto Maylat, to perfuade him to yeeld himfelfe vnto Solyman, and to make choice rather to be called of him his friend, than to be judged his enemy of whom he might well hope of all goodnesse, which had given whole kingdomes vinto his enemies: promiting that he would vie the vitermost of his credit, which was not small, and labour for him as his friend, that he might feele the fruit of his clemency and bounty, and still enjoy the gouernment of Transylvania, paying him some small yearely tribute, as hee had before requested : for a function as hee could take no course better, being before with so many enemies, than to make his peace upon reasonable conditions, and that with as much speed as G were possible : in which doing, besides that he should well prouide for his owne safety, he should also saue both his wealth and honour; for Solyman was comming (as he said) with his victorious army; who would with affured death reuenge his vaine hope of holding out the fiege, if he should upon a stubborne and obstinate mind then refuse to obey his command. Whereunto Maylat, who foresaw that it was better for him to make a certaine peace, than to endure an uncertaine warre, answered, That he could be content to conclude a peace, so that it were not voon any bad conditions, and would not greatly refuse Solymans command, which was wont to be both reasonable and just: wherefore vpon sufficient pledges he would come into the campe, in presence to agree vpon the conditions of the peace, and demanded to have Achomates his fon, a valiant yong gentleman, deliuered in hostage. Which thing Achomates denied, for that he had (as he faid) before given him to Solyman, as the manner was; and therefore had ouer him no more power: but he promifed for him, that was but one, to give foure of his best captains. Which offer Maylat (misdoubting no deceit) accepted; and with a great and galland retinue attended upon, came into the enemies campe, where he was courteously and honourably received. But the parly, as it could not be conveniently begun immediatly after the first salutation, so could it by no meanes be then ended, but was deferred vntill the next days to the intent, that the trecherous Moldanian might take his well acquainted and well knowne guest, whom he had against that time inuited to a solemn banquet. By that means, the next day about the midst of dinner, fortune so favoured the intended trechery, Maylat (who was of so proud and cholericke a nature that he could not well brooke the least indignity) was by occasion of some insolent speech, of purpose ministred by the Moldauian ghests, put into such a fret, that laying his hand upon his fword, he in a rage flung from the table: at which time al the Megiat treete other ghests Rarting vp also, laid hands vpon him and tooke him, furning, and in vaine crying rently taken

by the needy Moldanian, and their borses and armonature. by the needy Moldauians, and their horses and armor taken from them. Whilest Maylat was yet furiously exclaiming of this treason, in came Achomates, who to feeme guiltlesse of the matter, with deep diffimulation sharpely reproued the false Moldanian, that he had in doing fo foule a fact (hamefully violated the lawes of hospitality reverenced of all nations, fallified the faith which he had given him for his fafety, and betraid the lives of fuch notable captains. as lay inhostage for him, Wherunto the Moldanian (as if it had bin in contempt) scornfully an- K fwered, that he had voon good cause taken Maylas prisoner, and so would in safety keep him for Solyman, vnto whom it only belonged to judge, whether he had juftly or vnjuftly kept him. Not long after, the strong towne of Fogaras was deliuered, with the hostages; but whether by feare or by corruption of Maylats lieutenant, is uncertaine. So Valentinus Turaceus, and Mari las, two of the greatest noblemen of Hungary, sufficient of themselves to have restored the Hungarian kingdome (first rent in funder with civill discord, and afterward with the invasion of the Turks) fell into the hands of the enemy, not vanquished in battel, but deceived by treafon. The towne being thus furrendred, almost all the country of Transylvania, was by Solymans confent delivered to the yong king, vnto whom al the people most willingly submitted themes sclues, and tooke the oath of obedience, remembring that his father had almost for thirty L yeares space with great justice and quietnesse gouerned that province; and with many prefents honoured the young King lying in Lippa, with the Queene his mother, and his two tutors, the Bishop, and Vicche.

At the same time, Charles the Emperor at the importunat suit of his subjects of Spaine, had prepared a great force both by fea and land for the conquering of Algiers from whence the Turkish pyrats did so infest all that coast of the country, from Gades to the mountains Pyre nei, that the Spaniards (all trade of merchandise being set apart) were glad to keep a continual charles them. watch and ward all along it that coast for defence of the country. Wherefore although hee proviewant well knew of the comming of the Turks to Buda, and how hardly he was by the Langrane to issade of and others spoken of, for leaving his brother so hardly bestead to go against a fort of pirats in M Affricke, yet perfifting in his former determination, he departed out of Germany into Italy, where by the way he met Octanius Farnesius his son in law, Alphonsus Fastius his lieutenant, by the Venetian Embassadors, neere to Verona, and so brought to Millaine, where he was with

A Millain, where he was with great folemnity joyfully received of the citifens, and under a ca. nopy of gold brought vnto the palace; he himfelfe going in a plain blacke cloke, and a home. ly cap in mourning wife; when as the women and vulgar people, vpon a curious fimplicity, expeded to have seene so great an Emperor in his royall robes, glistering with gold and precious stone, and the imperial crowne vpon his head. His heavy countenance answerable also to his attire, was much noted, as prefaging the wofull ouerthrow which was the day before receiued at Buda, but not yet knowne in Italy. From Millaine he departed to Genoa, where he was advertised by letters from his brother king Ferdinand, of the overthrow of the Germans. of the victory of the Turks, and the comming of Solyman. Vpon which newes, Valling and Auria his two chiefe commanders, the one at land, the other at sea, would have persuaded him to have deferred his intended expedition for Africa vntill the next Spring; and with fuch nower as he had already raised in Italy, and brought with him out of Germany, to stay still in Italy, fo to make shew vnto the Turks as if he would have teturned and holpen his brother: and in the meane time to assure himselfe of his state in Italy against the French, who (as it was thought) would be ready to take all occasion of advantage, if any mishap should befall him. either by the force of the enemy, or violence of tempest, But he constant in his former resolution, answered them as they fat in counsell, that they had persuaded him for great reasons to flav in Italy; but that he was for far greater to passe into Africke: for if he should then stay in Italy, it would be thought, that he was for feare of the Turks fled out of Germany : which difgrace could no otherwise be preuented, but by the present prosecution of the former determi-C. nation for Algiers, and fatisfying the expectation of his subjects of Spaine; and so by sea valiantly to proue their better fortune, which had of late not fo well favoured them at land; in hope that Algiers might be woon before the feas should grow rough and dangerous with Winter tempests: which if it should fall out according to his mind, he would not, as he said. greatly care what the French could do. Yet was it thought, That the diffembling friend thio betwixtehe French king and him, would not long indure : and the rather, for that there was a new grudgerisen betwixt them about the death of Antonius Rinuo, who for certaine yeares had lien embassador for the French king at Constantinople, to Solyman, and was a few months before fent backe again by him into France to the king : but returning backe againe with new The France D Sultan and him, he was by certaine Spaniards of the Emperors old fouldiers, who had know. ledge of his comming, belaied upon the river Padus as he was going downe to Venice, fo to haue passed into Bpirus, and slaine, together with Casar Fregolius: or as the common report went, first taken and tortured, to get from him the secrets of his negotiation, and afterwards flaine. Which report so much troubled Vastim in credit, that in purgation of himselfe, he offered the combat to any man of like quality to himselfe, that durst charge him with the truth thereof. But many were of opinion that he was well and worthily taken away, for vndertaking so odious a charge, as to stir vp the Turks against the Christians, and to shew vnto them such opportunities as might best serve their purpose, by discovering vnto them the Emperors designes, to the great hurt of the Christian common weale. Butwere it well, or were it evill; The Empirer E as Paulus the third of that name then Bishop of Rome, meeting the Emperour at Luca as he of Rome meet came from Genoa, could not, or would determine, fure it ferued as no small occasion to set as Luca. those two great Princes againe at ods, whereby the wished vnity of the Christian state was fore shaken, and a way opened for the Turke. The Emperor at his comming to Luca, was honorably received by the Cardinals and Bishops, and lodged in the court; the great Bishop was before placed in the Bishops palace, whither the Emperor came thrice to talke with him, and the Bishop to him once, But the Bishop having nothing at all prevailed with the Emperor and the French embassador, for the appealing of the troubles even then like to arise betwixt him and the French King; did what he might to persuade him to employ such forces as he was about to passe ouer with into Africke, against the Turks in desence of his brother Ferdinand, F and of the country of Austria, if Solyman should happily pursue his late obtained victory at Buda. But he Gill resolute in that fatall determination of inuading of Africke, rejected that the Bishops request also. So the great Bishop having moved much, and prevailed little, in the greatest matters which most concerned the common good, taking his leave of the Emperour, returned by easie journies to Rome.

The Emperor in the mean time with certainbands of Italians, under the leading of Camillau G Columna and Augustinus Spinula, and fix thousand Germans, came from Luca to the port Lune and there imbarking his foldiers in certain merchants ships prouided for the purpose, and five & thirty gallies, departed thence, commanding the mafters of the ships to direct their course to the Islands of Balcares : but after they had put to sea, they were by force of tempest suddenly arising, brought within fight of Corsica: where after they had beene tossed to and fro two daies in the rough seas, and put out of their course, the wind something failing, they put into the hauen of Syracusa, now called Bonifacium. The disperced fleet once come together into the port of Syracufa, and the rage of the seawell appealed, he put to sea againe for the Islands Beleares, now called Majorca, and Minorca: where in his course he met with a tempest The Emperor from the Welt, more terrible and dreadfull than the first : wherin divers of the gallies having H drives by tem. loft their masts and failes, were glad with extreame labour and perill in striuing against the wrought sea to get into a harbor of the lesser Island, taking name of Barchinus Mage the famous Carthagenensian, whose name it retaineth until this day. From hence the Emperor with all his fleet passed ouer to the greater Island, being wonderfull glad that Ferdinand Gonzaga his Viceroy in Sicilia was in good time come with the Sicilian gallies and ships of Italy, in number a hundred and fifty faile, wherein he had brought fuch ftore of bisket and victual as mighe haue fusficed for a long war, Mendoza was also expected to haue come thither with his fleet from Spaine; but he by reason of contrary winds being not able to hold that course, altered his purpose according to the tempest, and so happily cut ouer directly to Algiers. So the Emperour nothing misdoubting the carefull diligence of Mendoza, and thinking that which I was indeed already chanced, and the wind now seruing faire, by the persuasion of Auria his The Emperous Admirall hoifed faile, and in two daies came before Algiers, and there in a goodly order came to anker before the city in the fight of the enemy. Whilest the fleet thus lay, two of the pyrats which had beene abroad at fea feeking for prize, returning to Algiers, not knowing any thing of the fleet, fell into the bay amongst them before they were aware: the bigger whereof Viscontus Cicada stemmed with his gally and sunke him, the other with wonderfull celerity got into the hauen. In the meane time Mendeza with his gallies had passed the promontory of Apollo now called the cape of Cassineus, and in token of honour saluting the Emperour after the manner at sea, with all his great ordnance, gaue him knowledge that the Spanish fleet

Quer these choice men commanded Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alba, for his approved valour then accounted a famous captain. These ships going altogether with fails, were not yet able to double the cape as did Mendoza with his gallies, for now it was a dead calme:howbeit the billow of the sca went yet high, by reason of the rage of the late tempest, and did so beat against the plain shoare, that it was not possible to land the souldiers, but that they must needs be washed vp to the middle : which thing the Emperour thought it not good to put them vnto, and fo to L oppose them sea sicke and thorow wet against the sudden and desperat assaults of their sierce enemies. He also staied for the comming of the Spanish ships, for two causes: first, That he might with his vnited power more frongly affault the city, and terrific the enemy; then, To communicat the whole glory of the action with the Spaniards, at whose request and sorwardDelay in great nesses & greatest charge he had undertaken that war. Which fatal delay of two daies, although it was grounded upon good reason, did not only disturbe an assured victory, but to the notable hurt of the whole army, opened a way to all the calamities which afterward infued. In the meane while the Emperor sent a convenient messenger to Asanague, otherwise and more truly called Affan. Aga, or Affan the eunuch ; who with a little flag of truce in his hand

Med Governor making figne of a parley, and answered by the Moores with like, as their manner is, went on M thore, and was of them courteoully received and brought to Allan. This Allan was an cunuch, borne in Sardinia, brought up from his youth in the Mahometan superfiction by Barbaraffs, a man both politicke and valiant, and by him left for the keeping of his kingdome of Algiers in his absence with Solyman. This messenger brought into his presence, required him a forthwith to deliuer vp the city (first furprised by force and trechery by Horruccius, and afterwards to the definition of mankind, fortified by Hariadenne Barbaruffa his brother) to Charles the mighty Emperor, come in person himselse to be reuenged on those horrible pyrats; which if he would de it mould be lawfull for the Turks to depart whither they would, and for the naturall Moores to soide Rill, with their goods and religion wholly referred vnto them vnmuchedias in former time; and for himfelte, he should receive of the Emperor great rewards hodrin time of peace and warres, so that he would remember himselfe, that he was borne in Sardinia, and was once a Christian and accept of the fairest occasion which could possibly be offered for him to returne againe to the worthipping of the true God, and to injoy the fauour and bounty of the most mighty Emperour, and withall to reverge himselfe of the cruell ty-B rant Barbaruffa, for the vanaturall villary done vato his person. But if he would needs dally on the time; and make proofe of the firength of fo great preparation, he should vindoubtedly, with thereft of his followers, receive the fame reward of his obstinacy, which they had to the example of values, received at Tunes. Whereunto the vigracious eunuch answered, That hee The securiful thought him altogether mad, that would follow his enemies counfell, and with a grinning the Europe to countenance aske him, V pon what hope the Emperor trusted to be able to win the city? The the Emperours meffenger pointing with his finger directly toward the fleet, told him, That which you fee, meffenger. with his gram attillery, and valour of his fouldiers, both horfe and foot; whereat the cunuch formefally laughing, replied, And we with like force and valor will defend this city, and make this place, already famous for your ouerthrowes here twice, now the third time, of all others 6 mbft famous by kire Emperors discomfitute. It is reported, That there was in Algiers an old wisch fessous for her predictions, who had (as it was faid) foretold the shipwracks and misery of Diductors, and Hugo Montada to them of Algiers, and also prefixed a time when as the Christian Emperor adventuring to be fiege that city, should there receive great losse both by fee and lends: The fame of which blind prophetic feruing fitly to confirme the hope of good fucces in the minds of the vulgar multitude, Affan fo fed and augmented (although he himfelf being a crafty wife fellow, beleeued no fuch vanity) that he did therwith not onely encourage his own foldiers, but also strucke a terror into the minds of the weaker fort of his enemies, seeing themselves cast upon so dangerous a coast upon the approch of Winter. There was in gartion in the city about 800 Turks, and most of them horsemen, but such, as whose valour and n resolution far exceeded their number. For Assan had lost many of his best men, some in fight against Mendesa; and othersome at sea, slaine or taken by Auria in Corsica; and in other places by the Rhodian, Neapolitan, and Sicilian gallies, but many moe were by his leave gone to aid the Moores against the Portingals: the other multitude did scarce make up the number of 5000; which were partly natural! Moores borne in that country, and partly such as were born in Granado; to whom were joined many fugitiues out of the Islands of Majorca and Minorca, who in former time having entred into rebellion, and fearing condigne punishment, were fled to Algiers, and there revolted to the Mahometan superstition. But the captaines of the wild Numidians made up a great number both of horse and foot, which lying stragling without the city in the open fields, should night and day vex and molest the Christians. This bru-B tish people, naturally enemies unto the Christians, had Assau with rewards and hope of a rich spoile, allured out of the countries thereabout to aid him: neither was it lawfull for any man to carry his wife or children out of the city, into places of more fafety farther off, or to shew any small token of feare, pain of death being by the imperious cunuch proposed to who soeuer should but looke heavily for feare of danger, or speake a word sauouring of cowardise. The The Emptress Emperour by Auria making choice of a most convenient place for landing his men, laid his landers bis are gallies to close to his tall thips, that his armed foldiers might with case come out of the high myat digital. built ships into them, and so out of them into the long boats, to be forthwith set on shore. And such was the speedy diligence of them that had the charge of that matter, and the plenty of boats still ready to receive the souldiers as fast as they could come out of the gallies, that the F footmen were in a very short time all landed. The Emperour having a little rested and refreshed his soldiers, divided his army into three equal battels, which was in number about twenty thousand footmen, besides horsemen, and others, who of their owne voluntary will then fol-

the Numidian horsemen, which were still pricking up and downe about them, ready to charge

if they could take them at any advantage. And fo fetting forward a few furlongs, encamped G in a strong and convenient place, neere vnto the city, betweene two deepe ditches, which the water falling from the mountaines had naturally worne to deepe, that neither horfeman nor footman could well passe ouer, but by bridge: and fast by vpon the left hand was a hill, from the top whereof it feemed the city might with great ordnance well be battered tool

The description of Algiers.

The city of Algiers, sometime the royall seat of the great King Intercalled of the Roman Iulia Cæfarca, is in forme of a triangle, scituat fast by the sea towards the North, having about uen, but neither great, neither safe for the North wind. The houses farther off from the fee. fland in feemly order vpon the rifing of a fleep hill, as it were vpon degrees; in fuch fort, that the windows of one row still ouerlooks the tops of the next beneath it, into the fea, most beautifull to behold. The Emperor having divided his campe into three parts, every nation by H themselves, lying on the Bast side of the towne, was in great hope towin it; and the rather, for that whilft he affaulted it on that fide, his thips & gallies from the North fide, might in sime of the affault with their great ordnance beat the enemy all along it the wall; which fill right higher and higher according to the rifing of the ficep hill, could not conveniently be defended with one bulwarke, as we fee it may in plaine ground. Neerest vito the rising of the hile, lay the Spaniards : in the midfi, the Germans with the Emperor; and in the plaine nestell to The Namidians the fea, the Italians. In the mean time whilft the great ordnance was landing, & the horfes we shipping, the Numidians with a hidious outery shew'd themselves vpon the tope of the mount tains about the Spaniards, and from thence easily gauled them with their darts and shot t for they nimbly running to and fro in the known paths of the rough mountains, would faddenly and fiercely affaile them, but after the manner of their nation skirmishing a fer office then neere at hand. In which maner of light skirmishes, all the day was spent watill night, with smal danger, but much trouble to the Spaniards. And when night was come, these wild trouble, one company still succeeding another in the place they had before taken, never left statisting for where focuer they faw any fire in the Spanish camp, thither came arrows, dares, and figner fly. ing as thicke as haile : for remedy whereof, the Spaniards were glad to put out their fires, and The Spaniards with filence to expect the day, that they might come neerer vnto them. Wherefore as foots put the Namie as the fun was vp, the Spaniards by the perfuasion of Aluares Sandes, master of the camp, validisti to flight, antly climing up the high mountaines, repulled and put to flight the Numidians, and tooke the top of the hils, and there lay as it were incamped in the poore sheepheards cottages. But I the fame day such a multitude of the wild people was flockt about them, that they were compassed in round, and glad to fight on every side in a ring. Yet this siercenes of this barbarous people, was by the valour of the Sicilian companies quickly repressed, whose pikemen glifte. ring in their bright armour, made small account of the Numidians arrowes and darts, but orderly stepping forwards with their pikes, & the harquebusiers close by their sides, easily repul-The description sed their naked enemies. The Numidian footmen are for most part youths halfe naked, with of the Namidi long haire not vniike the Irish, vsing no other weapons but dares they fight mingled with their horsemen, trusting the one to the other, and are of a wonderfull swiftnesse and agility of body. Their horsemen vie long speares, armed at both ends, which they with a maruellous dexterity vie, to the endangering of their enemy pursuing them t they vie also long and light tar- 1 guets made of leather, wherwith they fo cunningly defend themselues & their horses, both in their charge & retreat, that for a smal trifle, in respect of the danger, they will give a man leave to cast seven darts at one of them, which they will all most surely avoid, either with the speare, or receive them without harme in their targuet. In the meane time, whilst this wild people thus skirmished all the day, at night a sudden mischance ouerthrew all the emperors hopeifor as he flood beholding the vnshipping of his great ordnance, his horses, victual, & other necesfaries of the army, a fform of wind & rain began about fix a clock in the afternoon, holding on all the night without intermission, with such rage, as if heaven & earth should have gon together wherewith the whole army at land was wonderfully troubled, and a great part of the fleet at fea by force of tempest driven aground perished. That night 3 companies of the Italians, by M the appintment of their generall, lay without the trenches against the sudden assault of so vin-

certain an enemy, who when they had all the night endured the vehement raine and extreme cold, were fo ouercome with the extremity of the weather, that neither was their minds able to relieue their weake bodies, neither their feeble bodies their daunted minds: for they could

neither conseniently fastilized the down, althe ground being formyrie, that at enery frep they fimber to the walt of the leg. V pon there Ranud wompanies file Purkish horsmen & Moors formen, who ditigenery observed the watch of the Christians, perceiving their diffres, fud. dealy failed out in the dawning of the day, and for fiercely charged them, their match and pointer being new fower that they ebuild not viethell pieces, that they all fled except a few mikemen, who midded stand 32 Were all quickly flain by the Turks who fodesperatly pursued she toft in chale that they followed them over the trench into the camp. This alarm beeing heard, Camillus Columna the Italian General came presently thither, being fent by the Emperong ho with certaine Companies iffued our ouer the bridge; who now in flew discouraged with the comming out of this new fupply, did indeed, or at leastwife made as if they did. a diforderly retyre for fear. At which time Ferdinand Gonzaga, Viceroy of Sicilia, being a man migreatest account in the army next to the Emperor, comming in also, and angry with them which had before fied aperliaded them as valiant men to recomponed their shameful flight with a fresh charge, by driving the enemy home to his own doore. Which thing Columna faid could not be don without great peril: but Gon aga being a man of a nouble courage defired to have the difgrace which the Italians had received, falued fome way, although it were with neuer fo great danger; thinking alfo that it might haply fall out, that the enemy being put to flight and hastily putitied, they might together with them enter the city, without any danger of the artillery. So without flusher delay, the rest of the Italian companies were ledforth of their treaches with great cheerfulnes by Augustine Spinula, who so valiantly charged C threnemies that they pur them to flight, & put fund them to hard, that they came with them where many full our for feare of letting in the Italians with them; scaped by known water, some to another gate, and some into the mountains; but them shofe barbarous people with darts and thot from the wals, began to our whelme the Italians which were viaduifedly come within their danger, and with terible outerles to terrific them; and they which before were fled without the wals returned again to fight. They also which had thut the gate fallied out again, and hardly charged the Italians, who already galled with that from the wals, and rent in funder with the great ordnance, fled most disorderly; for why, they were burdaw fould iters taken up in hall, little or nothing acquainted with the wars. At The stallans which time Affan alfo fallying out (who was easily known by his countenance & rich attire) difformfuld by D pursued the chase with his troups of Turks and Moors footmen. Only certain Knights of the and indanger Rhodes fought valiantly, and retired orderly and Spinula with fome other gentlemen making the wholeang. a fland at a little wooden bridge, formwhat staid the enemy, and faued the lives of many. So the Italians which first charged most valiantly, being in the slight become hindermost, the Enemy Ariking them down as they fled covered the fields with their dead bodies by the space of half a mile, especially they which fled toward the sea, for they were circumuented & slain by the metciles Numidians, who beholding the shipwrack, were come downe to the sea side for prey. But the foremost companies of the Italians which fled into the camp, fled in fuch bast, and so great fear, that none of the leaders in so great and sudden a perplexity remembred either the Common fafeey, or performed the duty of an aduised Captaine : so that all seemed E ar once loft both by sea and land. Only the Emperour, armed with an inuincible courage against all the chances of Fortune, and not to be dismayed with any mishap, was both to himfelf and others that day the best Captaine. For when all was almost lost, hee in good time flayed the matter, by comming on with the squadron of Germans, wherof he sent before him three enfignes to stay the flight, and with them as a fure and fresh supply to gard his Campe beyond the bridge which was over the ditch ferting his Army for a trench, as we have before faid. But fuch a fear had poffeffed the minds of the flying Iralians, and fuch was the fiere purfuit of the enemy, that those Germans (not before wont to turn their backs) as if they had birr afraid of the Turks white caps, or not able to abide their fight, or to hold vp weapon against them, by and by turned their backs, and shainefully fled for company with the Italians. Then the Emperor galloping forth with his horse, and his sword in his hand drawn, reprouing them The Emperor of cowardife that fled, fet forward with the German squadron, and with a stout and manlike couragious, courage spake to them these sew words in their owne language !When will you (fellow souldiers) flight of his how your faces to your proudenemies if now when you should fight for the honor of the Christian name, aim, for the glory of the German matter, for the lafety of your own lines, in the presence of your Emperor, you fear a few defordeed and naked Barbarians? Ammediatly, when her had then faid, the Germanes G touched with shame, and dislaining that it should be shought they needed any exhoration to perform the parts of valiant foldiers, is fined out against the enemy who mooned with their comming, and feeing the Italian battel again reftored by the valor and trauel of certaine vali ant and expert captains, flood fill a while and began to setyre; whether it mere because they feared the great artillery and affault of the Germanes, or that they thought they had done to nough for that fally, when as for the full accomplishment of that victory they faw the Chris flian fleet ouercome with a most horrible tempest, miserably to perith before their faces, and many of their men, especially the Moors, halted to the few fide in hope of a more certain prey wheras no enemy was to be feared. For the bluftring winds blowing from diuers quarters as if they had conspired to raise a most horrible tempest, had made such a wrought sea, at the huge billows went fo high, that the ships by the violence of the weather, and rage of the sea, put from their anchors, fel foul one of another, and were fo loft, or els driven vpon the main were there beaten in places in fight of the army. So that all the sea coast Westward from Algiers to Cercello lay ful of dead men and horses, and the ribs of broken ships. The Numidians beholding this miserable wrecke, came down in great companies from the mountains, & with out mercy flew all that came aline to land. In the space of a few houses were low abone it 40 ships and all the small boats and caruels which were in number many. Some of the Gallies. when they had from midnight to the next day at noon, by the painful labor of the mariners. and skilfulnes of the mafters, rid it out, beeing no longerable to endure the rage of the tempest, & fearing to be eaten up of the sea, with fails and oars ran aground but the souldiers and 1) mariners swimming to land in hope to saye their liuguand thinking that the greatest danger was then past, were by the Numidian horsmen which rangen & down the sea side slain. There might a man have feen free-men of all forts, with tears commending their lives and liberty to their own gally-flaues, that by the speech & intreaty of them (which by the sudden chance of fortune had but even now shaken off their irons, and with merry hearts swam out to their liberty) they might be faued from the cruelty of the fierce Numidians. It was a most gire uous and woful fight for divers hard extremities, when as every man according to the difposition of his mind, and skil in swimming, standing doubtful in most assured death, which to receive or to refuse, was by fatal destiny drawn to his end, and either drowned in the sea, or thrust thorow with the enemies lance : yet most made choice to abide the danger of the sea, K and to expect ebe end of the tempest, rather than to hasten their end by the enemies merciles hand. By that means it came to passe, that that barbarous cruelty of the enemy(as athing feared most of the matiners and foldiers) faued many gallies, which by the appointment of the fearful mariners & passengers should otherwise haue bin run on ground. But after that, a notable gally, wherin Jamestin Auria went, was feen to come neer the shore, and to be driven vpon the fands by force of weather, and the beating of other gallies. The Emperor not enduring to see so valiant a yong gentleman, captain of many gallies, slain without help by the Moors, in the fight of Awia his vncle lent by and by one of his captains called Ansonin of Aragon. with three bands of Italians to the fea fide by whose comming the Moots were put to flight, and he with the rest in the galley saued, but so, that the sauing of him was the losse of divers L other gallies. For many deliuered of the fear of the Numidians, and trusting to the refeue of the fouldiers come down to the sea side, desiring to saue themselves from the rage of the sea, ran their gallies on ground; and had not fome bold Captains, grieued to fee fo great a loffe, ran up and down the banks with their drawne swords in their hands, and by threatening death to the gally-flaues and their mariners, staid their rowing, most part of the Gallies had by the example of others perished. Auria, not so angry at himself as at the Emperor (who contrary to the observation of skilfull sea-men, could not be persuaded from taking in hand that great expedition in fo unfeafonable a time of the years) with an invincible courage from a. gainst the violence of the tempest, & rage of the searinsomuch, that being requested by some of his friends, to faue himfelf, what focuer became of the gally the was fo angry therat, that he M commanded them to be bestowed under hatches. Four Gallies also of Parginine Pesinus earle of Anguillaria, and as many of the Rhodians, after his example ridit out, the reputation of their honor exceeding the fear of death. Certain gallies also of Sicilia, Naples, & Spain, hap pily endured all the rage of the tempest. Yet was there fifteen great Gallies cast away, with

A the losse wheref, besides the losse of so many ships, the tempest still enduring, so great forrow and desperation in the wosull expectation of the wreck of all, possessed the whole army, that not only the yong foldiers, regarding only their own liues, but even the most valiant captains. careful of the common estate, were veterly discouraged. For neuer was army in any memory ouerwhelmed with a greater concourse of calamities, when as all their victuals being lost in three daies, nothing was left to relieve them withall; and they wanted tents wherin to throud and fest the soldiers, spent with hunger, labor, cold, and wounds, in such perpetual raine and so dirty a country. In which fo great mileries, a wonderfull care, heavier than the former feare, exceedingly troubled the minds of all men, to think vpon that horrid wreck, when as having loft so many ships, and they poor men landed in Africk, were in doubt how ever to returne again into their native countries. Yet the notable courage of the emperor fill kept the diffref. The Emperous fed men in hope, which neuer altogether for saketh wretched men in the midft of their cala. sheer salnessed mities: for he with a couragious heart and cheerful countenance performed all the parts of a friest the diprovident and curteous General. For when he had again made fure his camp against the affaults of the Barbarians, he commanded the wearied captains (especially the Duke of Alva. wonderfully wearied in the late skirmish, and dung wet) to spare themselves and take their rest: hee comforted the wounded men, causing them to be cherished in the Tents which by chance yet flood (for the tempessuous wind had almost ouerthrown them all) and not sparing himself for any pains, being in his armor and thorow wet, won the hearts of all his souldiers the more. In this conflict he loft about 2000 men, among whom was five of his forward captains, and three Knights of the Rhodes: but many more were hurt. The greatest losse was thought to be in the thips and mariners, which was also increased by the losse of a wonderfull deal of great ordnance, reckoned so much the greater, for that it would come into the Moors hands, to the common harm of the Christians, so soon as the sea would give them leave to diue for it. Shortly after, Auria (as he was to foresee a tempest, a wonderfull observer of the heavens and of the clouds) mistrusting that place, departed with the remainder of the fleet to the cape called Metafusium, because it was a place of safer riding for his Gallies, and better for the taking in of the foldiers, aduiting the Emperor to march thither with his army which his counsel the Emperor liking wel of, to relieue the hunger of his soldiers, commanded first Horses good all the draught horses which were first vnshipped for the drawing of the great Ordnance, and meat in the D after them the horses for service, to be killed and divided for meat among the souldiers. As Arms, for fire wood, they had plenty of planks and ribs of the broken (hips; fortune as it were with one poor benefit recompending fo many calamities. The next day the Emperour departed The Emperous from Algiers, with his army divided into three battels, the fick and wounded men beeing receiued into the middle:and when he had marched seuen miles (the enemies horsmen still houering about him) he came to a heady brook, which the Moors cal Alcaraz which was grown so high with the abundant rain and the check of the wind and the sea, that being but a shallow thing before it was not now to be passed ouer by a good horsman. Wherefore the Emperour of necessity there incamped, in such fort, than lying with his Army in forme of a triangle, two sides therof were desended with the sea and the brook, and the other with a strong gard of ar-E med men; for he thought it not good to depart from the sea, a sure defence for his Army on the left hand, to seeke a foord farther off. Many aduenturing to swim ouer, were by the violence of the stream caried away and drowned. Wherfore the Emperor caused a bridge to be made ouer it, of the masts & sail-yards of the broken ships which were by chance there taken vp, and so passed ouer the Italians & Germans. The Spaniards marching higher vp the brook, found a foord wherby they passed ouer. At which time the Turks pursued them no farther, being called back again by Affan their gouernor. As for the Moores and Numidians which still followed at hand alwaies ready to skirmish, they were easily repulsed by the harquebufiers and field-pieces appointed for every Nation: but vpon such sicke and wounded men as were not able to keep way with the Army, they exercised all manner of cruelty. For there was none which in that small hope possessed with the sear of their owne safety, was greatly mooued with the compassion of their fellows misery. The next day passing ouer another little riuer, which the fouldiers waded ouer vp to the brefts, they came in three daies march vnto the rodewhere the fleet lay, and incamped in the ruins of the old city Tipala, necrevnto the fea side, which served them in stead of a fortresse against the Barbarians. The sea was now calm, the wind laid, and the weather so fair, that all men thought the soldiers might now be imbar. G ked and transported into Europ. Wherfore the Emperor, to the great ioy of the whole army. commanded every man to make himfelf ready to go abord: in such fort, that first the Italians, then the Germans, and last of all the Spaniards should be imbarked: but so many ships and gallies as is before faid beeing lost by shipwracke, it was thought that those which were lest were not able to receive the whole army, although it were crowded together as close as was the first possible. Wherfore the Emperor commanded the masters and owners of the ships to cast all the horses ouer-boord into the sea; reputing it an vnmercifull part, to prefer the safegard of for the common those horses (although they were of great worth) before the life of the basest common foldier or horf-boy in his camp. Which thing much grieued the minds of the noblemen and owners of those goodly beafts, not only for that they were, not without extream necessity, for the prefent deprined of such an inestimable treasure, but should for euer (as they faid) lose the most noble race of horses in Spain. There with griefe and vain compassion was to be seen goodly horses of service bearing up their proud heads, swimming all about the sea, to the ships neerest vnto them for safegard, as if it had bin to the shore, & in the end wearied with long swimming to be there drowned. But scarse half the soldiers were yet imbarked, when the East and North-east wind, and soon after divers contrary winds almost as great as the first rose, where upon the ships which had already taken in the soldiers, not expecting any command, for fear of being driven vpon the rocks, directed their course according as the wind caried them, with ful fails along it the coaft. They were quickely out of fight and dispersed with the tempest. fome into one country, some into another, carying the same of that shipwrack, and the report that all was loft, into the Islands of the Mediterranian and ports of Italy. The force of this tempest was so great, and the billow went so high, that some of the ships were in the sight of their fellows swallowed up of the sea. But amongst the rest, two Spanish ships sur of soldiers tempel to Al were by wonderful mishap by contrary winds driven againe to Algiers, and there set fastypcross actaten on that fatal shore, where the Numidian horsmen with a multitude of Moors following them: came running down to the sea side to kill them as they should come to shore: for the barbarous people thirsting after Christian bloud, would not receive them to mercy, although they were ready to yeeld themselves, and covenanted nothing but the safegard of their lives. At which their cruelty the Spaniards disdaining, with their weapons in their hands got to shore, and standing close together as desperat men, withstood them, who had with their multitude K quickly compassed them in round: yet in despight of what that barbarous multitude (without regard of humanity or law of arms) could do, they made way thorow the midft of them, from the place where they were cast on shore, vnto the very gates of the city. But seeing the Turks fally out, they called vnto them, offring to yeeld themselues prisoners to Assaw without further refistance, if they would assure them their lines, which they were in good hope of, for that he was born of Christian parents in Sardinia, and was attended upon by many renegat Spaniards. So Affan comming forth of the city, gaue them his faith for their fafety, and beating away the Moors & Numidians, curteoufly faued them alliwifely making great account of fo great a gain as would redound vnto him by fo many prisoners, joined with no smal commendation of his elemencie in fauing them. Of the Germanes the third part neuer returned L home, but were either loft by shipwrack, or els dead of the sicknesse insuing so great miseries. The emperor persuaded, or rather ouerruled by Auria, to avoid the violence of the tempest, The Emperour failed along ft the coast of Africk Bastward to Buzia, the castle wherof was kept with a small garison of Spaniards: where the Emperor landed, found some fresh victual, though not much, yet such as did both him and his noblemen no smal pleasure. Whilst the Emperor lay at Buzia expecting fairer weather, a great Genoa ship laded with victual chanced to come into the bay, to the great rejoicing of the hungry fouldiers: but fuch was the violence of the tempest, that her anchors came home, and she driven upon the flats was cast away; yet so, as that part of the victual driven to shore, and half spoiled with the salt water, well relieved the increasing want. In the mean time the Emperor, when he had long looked for the affuaging of the tem- M pest, and was now out of hope of any new supply of victual, sent away Genzaga with the Sicilian and Rhodian gallies: for the wind before at North, was now come to Northwest, and put them in hope to aduenture again to fea, rather than to flay there longer. So although with a troublesome, yet prosperous course, they came in short time to the port of Vtica, now called Farinas : where Mulcasses King of Tunes bountifully relieued Gonzaga and his fleet with all kind of victuall and other necessaries. From whence they afterward departed, and landed all in fafety in Dreganum at Sicilia. The blustring winds were now at length weary of blowing, and the raging fea became calme, so that the skilful fea-men for feare of new dangers, and weary of those that were past, chought it best to aduenture againe to sea. Almost every houre they were reasoning in councell, What course they were for most safetic best to take: when fome were of opinion, that it was best to beare for Sardinia or Corsica and othersome would have had them to have kept along it the coast of Africa, and so directly for Sicilia. But the wind comming faire at East, the Emperor directed his course to the Islands Balcares & from thence at length arrived at the port of new Carthage in Spaine, greatly commended even of The Emperor mence at length at the detail courage and conftancy in passing through so many extremities, in such fort as if he had triumphed ouer the malice of fortune.

And portocontented; bus defirous by all means to trouble and molest the Emperour, as he did in in the Low countries by fetting on the duke of Cleue: lo by Antenius Polinus his Embaffador, aman of great discretion, he earnestly solicited Solyman the Great Turke, with whom he was then in league, to spoile the borders of Spain with his gallies, at the same time that Heavy his son was besieging Perpenna in Spain. For which practife he was of most men discommended, as too much fauouring his owne griefe; and especially by such as affected the Emperor. But how this matter (which drew upon the French King no small enuy) was carried in the Turks court, shall not (as I hope) be vnto this History impertinent to declare.

After the death of Rinco flain by the Spaniards, Francis the French king fent Antonius Polines D amanof great dexterity, his Embassadour to Solyman: who passing by many by waies to Venice, and so over the gulf to Sibinicum, croffing over Illyria, met with Solyman in Mysia, as he Praliauthe was comming from Buda; and there first offered vnto him the present from the King his French Embaf matter (for with empty hands no man might prefume to come to those barbarous kings of the Softman tom-East) which Present was a cupboord of plate curiously wrought, in weight 600 pounds : and ming from Ba Sooorieb garments of al forts of filk & skarlet to be bestowed vpon the Bassa's & other great disas of rethe courtiers. Polinus was not flack in his busines, but all the way as he went fought to win the fauor of the Bassa's, still giving them one Present of other, & filling their minds with the hope of greater. But when they were come to Constantinople, in the later end of December, Solyman promising what he had before said, aduised Polinus to returne to France with his letters, and to bring him certain word back againe from the king, of the determinat time & full resolution of taking those wars in hand: & that he would in the mean time fend I anubeius his embassador to Venice, who had bin there divers times, before, & would prouide to have such a fleet in readines as he desired. Polinus exceeding glad of that answer, with great speed returned back agains to the king, bringing with him as presents

Tolish returns from Solyman two goodly Turkish horses and a sword richly set, with stones of great price. G The French King having by his Embaffador received Solymans, letters and prefents, and three days together ducourfed with him at large of the maner of his proceeding in the Turks come in thort time after sent him backe again to Solyman with full instructions short beine and Tolina feet places, & other circumflances of the intended war. Red, That the league before made at Confiantinopie by Badoerius their Embaffador, might by the authority of the Separ be confirmed and so commended the French kings cause to the Senat, that he requested no more, but that vnto that amity which they had already held with the French, they would joine further curtefies, the rather for that Solyman had accounted him for his brother, and had vindertaken to aid him against Charles king of Spainibut as to join in league with him, or in his quarrell to take vp armes, he requested nothing. Which was quite beside the expectation of Polinus and Pellicerius, who by vrging of the matter, and by telling of al, had thought easily to have persuaded the Senar to have granted what they requested, and therfore thought the Turk (who had so coldly spoken in the cause) so be some way corrupted. But as it to restaution afterward appeared, therewas such equity and modelty in Solymans letters (who was otherwise M the faction of a proud and infolent nature) that he would not as then exact anything of them, which die to had he thould not fland with the good of their estate. Wherefore Polinus having in vaine staied certrizely and the taine daies at Venice, was in one of their publique gallies transported to Ragusum, and be had been from thence trauelled by land to Constantinople, whose the found all things more difficult changuer he dreamed of Forthe great Baffaes faid, There could no fleet be fet out that yeare. by reason that howas come too late to fue for fuch a matter, the fpring of the vere being now past of all other times most fit for to take in hand so long a voyage. So that Polinus was about measure vexed with care and griefe, that he had so entitly sped, and was come so out of season both to Vehice & Constantinople. Dinimalfo, one of the masters of the Rhodian gallies, was come to Confrancinople, to rate in now into Prance of the comming of the Turks fleet; who rold Polinus, Thurshe Kings fons were while frong power far entred into the Low-countries. and had already inuaded Spaine, expecting nothing more than the comming of the Turks pallies. Wherfore Politics (as it easily changeth to men deceived by trust reposed in any other ment promifes, and bewailing the enith fuecesse of their vain travell) wonderfully tormented himselfe, cursed the fromard and viteoh that manners of the Bassacs, called you the faith of Seloning and befought, the great Baffaes one by one, that they would not contrary to their promite forfake the King, who vpon the hope of the comming of the Turks fleet, had now in-uaded both the Tow-countries & the kingdome of Spaine for a funch as by that delay, which wavento them rielther honottrable not profitable, was (as he faid) betraid the maieffic of his Kingland a moil affund victory now as good as gotten, quite marred. In which his objectations he was fo importunat and tedious, that he became vnto those proud Bassaes rather loathfome than gracious; infomuch that to end his fuit, they thought it best sharply to take him valider that time to thank dhim off. Seen called the filend and fellow of the Othoman name, we may not now either forget the duties of love, or with your friend hip feeing that our Emperor doth maruelloufly affect you, and is not a little desirous to D Brenethen you with his power, and by overcomming your enemies to increase your power and honour. But the your demands is no equitie, no modefile, fo that we tearme you virmodest and importunat and others which favour you not so well call you plainly by your right names worreasonable and shamelesse men; who ar loo too forgetfull of your duties, do most fondly trouble the lawes of amitie and friendship. For laques are confirmed by like profit, by making even the charge and mutuall dangers : but if neglecting your friends kindnesse and courteste, you will make no requitall, they will quickly grow wearse of you. So hap-Peneth it unto you Frenchmen who ever forgetful and negligent in our dangers, but in your own alwaies mindfull and diligent, have showed your selves friends vuto vs when need was, not in deeds and certaine aid, but onely in bare letters, and embassages. Tell me I pray you where ever you shewed me any signs or token of your good will or and? whereby the minds of our enemies might at the least wife have but been E kept in suspence of some doubtfull seare, when as Charles with all the power of the West came into Hungarie : And Corone and Patras were in the meane time shaken in Grace with the enemies fleet; and last of all Tunes taken with so great a fleet? But all this we pardon you get this it is which is hardly to be endured, that you did not fo much as once gricue at our fo great insuries as you ought to have done; but fent your gratulotorie Embaffadours with the bloudie common enemie, who had but even then slaine so many of our people. At length our Emperor came to Aulona to your great profit, about to paffe ouer into Italie: but neither then in the arrivall of our fleet appeared the good wills of the Apulians towards you, which were of you so vainely promised, neither did you so much as once moue to inuade the upper part of Italie; so neither serving our turne, nor well fitting your owne, you have alwaies lost the occasion of the 200d successe of your affaires. But neither then neither at any time afterwards, needed me your counsell F or whited forces : for the Venetians to their paine felt both our forces and our faith : as for the rest war, she notable remenger of our wrongs, most happily brought to passe, at such time as you of your owne voluntary made peace with the common enemy to inuade vs ; and did as unkindly as impudently as it were blowwind in his failes. But we, without your helpe, bane notably repressed so great assaults of our ene-

For we performe our fidelisies a deed into it is his part to regard the time, to way the danger to wait occasion, which will not reship commit his action to the hal and of Fortune. You are come later than you fromthe have done for the festing forth of our fleet: for Summer now welfpens followesh the peft lent time of Anaumes, for the mariners cannot in consenience time be taken up,or fafely thrust into the gallies; for in long softing, who would matabinke, but that such a company of faylers wheally fick at the change of an wnacquainted agre ground be in danger of their lines? Who would not feare shipwracke in their returne, when at thu same that iaden fo grant a master at fee, driven upon the Acroceraunian rocks in the month of August lost so many gallies & A fleet would be rise H ged in Winter, furnished and fet forward in the Spring in Summer is fafe failing and making war Prince that it may be so done, we will for the common wealths sake persuade the Emperon; for the many once los. cannot upon the fudden be againe restored for much gold, whereof the Othoman Amperous wantes has Store beaped up by many ages. If thou be wife take these things in good part as friendly spoken but whather the Emperor will pardon thy boldnesse or not let himselse consider zeruly we have satisfied both him and our selues in speaking to thee so plainely.

for that they feemed to have bin fent from the mouth of Solyman bimfelfe, believes thought to have heard all that was faid, For behind the Baffaes as they fate in Councel, was a window with a brasen gate, and a curtain drawne before it, that the Emperous when he pleased, might unperceived heare the complaints and fuits of all nations, and note the manners of his great councellors; whose care for the administration of justice was so much the greater, for feare of his presence. Yer did not Polinus for his repulse, detecting the double dealing of the Bastlees, fo giue ouer his fure; but winning by gift's the fauour of the Copiaga or chiefe Porter, a man hought to the cuer of great authority in the Turks court, laboured by him to be brought to the speech of geeth of soly.

Solyman himfelfel who faithfully performed what he had undertaken. So the French Embassa. dour brought by him into the secretest place of the court, which sew Christians had ever bin, and fo vnto the profence of Solyman, recounted vnto him how all matters had before paffed, and most earnestly besought him not to faile the kings expectation of the fleet he had before K promifed, who at that prefent was inuading his enemies in three places. Whereunto Selymon courteoufly and expressely answered, That the opportunitie of sending out his sleet was past; not by his will, which was alwaies immutable and firme, but by his late comming, & the time of the yeare halfe spent : but promised the next Spring without doubt to send wato the king his friend & brother, twice fo great a fleet as he had defired against Charles their enemy. With which answer, the embassador dispatched away Dixim into France, vpon whose arrival, king Francis called back again Henry his eldeft fon with his army, from the fiege of Perpenna

The Princes and States of Germany, at the request of King Ferdinand and the nobilitie of Comany type Hungary, about this time decreed with one confent, to take vp arms against the Turks, for the force recouring againe of Buda, and other the lost parts of Hungary. For besides the dishonor don diand against to their nation at Exek, under the leading of Cazzianer, and again at Buda under the leading of the Lord Rogendorff; they wel faw, that if they did not speedily relieue the Hungarians ouerwhelmed with the calamities of the Turks forces, they should in short time be inforced to fight for their religion, children, wiues, and liues, against the same mighty enemy, at their own doores. For preuenting whereof, the Princes and free cities of Germany, fet out 30000 footmen, and 7000 horsemen: amongst whom was Mauritim, afterwards Duke of Saxonie, then 4 young gentleman about twenty yeares old. But the Generall of these German forces was Ioachimus Marquesse of Brandenburg, a man more for the honour of his house than the valour of himselse preferred to that place: yet so, that vnto him was joyned eight others, men of great M yeares and experience, by whose counsell he was to be directed. When they were come to Vienna, king Ferdinands power met them : where, befide fuch as were taken up in Austria, Haganot Gouernour of Stiria came in with ten thousand horsemen. Vnto these the noble men of

Hungary, Tafper Seredius, Andrew Bathor, and Petrus Perenus a man of greatest authority, power, and experience among the Hungarians, joined themselves, with fifteen thousand horsemen; whither also Paulus the third of that name, then Bishop of Rome, sent three thousand chosen footmen out of Italy, conducted to Vienna by Alexander Vitellins a most famous Captaine. The Marquisse with his great Army marched from Vienna alongst the River of Danubius: but fo foftly, that the Hungarian and Italian Captaines faid plainely, That the best part of the Summer, being the fittest time for Wars, was passed ouer in loytering and dallying out the time to no purpose. Especially Iacobus Medices, who had long before persuaded the king tobe ready to fet forward with his forces with the first of the Spring, before the Turkes could either augment their Garrisons, or put in any new forces, for that by such resolute and speedy B inuasion it was like enough hee might recouer both Pesth and Buda. Which politique and wholsome counsell so well given, King Ferdinand too much crediting the great men of his Court (liking nothing but what proceeded from themselves) rejected, expecting the full asfembly of all his forces, before the fetting forth of his Army. At length the Marquis was by foft marches come to Strigonium (King Ferdinand himself staying behind at Vienna) where it was commonly reported, That Solyman fearing to lose Buda, was either in person himselse comming into Hungary, or els sending down the Generall of his Europeian horsemen, who might neuer fet foot forward to war without fixty thousand horsmen. Which news fo troubled the Germans, that they made no great hast forward, doubting how they should returne again, if they chanced not to get the victory. Besides that, it was thought that the Marquisse neuer purposed to fight a battell, or to indanger himselfe and his Army for the kingdome of Hungary, but only to defend the bounds of Austria, and by shewing the strength of Germany, to terrifie if he could the Turks, if they not contented with Hungary, should also prouoke the Germans. But after it was by certain espials from Samandria, known that all that report of the comming of the Turks great Army was but vaine, and that there was scarse a thousand Ianizaries and twice so many horsmen come to Buda, and that the Turkes sleet was both in number and strength far inferior to the Kings, they set forward again with more cheerfulnes, much incouraged by the forwardnes of the Hungarians, especially of Perenus, who assured them, that if they would without delay march on, and spend no more time in vain, they should not find at Buda any fuch number of Turks as was worthy the name of an Army; for that Solyman vsing but every second year to make war, did that year take his rest, and was not like to undertake any great expedition. For these reasons all men being ready cheerfully to set forward, the Marquis appointed to passe oner Danubius: which this Perenus, Hugonot, and Medicu, all expert Captains, liked not of, withing him rather to hold on his way directly still on that fide the river to Buda, the chief City of the kingdom. But it was the mind of the Generall and all his Counsellors, first to be siege Pesth, which might be done with lesse labour and danger, and there having made proofe of the enemies strength and purpose, to come to besiege Buda: for then would the souldiers with much more courage and cheerfulnesse endure the fiege of Buda, if they had by good fortune first beaten them out of Pesth. Which counselwas both best liked and sollowed, and the Army by two bridges with great and painful la-E bor made ouer Danubius, (which was in that place divided into two parts) transported. At the same time Medices an Italian, Admirall of the Kings fleet, came down the river, and in despight of the Turks fleet took the Island of S. Margaret, lying in the River a little aboue Buda, and by force repulsed the Turks fleet vnto the suburbs of the City. The Marquisse to avoid the danger of the great (hot from Buda, after he was past the river, fetcht a great compas about, and fo came to the North fide of Pesth; for on the South it was defended with the river Danubius, running betwixt it and Buda; and on the East and West, the great ordnance The Marquiste on the one fide from the castle of Buda, and on the other from Mount S. Gerrard, did so scoure of Branden. all alongs the wals, that no man could without most manifest danger there abide. For Buda Pesh with bis standing vpon the hil, and divided from Pesth only by the river, so overlooketh and comman- drmy. F deth all the plain country about Pesth, that without perill no man can stir on any side of the City, but Northward towards Agria, couered by the City from the shor out of Buda. As the Marquis was comming thither, he was told by certain Fugitiues, That Balis Gouernor of Buda (who in that place succeeded Solyman the Hungarian Renegat, lately before dead of the plague) had in garrison in Buda two thousand horsemen: and that Vlemas the Persian, Go-

nernor of Bosna was come vnto him with 2000 more: wherunto Amurathes had also joyned G another thousand which hee brought out of Dalmatia; and that Segemenes was come thither also with 1000 lanizaries brought from Constantinople. As for the rest of the sootmen, that they were but wild country people, fitter for labor than feruice in wars. They told him alfo, that the enemies fleet confifted of 60 small pinnaces, ten gallies, and a few other great boats: and that Solyman had commanded his Captains, in any case to desend Buda and Pesth, to the hast man, without regard of any other place; and had proposed vnto the valiant great rewards, & to the cowardly extream punishment: charging them further, that if need were, they should fend in time to Achemates the Generall of his Europeian horsemen, to Sophia, to aid them, The Turks upon the approch of the Christians issued out at one of the gates of the City, and skirmished with the Hungarians; but after they had sufficiently prooued one anothers H thrength, and some sew were on both sides slain, they retyred into the city, and the Hungarians to the camp. The next day after, Vitellius going out of the camp neer the City with five comout of refib. panies, to chuse a place for planting the battery, the Turkes at one instant fallying out at two gates of the city, gave him an hot skirmish : where at the first, the fight was begun with live courage and force; but the Turks stil sending out new supplies both of horse and foot, first the Christian footmen, and after that the horsmen, not able longer to endure the force of the Turks Ianizaries, were constrained disorderly to retyre, having lost in that retreit sour of their captains and two enfignes; and had not Vitellius with one company of horimen ferred together, valiantly repulled the infolent Ianizaries, the losse had bin much greater. Vitellium excee. dingly griened with this loffe, and perceiuing the maner of the enemies fight, incouraged his I foldiers, purposing if he could to be fully reuenged : and aboue all others, requested Perenus to be ready to join with him, as occasion should require. Vitellius lay incamped in the Kings orchards, walled about as it were a mile, equally diffant both from the great Camp, and from the city:out of these orchards he went with twelue companies under their ensignes, commanding the rest to stand stil within the walls, in readinesseat all assaics; and so fetching a great compasse about, marched alongst the rivers side toward the city. Neither did the proud enemy (brag of the former daies victory) make any delay, but brauely sallied out at the East side of the city, and couragioully charged them. But Pitellin warned by his former harm, and feeing his enemies come on as he defired, couered his fhor with his pikes, and flanding close, re-The Turk fal. ceited the enemies charge; his shot stil playing under the pikes oftentimes upon their knees. K Many of the Turks were there laid on ground, whilst they desperatly sought to haue broken the order of the Christians. In the mean time, when many of the Turks horsmen and Ianizaries comming out of the gates, and divers others beholding the fight were come over the Riuer from Buda, to be pareakers of the victory, had filled the hithermost bank; Vitellius in good time, of purpose by little and little retyred, as if he had bin ouercharged. Then began the enemay to give a great shout, and more fiercely to assail the Christians; their horsmen also clapt behind them, to haue there charged them. Which thing Perense diligently noting, and that the Turks in following Fitellim were drawn a great way from the gates; he fuddenly with his light horfmen clapt in betwixt the city and the Turks, at their backs: after whom followed al-10 Mauritius (afterwards duke of Saxony) with a strong troup of German horsmen, of purpose L to that them in from retyring back again into the city. But then the Turkes perceiving the danger, & finding themselves shut in, stood as men more than halfamased, bethinking themselucs which way to take, and so began to retyre. When Vitellius comming on couragiously with his pikemen and harquebusiers divided into two wings, charged them fiercely: and the Hungarian & German horsemen breaking in among them on the other side, made great slauter of them, & struck such a sear among the slying Turks, that many of them in running to the gate, thrust one another thorow with their pikes: divers others were also by the horsmen driuen into the sca and drowned. That day Segemenes loft aboue an hundred of his Ianizaries, and four hundred other fouldiours. The chiefe commendation of this piece of feruice was given to Vitellins, who had so well and so quickly revenged himself of the Turks: and next vnto M him, to Percuss, who as a skilfull Captaine had fowel awaited the time to intrap the enemy. Neither is Mauritius the yong Saxon prince vnworthy his due praise, who valiantly charging the Turks, and having his horse slain under him, was in danger to have beene there lost himfelfe, had not Nicolas Ribische one of his followers couered him with his owne bodie, vntill fuch time as that he was refcued by others, Ribifche himfelfe prefently dying of his wounds: This little vilitory fo incouraged the Germans, that the Marquis commanded the great ordnance to be presently brought forth, and the battery planted; which was at the first placed so for off, that it did little harm, although the wall were both old and thinne, not aboue five foot thick and the ordnance laid either a little too low, or mounted too high, either thot thore, or enite ouer the city into Buda: which fault once perceiued, the battery was removed necrer. and a fair breach foon made in thowall, with the continual beating of 40 great pieces of ar- Abreach mede tillery. Vitelline was she first that offered to assault the breach, so that the Germans would prefently second him, which thing they al by holding up of their hands promised couragiously, but foon after cowardly brake their promise. For oftentimes it chanceth, that they which be-B forethe danger are readieft to promife their helpe, are in the very danger it felfe of all others most flack. The Hungarians also for their parts promised not to be behind. The silence of the enemy at the breach and in the city was wonderful, fo that many thought he had beene fled back operation tiver to Buda : for Segemenes captain of the Ianizaries, an old beaten foldier.ordered all things with as little stir as was possible: he had received new supplies from Vienas. and had cash vp a deep countermore within the wal against the breach, and on the inner side of the fame had made a ftrong barricado, with gabions and wine vessels filled with sand & earth; behind which flood the Isnizaries and next yoro them the Turkish archers, and last of al the horimen who had left their hories to ferue on foot. The fignal for the affault once given, four The breach al-Isalian captains ran delperatly with their Companies by the ruins of the wal to the breach : faulted by the Q but whilft they there fet up their enfignes, and wondring at the enemies fortification, were teady between hope and fear to leap down, they were suddenly ouerwhelmed with a shoure of arrows and bullets. Yet Vitellius still incouraging them, brought them still on, who did what they might to have entred. But the German footmen with their General flood fill under the The Granate wals looking on, as men nothing mooted either with the hope of victory, or danger of their comards look friends and the Hungarians not so much as once looking upon the enemy, tetyred. Two of training the the Italian gaptains, Russuand Fiolla, were there slain, and Carolus, Vitellius his nephew, shot in the squalt. the sholder. The Turks with shot and stones still repulsed and beat down the Italians, wherof the Germans also standing stil felt part, & were more galled than a man would have thought men could have bin that did nothing: for there they stil stood for shame, lest if they should D have also first retyred, they should have incurred a second insamy as bad as the first. Which thing Pitellius perceiving, would in no case depart from the breach, but wished rather to lose his men by whole companies, than to leave the least colour of excuse to the Germans, or that they should say they staiced longest; of whom hee with greater anger than griefe complained, that he was forfaken and cowardly betraid. In time of this affault one of the Turks was heard to fpeak aloud in the Italian conque, Why do not you, valiant Italians, fare your felues, or give place The conumpto those lazy Germans. We all wish to spare you and to beat the drunkennesse out of their most cowardly thou seeinst beads, that they flould no more herafter prouoke vs. At length the Germanes, weary of their hot the Girmans. standing, and noughe doing, got them further off; after whom the Italians forthwith retyred: The Germants but fo diforderly, to be quickly out of the danger of the enemies shor, that if the Turkes had tire with loff. E at the same time fallied out at al the gates, it was thought that the whole camp had bin much indangered. In this attempt, rather than affault, 700 Christians were slain outright, and many more hure, who died afterwards of their wounds. All this while the Marquis and Hugonot, the great Commanders of the army, kept themselves so far from gnn shot, that they were no where to be seen; vntil that Torniellus & Fotisca two valiant Captaines finding them out, wished them for shame to shew themselves for the comforting of the army. A little before night they confulted with the other captains, whither they should for sake the siege, or continue it stil. Wherof most of the Germanes best liked to begon, as the fafest way: though Pitellius and some others spake ernestly to the contrary. At which time a fpy comming in brought news, that Achemates, Solymans lieutenant of the Europeian horfmen, had past ouer the river Savus at Belgrade, and was comming to Pesth a whole comming either compingly feined or vainly beleeved, caused the Germanes to make a short conclusion, & to resolue flatly to return to Vienna, searing that if they should longer continu the fiege, they should be stayd against their wils by Achomates. Which thing made many of the old German foldiers to hang their heads for shame, & the Hungarians to curse both the Germans and the hard fortune of their nation a vainly withing for as faeneral in courage and & fwerable to the strength of that great Army. Sagemener perceiving how much the Christian Army was discouraged by the last days evil successearly in the morning sent out at the host men and after them certaine Companies of footmen, to relieve them in their tenant whole many places skirmished with them, being nothing instricurvato attendicted inchange ide skil; and the matter was brought to that passasif it had hin to agrato you; thad many of the most notable and expert souldiers on either side incomered band to hand in the right of the Italians and Germans, the Hungarians mine with the Turks, and the Euteks wish the Hungarians rians, with fuch fidelicy, that they regarded no other enemy but him whom z deny man had fingled out for himselfas if it had bin in a triumph, for exercise hand to hand it happed that a notable captain of the Turks defired to fee Vitellius; who being showed vntohim (for hee H was casing to be known by his armor) the Turk ran vnto him to embrace him forthis monor, and fo departed. About 500 horfemen fo incountered with one another hand to hand that day, of whom many were flain or hurt. The night following, the battery, was removed and the Army marched toward the river to the fleet. The Turks perceiving the Christians to be departed, fallied out of the City on all hands, and with a great cry vpbraiding them of cowardife hardly purfued the rereward of thearmy. Vienas was come ouer himself from Buda, and fo eagerly followed the Army, that it could hardly have of caped without great danger, had not Vitellian with his Italians made a stand, and requested the Hungarian and German horsemen to turn back upon the enemy : which they at his request did, and not only repulsed the Ene. my but also put him to flight, and in the chase flew many. After which time the army bested on quietly; yet 700 Germanes which were fick and firagled behind the Army, were by the Turks horimen miserably slain in the fight of their fellows. The Germans thrice foiled by the Turks, first at Exek, then at Buda, and now, at Peth, returned full of heavines and grief, as they which were now to forget the fubduing of Hungary, and to become careful of Germa-The Christian ny it felf. The army comming to Vienna, was there broken vp, and the Italians feat home inarm, protein to their country, who for most part died by the way, of infection taken in the campin strange air, and a most quesie time of the year.

But to couer the shame of this vnfortunatexpedition, and to turn mens talke another way by some notable accident; Petrus Perenss the noble Hungarian was the man pickt out for the Paramenter purpole to fil mens mouths. He belayd with the enuy of the Court, was for fulfition of alpi. K traily apre- ring to the kingdom of Hungary, by the commandment of King Feedinand apprehended by suppression Lifeanus a Spanish captain, in the gastle of Strigonium, as a traitor, and presently delivered to Medices the Admiral, to be conveyed up the river to Vienna, Lifensus at the time of his apprehension, couetoully and vacurteoully took from him his Chaine, and a rich cloake lined with fables. Which indignity don to so noble a gentleman, so much offended the minder of the rest of the Hungarians, that about 12000 of them thereupon presently returned home to their own dwellings, curfing the Germans to the diuel. This Perenus was one of the greatest Peers of Hungary, but of a most hauty and magnificent mind, so that he would sometime haut almost 100 goodly spare horses fit for service led before him without their riders; and would fomtimes speak too liberally against the barenes of king Ferdinands court, who polled by the L courtiers, hardly maintained his state. Which his surpassing magnificence and princely port was cause enough for the other great courtiers to enuy at his estate, & to seek his overthrow: who as men ouercharged with the burthen of another mans vertue, whereof they never bore the least part, and alwaics gaining by the deprauing of other mens perfection, conspired together his ouerthrow; and oftentimes pointing at him with their fingers, would say, That he sauored of a crown. This notable man as he had many worthy vertuces, fo was hee not without cause noted of ambition and inconstancy. For after that King Lengt was lost, he disdaining the preferment of Iohnthe Vayuod to the kingdom of Hungary, took part with Ring, Ferdinand against him, in hope as it was thought to be next in honour vnto himself. But after hee faw King Iohn again restored, and his state strongly supported by Salyman, and that all things M shood doubtful and tickle with Ferdinand, he with like leuity sought means by Abraham the great Baffa, to be reconciled vnto King Iohn: which was hardly obtained of him by the intescession of Solyman himself (as is before declared) to whom he gaughis son as a pledge of his fidelitie. Afterwhich time he liued in great honour and royalty all the reign of King lebs :

A but after he was dead, and faw George the Bishop the Kings tutor doing what he lift, to reigne Masters furmi. like a King, he disdained his gouernment, and solicited by King Ferdinand, revolted again vnto him, and furthered him in what he could for the obtaining of the kingdome. But now falling into the enuy of the court, malice found out matter enough to worke his confusion. First it was given out, That his fon who had many yeres been detained in Solymans Court as a pledge of his fathers faith, was even then under the colour of a feigned cleape come into Transyluania: when as he had fecretly agreed with Solyman, that his father being a man much fauoured of the people, thould by promifing them all possible freedome, allure them to the Turkish Subjection: in reward of which good service he should be made Governour of the Kingdome of Hungary, and put in hope also to be made the tributary King thereof, if it should fortune B. the young King to die Besides that it was accounted a thing very suspitious, that he had the Winter before vsed great kindenesse and friendship toward the Turkish Captains, by sending them great Presents, and receiving the like againe. And last of all, his letters directed to certaine Hungarian Captains were produced, wherein he seemed to promise them as his friends and followers, greater entertainment than agreed with his present estate. All which things King Ferdinand (of his owne disposition not easily to be persuaded to conceine enill of the Germanes his countrey men, were it never to apparant or true, but of ftrangers any thing) mickely becleued, and therefore caused him (as is before said) to be apprehended. But Peremu as he was brought by Medices the Admirall to Vienna, when he was come neere vnto the gate of the city, and heard that Philippus Torniellus with certaine other braue Captaines of his C acquaintance, were come to meet the Admirall, he requested that the close Coach wherein he rid might be opened, and that he might have leave to speake to those noble and valiant Gentlemen. Which thing was eafily granted, for that the nobility and approved valour of the man seemed vnto them which had the charge of him, vnworthy of such restraint of liberty or imprisonment, yea, or of the least suspition thereof. So he turning himselfe towards them. spake vnto them in this fort:

Wretched I nobte Gentlemen (fald he) whom despio ht full enuy bath circumuented quilt lesse but much The tamentable more miferable King Petdinand, whom domeficall theenes bereaues of substance of friends, and honour Bus, to Tornielall at once. For to it commet h to paffe, that by this inconfider at wrong done unto me, he shall utterly lose lime and the D the lone and fidelity of the Hungarian Nation, and may therefore for ener not without cause dispaire for there areaines, the obtaining of the Kingdome of Hungary, stheoottaining of the Kingdome of Hungary, statement of the case of the Kingdome of Hungary, statement of the case of the cas Nation in birth, and bauing for my good and faithful fernice well deferued reward of a full King) so much as to rejoyce for the deliner ance of my fon from the captivity of the Turks but that by my finifer fortune. dreadfull death in flead of incomparable joy must be prefented to mine cies. For will these malicious Picke. thanks quilty of their owne cowardife, the wicked contribers and witneffes of my wrongfull accusation, pareme being laid fast and in durance which never pared the Kings honour? For every man of what nobility somer, be he never so existlest, when he is once in hold, must be consent to endure, not what he hath described, but what his hard fortune asigneth. Tet my Spots he mind and cleare conscience, which thing onby Godthemost just Ludge leadeth as a comfort to men in milery wrong fully accused delivereth me of this E vare and to will the Marquiffe our Generall to whom I before upon a mistrust foretold that such a danger would shorely befall me, and that I had rather be staine putitione, than to withdraw my selfe from triall; which thing I told him at fach time as I was fo guarded with mine owne strength, that I feared no mans force. I befeech you do me this honour able favour, as to requelt King Perdinand in my behalfe quickely Perenu his reand honourably to proceed to the trial of my cause, and according to his owne Princely disposition, and the quest of the adwill of others, to discerne betwist his faithfull friends and feigned flatterers. Truly we are too too unfor religious cap-tunate Captains, if for a little chill successe we shall be so adjudged as menthat had overthrowne their for-taines. sune. Cazzianer peraduenture received the just punishment he had descrued, for the shamefull for faking and lofing the army at Exek, when as he possessed with an uncouth feare, forgot the duty of a Gene. rall, more affraid of death than dishonour : for when he had voluntarily committed himselfe to safe custo-F dy, he was so generally condemned of cowardise, that dispairing to defend his cause, he brake prison, and as wickedly as unfortunatly renotted to the Turks: But neither was I of late the Generall neither were we Vanquished, although we prevailed not, but honourably retiring, valiantly repressed the insolency of the Pursuing enemy. As for the kingdome of Hungary, I might then well have affected the same, and easily have deferued it at Solymans hands, when as King Ferdinand after the death of King Iohn, was making his preparation for that war : at which sime my friends and followers at my denotion, with the lone G of the Hungarians towards me, seeming of no small importance for the obtaining of the victory, much have ministred no vareasonable or vseasonable hope to have drawne a man into courses not altogether bescening a Christian. Wherefore I have, and will so long as I line fight against the Turks if King Ferdi. nand hall show himselfe an ind fferent sudge in this accusation, fally surmised against me by the matice

When he had made an end of speaking, the Admirall courteously persuaded him to have good hope in the elemency of the most just King, and shortly after performed his request; for he and Torniellus taking the King as he was hunting, entreated him to deale fauorably with Perenss. For all that, Perenss could not obtaine that his cause might be openly heard, but was H committed to fafe keeping, there to remaine in perpetuall prison: but whether it was for the Perenus, Valent misprission of new treason, or for revenue of his old unconstancy, is vucertaine. Thus three thus, of May the only great Princes left of the Hungarian bloud, equally worthy of the Kingdome, Palenlat, thereof the time, Maylat, and Perenus, fnarled almost in like snares of enuy, cut off all hope of raising a King syin Hungary. to their feditions and therefore miferable countrymen when as Perenus lay too late bewailing his vnconstancy in perpetuals prison; and the other two fast in chaines neere vnto the Euxine fea, expected death the end of their miseries, This end had the wars taken in hand against the Turks by the generall consent of the Germans in the yeare 15421 which many thought might worthily be compared with the greatest losses of those times when as King Ferdinand having in vaine spent a great masse of treasure (the fittest stay for the imminent war) and lost the opinion before conceived of the strength of Germany; had now as a weake Prince, and subject to injury, prouoked the Turks him against, hold enough otherwise, but as then insolens for their late victories. 1543

Polinus the French Kings Embassadour fill following the Turks Court, ceased not by all meanes to folicite Solyman, with his gallies to aid the King his Mafter in the invation of the Dominions of Charles the Emperour, in Italy, Sicily, and Spaine. In which fute he was fo croffed by Solyman the cunuch Baffa, then Vifier, that he was almost in dispaire of speeds for the malicious Eunlich being himfelfea great fea man, and enuying the honour of Barbaressa (whowas to be imploied in that service) sought by keeping him out of all honourable agions, to diminish his former glory; and concerning the present, protested openly as he sate in K Councell, That he saw no other cause why the Turkish, Emperour should to his great charge and the common danger, fend out such a fleet, but to ferue Barbaruffa his owne turne. But Se. lyman having diligently heard, and deepely confidered of that the Baffa's had faid, rejected their opinions who would not he flould have given the French King any aid, and honourably decreed according to his promise, what focuer should ensue thereof, to send his fleet voto the gran. King by Barbaraffa. Two daies after, the French Embassadour, before in dispaire, but now reretho tendha wind with that Decree, was folemnly featted by Rulian Balla (Solymans fonne in law) and by suffate aid the Solyman the Eunuch Bassa: for so it was their great Masters pleasure, both of them joying of trent bing a him for the friend hip confirmed betwing the two Princes by fending this fleet Afret which, diners gifts were bestowed upon the Embassadour and his chiese followers; and at such since L as he was to take his leave, Solyman gave him great charge of his Nany, that it might be fafely kept, and so after the feruice done, againe returned : and withall delivered him letters vito King Francis, wherein after the glorious rehearfall of his proud titles, he writ yato him as fol-

We have upon a brotherly bounty granted unto Polinus your Embaffadour, such and so great a fleet as you have defired, throughly furnished for all assaies : whose direction we have commanded Hairaden our Admirall to follow, and by your appointment proceed against the Enemy. But you shall doe well and friendly, the wars once happily anded, to fend backe againe my fleet to Constantinople. All things shall undoubiedly fall out according to your owne define and mine, if you shall sarefully take beed that Charles M the Spanish King your perpetual enemy, doe not againe deceive you with the motion of a deceitfull peace. For then shall you bring him to a most indifferent peace, when you have brought upon his countries all the calamities of War.

Palimu taking his leave of Bolymon thed bying artifichianople, returned to Confiantinople. where he found Barber of switch an hundred and ten gallies and forty gallions, ready to put to fea which he tied with incredible colerity rigged up and furnished. And so setting forward the eight and twentieth of Aprill in the years 1545, and passing the dreight of Hellespontus. he strived fir has Cariffus in Hubos ; and from thence to Males; where he was by contrary winds cast into the bay of Lacedemon, and there stated nine dates before he could double the cano of Metapanium, called in antient time Tenarus: After that he came to Methon, and from thence ctoffing objetionian pastic to the fireit of Meffana; where the Turkish pyrats being come with their gallines within the fight of Rhegham, began to land their men. They of Rhegiand feeing fo great affect, and the Turks already landed, fled out of the city for feare; but the ca-B filewas fill kepeby Didaca Cuctanu a Spaniard, who refused to have any parly with Polinia the French Embaffador, and with thor out of the castle slew certains of the Turks; wherewith thereft being inrested, brake into the city, and finding it defolate fet it on fire, fore against the will of Politica arish Barbaruff a, who fought to have found out the authors thereof, and to have pupithed them accordingly, has a more

After that, remaine pieces of great Ordnance were landed and planted against the Castle. which with a femalhot to terrified the Captaine, already troubled with the crying out of his wifer that he withour any more ado yeelded himselfe and the Castle withall therein, into the handsof the Enemy : votowhom with his wife and children, Barbaruffa at the request of the Bench Embassador granted both life and liberty: the rest he shut up in a church, and gave the C faile of the Castle to his souldiers. There was in the garrison of the Castle about seventy Spanjards, but many mo citiens, which were all carried away prisoners. One of the Captains Barbarassa de Spaniards, our many mis-cities in writer and array principles of the control of the dispaters, a young gentlewoman of exceeding beauty, had with her good grace fo warmed morous of the captains of exceeding beauty, had with her good grace fo warmed captains of exceeding beauty, had with her good grace fo warmed captains of the captai themithered affection of the old Pyrat Barbaruffa, that he (now fitter for the grave than for Roteinm bie marriage) became amorous of her person: so that taking her from her father, and entring her daughter. into the Mahametan Superstition, he made of her as of his wife infomuch that certaine moneths after he welcommed and bountifully entertained the Captaine as his father in law. comming to fee his daughter at the Port called Portus Herculis in Tufcany, where the Turks fleet then lay Barbaruffa failing along it the coast of Italy, came to O ftia, in the mouth of the river Tiber, and brought such a feare upon the city of Rome, that the Citisens were ready ge-D nerally to have forfaken the city; had not Polinus by his letters to Rodolphus the Cardinall, then the great Bishop Paules his Legat in the City, in part staied the sudden tumult. The Bishop himselfe was then at Buxetum, a towne betwirt Cremona and Placentia, trauelling (in shew) with the Emperor, to have made a peace betwixt him and the French King; but labourring in secret to have bought of him the Dukedome of Millan, for Ottanism his kinseman the Emperors sonne in law. Polinus his letters written to the Cardinall at Rome, and fent by the Governor to Tarracina, were to this effect:

This fleet which is by Solyman fent for the defence of France by Barbaruffa his Admirall, is by his The French emappointment at my command: so that it is not to hurt any but our enemies. Wherefore make it knowne to terito confort E the Romans and others dwelling along the coast of the Popes territory, That they feare of us no hostility, Rodalphibicar. for the Turks will neuer violate the faith of their Emperor, solemnly given unto me: and you know most disalt the lopes Asuredly, that the French King desireth nothing more, than that the estate of Rome might not only be kept in sofety, but also flourish most eleviously, and be therefore preserved from all injury. Farewell.

In like manner he also comforted up them of Neptunianum and Ostia, so that they brought must the Turks all manner of victuall; and sometime for source stepe or a couple of oxen redeemed a good prisoner taken in some place of the kingdome of Naples. Yet for all this, the Romans did not so much credit the Embassadors promise in the behalfe of the Turks good dealing, but that many of the weaker fort fled out of the city into the country by night, although the chiefe Magistrate did what they might to have staied them. When Barbaruffa had thus lien three daies in the mouth of the river Tibur, and there watered, he passed along it the coast of Etruria and Liguria, without doing any harme; and so sailed directly to Markilles. Where leaving him with his fleet for a while, expecting the French kings further pleafure, we will againe returns vnto Solyman, who at the same time that Barbarn sa was spoiling the frontiers of the Emperors Dominions in Italy came with a great anny into Hungary for the hibre & affured possession of than kingdome, where after he faw King Technology for mich longed which because he would make all fixe before him, he sept Amurathic Governous of Dalmatin and occasion in Petitan Gouchotk of Boins, to beliege Welpa, a lineagrown fricuste when the river Dranus por far from Exek famous fon the quantition of the Christian honry and ever the river aner : after whom followed also Achemates the great commandes of his Edmpoian Horschien. This cowne (part of Perense his possessions) was against all these forces temand worthly defended by Perenne his wife thet husband then lying in prison so Wienna) and dier wiends by the space of three moneths, but mas at last by the treacherous foldiers delivered to the enemy, to. gether with their Generall 5 whom when they could by no meaned perfunde so confert to the yeelding up thereof, but there he would needs hold it out to the last, they tooke him persone, H and fo delivered him with the towne to the Turks: who receited him with all course fe, and vied him honourebly: but those traiterous fouldiers, whether it were in derestation of their roufts stelded. treachery, or for the spoile of them, were all put to the sword; the just reward to their treason, The rest of the Citisens were taken by the Turks to mercy, and mellwied. The Bishop and chiefe men of Quinque Ecclesia (a famous city not sar off on the other side of Dranus) sea. ring of the losse of Walpo, and terrified with the greatness of the Turks army, fled for leare; leaving none but the meaner fort of the people in the City, who willingly resided the fine vnto the Turks. The next towne of any strength was Sociofia belonging also to Press. which for a while held out against the Turks, for chat divers Gentlemen of the county which were fled into the City, encouraged the Citifens to fland vpontheir defence: But after much I harme done on both fides, when they were no longer able to bold out they retired into the Castle, in hope to have so saued their lives and liberty by their yeelding but Amerika was so offended with them, that he would come to no reasonable composition, or promise them any thing more, than that they should at their pleasure come forth: and soas they came out of the gate flew them euery mothers sonne, thereby to terrific others from making like re-

Solyman understanding of all these things, gave those towns which were taken to Ammather the Generall and having put all things in readinesse, departed from Buda with all his army to besiege Strigonium, which was then kept by Liscanus and Salamanca, two proud couctous Spamards, with a garrison of 1300 soldiers, whereof some sew were Spaniards and Italians, and the g rest Germanes. Paulso Bishop of Strigonium gor himselse out of the city betimes, dispairing of all mercy if he should have fallen into the power of Solyman, by whose intermission he had bin once before reconciled to King Iohn, and had again resolted from him to King Ferdinand. The castle of Strigonium was scituat vpon a high hill querlooking Danubids running vnderneath it, the walls were built cuen without any flankers, after the old manner of building before the invention of guns : for which cause Vitelline and Tornielles two expert captaines (the yeare before fent from the King to view the place, and the manner of the fortification) were of opinion, that the city could hardly be defended, if it were befreged by any firong Enemy; being subject also ento a hill not far from the gates of the city. Against which inconveniences the old garrison soldiers which wintred in Strigonium, cast vp new bulwarks and fortificati- I ons, and after the manner of windy headed men, making great boaft before the danger, what they would do, seemed to wish for the comming of Solyman. But after that the barbarous enemy had with his tents covered the fields and mountaines round about the City, and withall brought a gallant fleet vp the river, all those brags were laid in the dust, & every man began to grow doubtfull of his own fafety : for that they being but few (although men of good worth) were to withstand the infinite number of such enemies, as oftentimes vsed most desperatly to expose their lives to all maner of dangers. This their fearewas also increased by the comming of certain meffengers from Solyman, who understanding of what nation the garrison confisted, fent vnto the city three of his owne gard, one a Spaniard, another an Italian, and the third a German, all renegat Christians; that every one of them might without an interpreter speake M vnto their countrymen in their own language: These men admitted into the city, offered great rewards and large entertainment in the name of Solyman, to fuch as would in time yeeld: denouncing all torture and extremities vnto them which should endure the summons of the cannon. Whereunto it was answered by the Captaines, That those faithfull and valiant soul-

diers, who had reposed their last hopes in their armes, were neither to be won by gifts, nor ter. The sour anrified with threats. With which answer the messenger returned, and the same day the Turks Sweet of the great ordnance was planted upon the hill before the gate of the city, and the weakest part of the walls round about the city, so well pickt out by the Turks to be affaulted, as that they could not more skilfully or commodioully have been chosen out of them which had within most diligently viewed enery things to that it is to be thought that the Christians wanted not only fortune against the Turks, but also faith amongst themselves. Salamanca distrusting the fortification of the suburbs, retired into the city, contraty to that he had before vainely boa-Red Achomates Generall of the Europeian horsemen, laied siege to that part of the wall which was next to the Bishops gardens: Vlemas the Persian besieged the tower neere vnto the gate towards Buda: the Asapi or common soldiers were by their captains brought on to dig trenches and cast vp mounts, as was thought most convenient. It is incredible to be spoken, with what fury the great ordnance was discharged without ceasing a insomuch that the tower with a great part of the wall neere vnto it, shaken with continuall battery, fell downe with such violence, as if all had been shaken with a most terrible earthquake : neither was any man able to fland voon the wals, but that the Ianizaries with their harquebusiers out of their trenches, and The terrible from their mounts, would most certainly fetch him off: and many which stood within farther battery of the off.were with the Turks arrowes falling from high as if it had been out of the aire, grienously tenium. wounded. But that which most troubled the defendants, and did them greatest harme, was the stones, which beaten in funder with the great shor, and not to be avoided, did with their pieces C kill or maime the fouldiers neere hand. With which dangers they were enforced to for fake the vttermost wall, and to cast vp new fortifications within, that they might with lesse danger defend the place. Neither in the enemy wanted courage to affaile the breach : thrice they The Turkes redefend the place. Neitner in the enemy waincu comage to analie the observed the affaults, suffetibilities desperally attempted to have entred, and were alwaies with losse repulsed. In which affaults, suffetibilities the affault of amongst others, Bultaces Sanzacke of Selymbria, a man of great account among the Turks, was the breach, loft. Whilest the defendants were thus busied, many of the souldiers and marriners which came up the riner with all things necessary for the army, from Buda, went on shore, and lay in the suburbs of the city in such security, as if there had been no enemy nigh: which thing they in the city perceiving, fuddenly fallied out vpon them fearing no fuch matter, and flew many of them before they could arme themselves, and draue the rest to their fleet: so that betwixt D fighting and flying there was about two hundred of them flaine. Zimar a Perfian, Admirall of the Fleet, inrefeuing of them which to faue their lines fled vnto the river, was shot through with a small shot and slaine. Whilest these things were in doing, and the Turks having in many places fore shaken the wall, did with greater force daily affaile the City, and the defendants with their continuall loffe, and out of all hope of reliefe, were more and more difcouraged; an old Calabrian enginer which had long time ferued king Ferdinand, fled out of the city Achriftian futo the Turks, who being courteously entertained by Solyman, and examined by the Bassacs of giving discourted by the giving discourted by the Bassacs of giving discourted by the giving disc many things concerning the strength and state of the city, satisfied them in all that they desi- and sate of the red; and further, directed them in planting their batteries in places most convenient for the city valo the speedy taking of the towne. In the meane time whilest the Turks were with restlesse labour Turks. E battering the walls, and working in their mines, it fortuned that a gilt brasen Crosse which flood upon the top of the steeple of the Cathedrall Church, was by the continuals shooting of the Turks thereat, at length beaten downer ar the fight whereof, it is reported that Solyman after the superstitious manner of that nation taking the chance as a roken of good lucke, cried

Out presently, Strig onium is won. Liscanus and Salamanca fearfully confulting of the event of the fiege, and feeretly conferring together, resolued to saue themselves, and to give up the towne. Lifeanus was no great soldier, and yet by continuall spoile growne exceeding rich, and therefore thought it but folly to buy the name of a resolute captain at too deare a price, with the losse of his life and wealth, The like feeling was also in Salamanca, who preferred the safety of himselfe & of that which he had F got in long feruice, before all credit & honor were it never fo great. This their purpose was not kept to fecret, but that it was notifed abroad among the common fouldiers, of whom almost the third part were now either flain, or with wounds or ficknes grown weake : yet were they all of opinion generally, that they were still strong enough to defend the towne. But the vinder Captains and Antients ving to flatter their Generals, liked well of the motion, to yeeld vnto

Solyman vpon reasonable conditions; rather than to expose themselues to most certaine death, G which should nothing better King Ferdinands cause. Not long after, an Antient was by night let downe ouer the wall; and having by an interpreter received the Turks faith, called forth salamanes so. Salamanes, that he might upon better conditions go thorow with them for the yeelding up of etheat f sitt the towne. Who without further delay comming out, went to Achamates; before he went, with the Tarks Commanding them which defended the water tower next to the river fide, a place of great danabout the jet! ger, for safegard of their lives to get them into the city: who terrified with that news, and have filly retiring, were by the vigilant Turks which lay at the fiege therof, perceived, who fuddenly breaking in, flew such as were not yet gone, and possessed the castle. But Salamanca being brought before the great Baffa's, when he had ftood vpon many nice termes, & required many things to have bin granted him, obtained no more, but that they should without delay yeeld H up the city, and put themselues wholly to the mercy of Solyman. So the Spaniards being there staid, himselfe writ to Listanus, how he had sped; willing him forthwith, if he loued his owne fafety, to yeeld the city, without standing vpon surther termes. Liscanus vpon receitof these letters comming forth to the foldiers, declared vnto them the necessity of yeelding vp of the town, and what hope there was to escape with life and liberty. But whilest the fouldiers filled with indignation, flood as men indoubt what to do, Halis commander of the Ianizaries came vnto the gate, and with cheerfull rather than sterne countenance required to have it opened vnto him, according to the agreement made by Salamanca in the campe: which was forthwith opened by Listanus, and the keies deliuered vnto him. The Ianizaries entring in peaceably into the city, possessed themselves of the wals and fortresses round about, commanding the Christie an foldiers to give place, out of whom they choic all the beardles youths, and commanded the rest to cast down their harquebusies & other weapons in a place appointed, which they all for feare did, expecting nothing but some cruel execution to be done upon them by the barbarous enemy. Which their feare was the more increased by a strange accident then value kily chancingsfor whilest the soldiers did as they were commanded, with their harquebusies cast their flaskes full of pouder also, one of them suddenly tooke fire of a match which was by chance cast in amongst them with fire in it, which firing the rest, blew about all the heape of weapons among the Turks, which so filled them with anger and seare of some sudden trechery, that they fell upon the Christians and slew divers of them : untill such time as Halis (persuaded that it was a thing hapned rather by chance than malice) commanded his Ianizaries to stay their fury. This tumult appealed, Halis caused proclamation to be made, That all such Christian soldiers as would ferue Solyman in his wars, should have such place in his army as their quality required, with bountifull entertainment: yet of all the Christian soldiers were found only seuenty, which carefull of their liues accepted the offer, fearing that the Turks would spon fuch as refused exercise their wonted cruelty, Halu entertaining them courteously, sent them away with the other youths whom he had before culled out, downe the river to Buda: the other foldiers he tooke into his protection, and yied their labor to help the Turks to make cleane the castle. Life and the see- But Life and, who to faue his gold had made thipwrack of his honor & reputation, was glad to giue vnto Halis the faire chaine of gold which he had most couetously & insolently before ta-Birt of all bir ken from Perensus, when as Hillis (who would otherwaies have taken it from thim by force) by way of military curtefie now craued it of him, as a strange kind of ornament among the Turks: nterpained, with which gift he was in hope to have failed the rest of his coine. But fortune favoured not fo much the couerous coward : for when he was about to depart away with his horses of sernice which he kept very good, & had cunningly stuffed the saddles sus of gold, thinking so slily to have convoied it: the Turks laughing at him, tooks from him his horses surhished as they were, faying; that he which was to go by water needed no horfes. So was the cone tous wretch at once quit of the great wealth which he had in long time end goe! The captains with the felt of the foldiers dispoiled of their armes, were conveied over the river of Danubins, and fortrauelled on foot to Possonium, where the County Salme by the commandement of the king apprehended Liscansu, Salamanca, and some other of the captains for suspition of treason, Secom- M mitted them to fafe custody, there to answer for their cowardly yeelding wp of the city.

Solyman entred into Strigonium the tenth of August in the yero 1543, and there connerting restant and Christian Churches into Temples for the Mahometan Superstition, first storificed for his vithe Mahometan Ctory (as he had before done in Buda) and after with all speed for frongly fortified the city, as if he would thereby for euer haue taken from the Christians all hope of recouring the fame againe, deriding the floathfull negligence of the Germans, who possessed of it fourcteen veares, had neglected all that time to fortifie it. Not long after, Solyman Icauing Offainus a valiant captaine Gouernor of Strigonium, and fending his Tartarian horfmen to fooile the country on the left hand, as far as Alba-Regalis, went himselfe to be siege the castle of Tatta, called inantient time Theodota. The garrifon foldiers terrified with the losse of Strigonium, and the fight of the Turks army, vpon the first summons yeelded the castle without relistance, and were fo suffered quietly to depart. That castle after the maner of the Turkish discipline, (who with few and those very strong holds keep their provinces in subjection) was by Solymans commandement presently rased downe to the ground. Torniellus Generall of the Italians caused Acovardy cage Hanniball, captaine of the castle, to have his head strucke off, for his cowardly yeelding up of temerded. the place he had taken charge of : thereby to admonish others, which had the charge of strong places, not to refuse an honourable death in desence of their country, for searc of an ignomini-

Tatta thus laid in the dust, Solyman marched with his army towards Alba, syrnamed Rega lis, for that the kings of Hungary by an antient custome vsed there to be crowned, and also buried. Buda, Strigonium, and Alba Regalis, three principall cities of the kingdome of Hungary, frand in maner of a triangle, almost equally distant one from another, about a hundred miles in compatte. Buda and Strigonium are scituate upon the river of Danubius but Alba standerh more into the land, strongly seated in the middest of a great lake, but not so wholesomly, es-C pecially in the Summer time, the Winterwaters then decreasing, and groffe vapours arising with the heat of the Sunne. From the city thorow the marish or lake, vnto the firme land, lie The description three broad and high causeys (in manner of the strakes of a cart wheele) well built with faire of alba Regalis. houses and gardens on either side, and a broad way in the middle, wherby men passe in and out of the city. At the end of every causey toward the land were cast vp strong bulwarkes, which the citifens vsed not to watch but in dangerous times of war: fo that by these bulwarkes, the houses of the suburbs standing upon these causeys, were safe from the danger of the enemy, the lake filling up all the spaces betwirt the causeys which, what for the depth, what for mud, flags, and bulrushes, growing in it, was not by horse or man to be passed thorow. And the city it felfe standing in the midst of the lake, compassed round about with a strong wall, and a deep D ditch alwaies full of water, was hardly to be befieged: for which causes a great number of the country people upon the comming of Solyman, fled into it with their cattell, as unto a most fure hold. In the city lay in garrison two companies of Germans, and 200 horsemes, vnto whom were joyned 500 Hungarian horsemen, such as in time of peace lived by robbing, and are by an infamous name called Varous vnto these, the Italian County Torniellus, who with his Italians was come as far as lauarinum, or Rab, fent foure captaines with their companies, fuch as were most forward in that service: after whom followed Barcotius, captain of the Kings guard. with a company of horfemen, appointed by the King for Generall. Who was no fooner come into the city, but newes was brought of Solymans approch. Whereupon he in half called together the other captaines, with Birrows then Major of the city, and other the chiefe citilens to consult with them, What was best to be done for the desence of the city, but especially, Whelther the suburbs of the city, standing upon those three broad causeys, were to be destroided or not? that so the city standing in the middest of the great marrish, might both with felle labor and danger be defended. This question was seriously debated, and great reasons alledged: The initial as a last the citisens cried out with one voice, against the matter and faid, That they would never fail the citisens cried out with one voice, against the matter and faid, That they would never fail to help. faffer those goodly suburbs, wherein were so many churches and faile buildings as might with the beat. compare with the city it felfe, to be so shamefully destroicd, to the vitter undoing of so many provide. rich citifens: for what could be (faid they) more dishonourable or lamentable, than to the encouraging of the barbarous enemy, to thew such a token of extreame feare; and with their owne hands to burne and destroy those stately buildings, which might by strong hand be well enough defended against the enemy, if they did not play the shamefull cowards. Of which opinion with the citisens was also of tanianing Sorplasting an Italian Captaine; alledging that both the City and the suburbs might both with like danger be defended; forasmuch as they were equally fortified with the benefit of the marrith, and if the worst should happen, the defendants might yet fafely enough retire into the City. At last standing vp as one thrust forward, both with the publicke hard fortune and his owne, faid, Valiant gentlemen, what shewwill G you gine of your valor, or what honor shall you have of your service ? If you shall defend so famous acity, by deforming of it your selves, and entiting off the suburbs, as it were the armes thereof, before the danger, sponted halfy desperation? Verily you shall do nothing, either in the service of the King, or the honour of your sclues, except this city (if God so please) be of you whole and sound valiantly defended. Vpon this speech they all arole, the wifer fort and of greatest experience giving place to the importunity of the ignorant and simple. Barcotius himselfe full of care, and ouercome with the vain opinion of the greater part, yeelded also vnto that fatall resolution of fauing the suburbs. For the often fallethout, that they, who wifely weighing dangers in the ballance of reason, and do therefore fearefully resolute of the euent of things, and doe thereupon oftentimes give more hard and resolute judgement of things than men of greater courage , yeeld neverthelesse be partakers of other mens follies, yea even to H most assured death, rather than by maintaining their fearefull opinion, to be deemed cowards. So fellie out with Barcotiss the Generall, who fetting a good countenance on the matter which nothing liked him, went out to the fouldiers, declaring vnto them the reasons why the suburbs were to be defended exhorting them with like valour on their parts to auswer that honourable resolution, promifing to prouide what socuer should be necessary for the obtaining of the victory, affuring them of great rewards and preferment, which should by their good service deserve the same. Hereupon the suburbs were by the common labour of the soldiers and the citisens quickly fortified, the great ordnance in places convenient orderly planted, and watch and ward kept by their captains and their companies by their turns day & night. But the Turks drawing neere to the city, bent their forces only against the suburbs of the gate leading towards Buda: for that they perceived the marish was in that place drier than the other, and the sandy ground more unfit for the making of bulwarks, & other fortifications for the fafety of the defendents, than in the other places where the ground yeelded better turfe. Barcotian perceiving the enemics purpose, drew all the Italians and Germans from the other gates into the suburbs of the gate of Buda, leaving the country people which were fled into the city, & the citisens, in their places. At the first comming of the Turks, the Hungarian and German horsmen, with the Italian footmen, fallied out of the fuburbs, and after certain light skirmifhes retired. Which maner of fight was continued by the space of three daies without any great harme don on either sides for the captains had warily commanded, That the sould iers should not adventure out too far. But after that Solyman himfelf was come, and had with the multitude of his tents befet the city far and neere, to the terror of the beholders; the Christians shut vp all the gates; and sallied out no more. Which thing caused the wild Hungarian V farous (vsed to open skirmishes) to prouide for themselues in time, and not to suffer themselues to be coupt up (as they termed) within the wals of the city: so for fashion sake, asking leave to be gone (who were not against their wils to be staied) they by night departed, being not to be intreated by the Generall or citisens to stay, and by knowne waies escaped thorow the woods from the enemy. In the mean time the Turks were come with their winding trenches within shot, and with their arrowes and small shot so scoured the top of the bulwarke, that no man could there possibly appeare but he was fireight wounded ; and fuch was the fury of the great artillery, that is had in short time battered in funder the planks and timber which kept in the fandy mould, wherof the fortreffe was made, more for shew than for strength; in such fort that the great shot flying quite through all flew and wounded many that were a far off: in which distresse of the defendants, The Turks Alapi with small danger filled up the ditches of the bulwarke, and divers places of fit up the dis. the marrish with earth and wood, which they brought continually from a wood thereby with chis and late, fix hundred waggons, to that in the space of twelve daies they had made a firme way for them and by plaint to passe ouer vpon, both to the bulwarke and the suburbs a worke before thought impossibelieved to ble to have been performed. The ditches thus filled vp, the Turks valiantly came on fleeking fusion britant by plaine force to enter the bulwarke. First came on the Asapi, whom as men of least worth the Turks captains vie to thrust to the first danger : after whom followed the horsmen, now on foot, with swords and targuets, or else their horsemens staues, covering the Ianizaries, who M vpon their knees with their harquebusies fore gauled the defendants. This hor sight endured about three hours with equall hope and courage; but the. Turks ftill relieued with fresh fouldiers, repulled the Christians, and gained the vetermost bulwarke i neuerthelesse the Italian fort was that day valiantly defended, the very women and religious helping to defend it: in which affault a tall Hungarian woman, whose courage far exceeded the weaknesse of her Annahit all of fex, thrusting in amongst the fouldiers upon the top of the fort, with a great sythe in her hand weman. at one blown firucke off two of the Tusks heads, as they were climing up the rampier. This affaultwas given the nine and twentieth of August, on which day the Turks had before taken Belgrade and allo flaine king Lowinat the battell of Mohatchz and were therefore after their superstitions manner in observanion of their fortunate and unfortunate daies, in good hope to have then taken the city swherein they were much deceived, being not able at that time furthertoenteribut enforced against pretire. Wherewith Solyman offended, lent for Abraham. Achemator, and Halis (the chiefo captains in that affault) into his tent, and reproued them therely, for that the bulwarke being fo valiantly and fortunatly won, they had not with more con-B rage profesured she victory, but cowardly (as he thought) given it over, being in a manner already won and therefore with forme countenance commanded them to prepare all things ready within three daice for a fresh assault, and neuer to returne vnto him, except they did win the city. Wherunto the captains answered no more (for were they never fo guiltleffe, they might not before him fland to excuse themselves) but that they would in short time accomplish his defire. Wherefore having made all ready, and encouraged the fouldiers to this last assault, they terribly assailed the rampiers, and brought a great feare voon the desendants : for taking the benefit of a thick mist (as it oftentimes chanceth in marrish grounds) they were with great filence (contrary to their manner) got up to the top of the rampiers, and come to handy The Jubish of great filence (contrary to their manner) got vp to the top of the time firetee and terrible; but Alba Regalia C the lanizaries prevailing at length put the Germans to flight, and after them the Italians also, Turki. to that now well was lie that could run fastest towards the city. But that their hasty flight lietle auxiled, when as they were to passe out by a little narrow gate in maner of a wicket: 80 they in the city, without regard of them that fled, had plucked up the draw bridge ouer the ditch. For naturally it commeth oftentimes to passe, that the searc of the present danger, without blushing excuseth our soule dealing. So the barbarous and fierce enemy pursuing the flying Christians at the heeles all the length of those suburbs with most cruel execution, many notable men, some fighting, some flying, were there flain: among it whom was O Et aui anu Serofattur, author of the euil counsell wherefensued that calamity. Barcotius the Generall flying on horsbacke to the little gate, which was not to be passed thorow, and crying in vaine to them that D fled to have the great gate opened, was by the comming of the lanizaries flaine : whose head and right hand full of rich rings, was by the barbarous enemy carried about in derifion vpon a launce. The rest of the flying multitude finding the little gate shut vp with the bodies of the The misroable dead, and the bridge malitiously drawn up, desperatly threw themselves into the deep ditch; fining bridge into the deep ditch; flying christians where some of them labouring to swim out, were caught by the legs and arms by others that could not swim, & both together drowned. Some hardly crawling ouer, were shot in the head or backe with the Turks arrowes: other some sticking fast in the mud, were as if it had been in sport shot to death by the Turkes: some few there were which got ouer and were saued. There was yet left in the city the Generall of the German horsemen, and Vicasades of Cremona an Italian captain; thefe two gathering the remainder of the fouldiers which were left, placed them upon the walstbut the civilens were strucke with such a feare, that they could not tell which way to turn themselves. For now Birrow the major, with the Aldermen and other chiefe citifens, feeing the flaughter of the Italians and Germanes, were fo ouercome with despaire, that they thought no hope of their well doing was to be reposed in making of any surther refistance but only in the mercy of Solyman, Wherfore Birrow spake vnto the Turks from thewall, That he might fafely fend Embassadors to Solyman, to intreat with him vpon reasonable conditions, for the yeelding up of the city; which thing Achimates easily granted. With embaladours thele Embaffadors for the citifens, went also the Generall of the German horsemen, and Care- Jene to Solyman lus Rufus an Italian captaine (who of all others had borne himfelfe most valiantly in all the af-conditions for faults, to the great admiration of the Turks) to intreat for the fafety & liberty of the foldiers. the yeading of The Embassadors being brought before the great Bassaes, requested. That yeelding the city, the city, the citilens might enjoy their liues & liberty; wherunto they were fo answered, as that it feed med they should not all be pardoned, yet was the general scare wel diminished, for shat the punishment respected but some few. Shortly after the city being yeelded, Achimater by open proi clamation in the market place, commanded the Italians and Germankroimake themselves real dy against the next day to depart, and to take good heed that no Hungarian wondwith them; he also streightly charged the citisens to keep their houses, wheil the strange foldiers were departed. At the time appointed the Italians and Germans for forward tondu acd by Homark with a company of the Turks horfemen, who faithfully defended them against the Tartars; running up and downe the country after spoile : neither was any thing taken from them but H their dags, which the German horimen after a new fashion carried at abeir saddle bowes; these the Tutks greatly defired, delighted with the nouelty of the invention, to fee their thot off with a firelocke without a match. But after the departure of Homars, they were in their travell fet voon by the Hungarians with whom they had many hot skirmithes, and had hardly efect ped vnfpoiled, had they not bin reseured by the Kings foldiers lying in garrison in the Castles as they passed along & the country. Solyman en.

Solyman entering quietly into the city, first visited the Sepulchres of the Hungarian Kings rething alba and gave out proclamation, That the Hungarians (hould feare of him no harme; for that he was not come to conquer them, but to deliver them from the bondage of the Germans, and fo Solymican feet to restore againe that entire kingdome unto Stephen the right heire of King John; But within three or foure daies after, he called out the chiefe citifens into a field not far off, wherein the font of Alberte.

Howbeit some seport, that he caused them only to be put to death which bare office in the city, at fuch time as they revolted from the obedience of the Queene and the infant king, vnto Ferdinand, and had then brought in German foldiers; and that he fent the rest Solyman retur- into exile to Buda and Belgrade: So. Solyman leaving Balibeius Governour of Alba-Regalis and Mahometes Cometime Gouernour of Belgrade, his Lieutenant Generall for the whole go- K uernment of that kingdome, returned agains toward Constantinople (Winter now beginning to approch) after he had that Summer won Strigonium and Alba-Regalis, two of the chiefest cities of Hungary. All this while king Ferdinand had haifed no power worth the speaking of to with stand so mighty an enemy; only at Vienna lay seventhousand Germans and source thousand Italians, at such time as Solyman departed from Alba-Regalis, which were shortly af-

Whiles Solyman thus lay at the fiege of Alba Regalis, he fent his Tartarian horsmen which ferued him to small purpose in the siege, to spoile the country round about a these sauge people doing much harme, were in divers places circumvented by the Hungarians, & about three thousand of them slaine : one of them being taken prisoner, had found in his knapsacke halfe L a child, of about two yeares old, the loathfome remainder of his barbarous feeding.

Barbarussa all this while lying with his fleet (as we have before said) at Marseilles, fretted exceedingly, that he had to his dishonour undertaken so long a voiage by sea, to pleasure him which was not able (as he faid) to dire & his own designes to any certain resolution, but shamefully suffered the best time of the yeare for seruice, negligently to passe away without any thing doing, the blame whereof would (as he faid) be imputed to him at Conffantinople; and that Solyman who defired to aid the King his friend and confederat, and by all means to annoy his enemies, would take in cuill part to haue it reported, that he had with fo great charge fet out fo great a fleet, and fo far off, to helpe his friend hardly befor with his enemies, and to have done nothing besides that, he tooke on like a Turke, that he who in time of service never vied M negligently to let flip the least opportunity, should now blemish his former credit and estimation, by lying still all that Summer in the harbour of Matseilles, where his soldiers grew lazy with nothing doing. Wherefore Polinus going to the King, told him of the proud Turks great discontentment for lacke of imploiment; and returning to Barbaras a brought order from the king, that he should lay siege to Nice a city of Province, then holden by the Duke of Sa. nov. This city standing upon the sea, was by one of the French kings for a great sum of money pawned vnto the Duke : which mony, King Francis had many times offered to have repaied but could neuer get the city out of the Dukes hands. Vnto which feruice, the French King fent also his fleet of two and twenty gallies and eighteen ships, wherein were imbarked eight thouland footmen, and vi Auall for many daies. This fleet departing from Marceilles, keeping closeby the shore, came to the port called Monoc; whither two daies after came Barbarussa alfowith an hundred and fifty gallies. From thence Polinus by commandement from the king writ vnto the State of Genoa, That they should not feare of that great fleet any hostility. which was not to hurr any but them of Nice, and not them neither if they would yeeld them-B selues. For more assurance whereof, he obtained of the Turks divers Genoa captives, which had long time bin chained in their gallies, and courteoufly fet them at liberty, and fent them home without ransome. After that, he friendly exhorted the citisens of Nice, to yeeld them. selues againe vnto their antient and lawfull Prince, renowned for his bounty and power; rather than to aduenture their State to all extremities for that poore and diffressed Duke, who betweene the Emperor and the French king, dispoiled of the greatest part of his dominions. faw no other end of his miseries, but to leave that little which yet remained, as a prey to the one or to the other, that should first lay hand thereon. Wherunto the magistrats of the towne answered, That they knew no other Prince or sonereigne, but Charles their Duke: wherefore he should defist farther to solicite them by letters or messengers, whom they would make no C. other account of but as of their eriemies. VV herefore the Frenchmen and Turks landing their vice in Proforces, laid siege to the towne in three places. The citisens had but a little before newly forti. wince besieged by the French fied their wals, by the direction of Paulus Simeon, captaine of the castle, and one of the Kuights and the Turki, of the Rhodes, a man of great experience, who long before taken at fea by pyrats, had fometime ferued Barbare fla, and therefore perfuaded the citifens as resolute men to withstand the Turks. Which, that they should more constantly performe, he tooke their wives and children and weaker fort of the people into the castle tand from thence furnished the citisens with all things necessary for their desence. The City was at once in divers places battered by the Turks and Prench, both by fee and land fo that at last the Turks had beaten downe one of the new built bulwarks, and made so faire a breach, that with their ensignes displaid, they attempn ted to have enered whose sonvardnes Leo Strozza (then serving the French King with a band of Italians dimitating fought to haucentred alforbut the citifens flanding valiantly vion their defence, manfully republico both the Turks and Italians, and canfed them with loffe to retire. Inthis affault were flame about 200 Turks; and of Strozza his fouldiers 22. Prefently after, Barbaruffa with all his force began a fresh battery, in such terrible maner, that the citisens seeing their wals in divers places opened, and the few fouldiers they had, fore wounded, and no hope to be an convenient time relieved, began to parley with the French Generall from the The citions wall, concerning the yeelding up of the city, upon condition, that they might in all respects crace party, or live vnder the French King as they had done vnder the Duke: for performance whereof, the any Generall page them his faith. But Folinus fearing left the Turks should violate this composi-

B sinn, and for price of the loffe of their fellower, or for hope of the spoile, breake into the city, entreated Barbarussa to recall his fouldiers, and to cause them to go abourd his gallies. For which cause not long after, the Ianizaries, as men deceived of their hoped prey, were about to have flaine both Polinus and Strozza, as they came from talking with Barbaruffa.

The city thus yeelded, they began to consult for the taking of the castle: the performance The castless wherof confilted first in the assailing of the castle it selfe, & then in defending of the city from first d. the fudden fallies of them in the castle; and likewise in desending of them which besieged the castic, so that no enemy should come to raise the siege: of which two things, Barbarussa put the French to choice which they would take, thewing himselfe ready either to besiege the castle, orto keepe the field. The French standing in donbt of which to make choice, the proud old Turk fcorning their flow resolution, & them also, as men unfit for the ready accomplishment of any martiall exploit; caused 7 pieces of battery, wherof 2 were of wonderfull greatnes, to be placed in a trice in a place most convenient, & the same quickly intrenched & fortified, to the great admiration of the French: with which pieces he had quickly beaten downe the battlements of the wals, and centinel houses, so that no man was able to shew himself upon the wals.

The Frenchmen likewise on the other side did with their great ordnance continually batter G the castle but with long shooting they came to such want of shot and pouder, that Polinu was glad to request, that he might either borrow or buy some of Barbarussa: whereat the Turke fretted and fumed exceedingly, That they should in their owne country stand in need of his prouision, who at Marceilles had better fraughted their ships with wine, than with necessaries for the wars. For the rough and seuere old Turke could not forbeare to taunt them, and oftentimes complained, that he was deluded with the hope of great matters which Polinus had promifed at Constantinople; and that in such rage, that he would threaten to lay hands upon Pen linus, who had brought him from Constantinople thither, whereas he must either lose his honour, or having spent his shot and pouder, expose himselfe and his fleet to all dangers. Whereand tore turn forthwith fore being exceeding angry with the French, he fuddenly called a counfell of his Captaines, H turn forthwith and other chiefe afficers, giving it out, That he would prefently returne toward Constanting. ple, seeing that among these cowardly and vnskilful men(as it pleased him to terme them)he found nothing ready or according to promife. Yet for all that, when he had chafed his fill, by the faire intreatance & large promifes of the French General & Polinus together, the wayward old man was perfuaded to change his minde, and to continue the fiege. But he was yet scarcely well pacified, and his mind fet againe upon the fiege, but letters were intercepted from the great captaine Alphonius Vafius, to Paulus captaine of the castle, wherein he requested him to hold out a while against the enemy, till that he, who had already font before his light horsemen, might come also himselse with his men at armes, who were vpon the way alongst the Alps by the fea fide, and would in two daies with the flaughter of the Turks put him and his castle out of all scare and danger. Which thing once bruted in the camp, such a great and sudden feare come vpon the Turks and Frenchmen (the night following the more to torrifie them proving by chance very rainy and temperatuous) that they all forfooke their trenches and great ordnance, and laying downe their weapons, by narrow paths climing ouer the top of the high mountaine, came downe headlong to the fea fide to the fleet. But the day appearing, and no enemy to be seene, they were ashamed of that they had done, and came agains to the siege, The Turks and Not long after, when as the castle in all mens judgement was hardly to be battered, and stan-Fresh gine and thought as the centre in an inens judgement was nardly to be battered, and itanmir the castle of ding upon a firme rocke, was not but in long time with hard labour and donbtfull successe to Nice, and fee be undermined, it was generally thought good to raife the fiege. Barbaruffa retiring with his fleet to Antipolis, came to anker at the Island Lerina, called of the mariners Margarita; at which time Valius and the Duke of Sauoy, with Auria his fleet arriued at Villa Franca : in the entrance of which haven, the gally wherein Vaftim went, was like to have bin lost. Foure other gallies by force of sudden tempest were driven vpon the rockes, and so suddenly beaten in pieces by the surges of the sea, that the gally slaves had no leisure to strike off their yrons, but were there all drowned, and all the ordnance lost. Polina underflanding this diffresse of the enemy, sent one Petrus Angelou to Barbarusse; to show him theogcasion offered, & to persuade him with all speed to hast thither with his fleet, as to a most affirred victory. Barbaruffa feemed to like well of the motion, and promifed to go syettle moved not, letted as was thought with the contrary wind, which then blew hard at East, and with the roughnesse of the sea. But the wind being fallen, and the sea become calme, and he contrary to his wonted maner making no halt, fet flowly forward, and being a little on his way, came again to anker, and went no further; the Sanzackes and other captaines first martelling, and after-Bubarussule ward laughing thereat, scoffingly said, That Barbarussa did but reason to deale kindely with Auria, as his brother and friend of his owne profession, for that he liad some yeares before receiued the like friend hip at his hands, in letting him escape at Hippona, which he now honeftly repaied him again. Whereunto Barbaruffa both then and afterwards at Confiantinople His aufwer to answered no otherwise, but, That he being an old commander, and halfe blind, saw more in the matter than all those greene Captaines with their sharpe fight. Not long after, he returned againe to Marceilles, and put into the hauen of Tolon, called in antient time Taurents. Pali- M as and the Duke comming to Nice, commended the Captaine of the Castle, and wondering at the cunning manner of the Turks fortifications, preferred them in that point before the Christians. Barbarussa lying with his fleet at Tolon, and by the Kings officers entertained with all possible courtesie, deliuered fine and twenty gallies to Salec the famous pyrar, and Inthacaptains.

A Affanes his nigh kinfman, who passing the bay of Narbona, rifled certain towns in Spain standing vpon the fea coast, and about the promontory of Venus (called of the mariners Creum) took great prize, and in the hauen of Palamos took one merchant ship and a gally with which prey they passed over to Algiers as they were commanded, there to winter, and with the first of the Spring to return agains to Barbarussa in Province. That Winter Barbarussa repairing his fleet, was furnished with many necessaries by the Genowaies, and specially by Auriahimfelf, who under the colour of redeeming of prisoners, willingly furnished the Turk with such things as hewanted: for although he professed himselse one of the Emperours Captaines, yet would be not show an enemies mind, by the unseasonable deniall of a little sea surniture, lest in so doing he should hatte hurt his native country Genoa, which he saw then subject to the n injury of so great a fleet so nigh at hand. But leave we now Barbarussato winter in Province. and with the course of time turn a little out of the way, to see in Muleasses king of Tunes, the fmall affurance the greatest have in highest place of worldly honour.

This Mahometan king, once before thrust out of his kingdome by Barbarussa, and restored Australia state again by Charles the Emperour (as is before declared) hearing of his comming with this great ming of Barbafleet, and imagining nothing leffe than that he should come to the aid of the most Christian "" a separate the King, doubted (not without cause) lest it was prepared against himselse. Besides that, divers to Italy, to great cities of his kingdome, namely Constantina, Mahemedia, and Mahometa (called in an-craue aid of tient time Cyrtha) Leptis & Adrumentum, were then holden by the Turks Barbaruffa's fauo- Charlesthe rites. Wherfore fearing the worst, about the same time that Barbaruss failing alongst the coast of Italy, he passed ouer into Sicily to have met the Emperour at Genoa, and to have obtained of him greater aid against the Turks. At his departure out of Africke, he committed the tuition of his kingdom to such valiant men as he supposed would have bim to him most faithfull:First, he appointed Mahometes (then Maniphat) to gouern the city, and Corfu (otherwife called Fares) his old feruant to keep the castle; leaving Mahometes his brother, and Fares his son, with Towarres a Spaniard (captain of the castle of Guletta) as pledges, the one of his brothers, the other of his fathers faith but vnto Amida his fonne he committed the leading of his men of war for the defence of his kingdome against the Turks and Numidians. As he was passing out of Sicilia to haue met the Emperour at Genoa, he was by contrary winds driven

D and a house appointed for him richly furnished: the Neapolitans wondring at the strange attile of the people, with the maner of their feeding, and curious plenty of all manner of fweet perfumes; for into every dish they put in odors of exceeding price, so that it was well known, copy differ. that a Peacock and two Pheasants dressed after the manner of the kings kitchin, cost aboue an hundred duckats: fo that not only the dining chamber, when they were carued vo, but all the housewas so filled with the strange & fragrant smell, that all they that dwelencer therabouts were partakers of that vnufuall and delicate perfume. From Naples he was about to have trauelled by land vnto the Emperour, being then in conference with the Pope at Buxetum (fearing to aduenture the fea, possessed by the enemies fleet) had not the Emperor by his letters willed him to stay still where he was. But whilst he made his abode at Naples, and carefully Amida vicets a attended what course Barbarns awould take (who furnished with so great a fleet, was departed for bis faiber,

With which news he being exceedingly troubled, determined without delay to passe ouer into Africke, and though late, yet as he might to remedy his domesticall troubles, in hope to oppresse that rebellion in the beginning, and his sonne also, before he could gather any strength to rest vpon. Wherfore hewith all the hast he could opened his coffers and entertained foldiers, the Viceroy giuing leaue to all fuch banished men as would, to come and give their names to passe over as souldiers into Africke : vpon report whereof, fuch a number of malefa@ors and condemned perfons came flocking to Naples, that it was thought a sufficient army might have been made of fuch kind of men, every one of them chusing rather to enter into pay, and blot out the infamy of banishment, and proue the fortune of wars, than to line wandring vp and downe the woods and in danger every houre to be hanged. Of these infamous men, one loannes Baptista Lofredi-*(a man well borne, but of a fierce and conetous disposition) vadertooke the leading : he co-

estaltedes re- uenancing with Mulcaffes to have three moinths pay before hand, leuied $800 men; which he co presently thipped, and keeping the greatest part of their pay to himselfe, passed ouer with the King into Africke, and landed at Guletta. But how Amide role vp again this father and what was the end of that bloudy rebellion; should not be amission reliease. There were certain Noblemen of great authority about Amida when Muleaffer departed, which at their pleature ruled the yong Bringe, who easily healthened voto cheir counsell, and followed the fame : the chiefe of thele was one Mahometes the fonne of Bahamer, who in the reigne of Mahametes, Mulcaffes his father, was Maniphat, whom Mulcaffes (poffested of the kingdome) out thamefully to death by cutting off his privities, because he had by hasty marriage deceiued him of Rhahamana a maiden of incomparable beauty, the daughter of Abderomon captain of the Castle, whom he most passionatly loued: for which cruell fact, Mahometes his sonne had H long time conceived a deadly hatred against Muleaffes, which he had many yeres diffembled that he might as occasion served be the more cruelly tevenged. Next vnto him was another Mahometes fyrnamed Adulges, whom Muleaffes was wont commonly to call his worft fernant Thefe two with a few others conspiring together, gave it out, that Muleaffes was dead at Na. ples and before his death had most irreligiously (as they accounted it) revolted to the Christian religion. With which report they perceiving Amida moved, came vnto him, and persuaded him quickly to enter into his fathers feat, lest Mahometes his yonger brother (then lying in hostage with the Christians at Guletta) should by the fauour and help of Toyarres, whose garrison was euer ready, be preferred before him. For Mahometes was eighteene yeares old. resembling his Grandfather in name, favor, and disposition, and therefore of the Citisens of I Tunes best beloued. Wherfore Amida came in post hast out of the camp to Tunes, to lay first hand upon his fathers Kingdome. The people which as yet had heard nothing of the Kings death, received him with doubtfull countenance : and as many stood marvelling that he was for athly come into the City without his fathers commandment, Mahometes (appointed by Muleaffes to governe the City) came out and (harply reproved him as guilty of high treason. persuading him to returne againe into the camp, and seeing him stay, by force of multitude thrust him out of the City. Amida deceived of his expectation, got him out of the way into the pleafant country of Martia between Vtica and the ruines of old Carthage. But Mahometer Gouernour of the City, after he had repulsed Amida, got him with all speed by water to Towarres at Guletta, to know of him more affuredly, if any fuch cuill news were brought from K Sicily of the death of the King, and to complain of the rashnesse and intollerable presumption of Amida. Where staying somewhat long in discoursing with the Captaine, and afterwards returning to the City, he was suspected to have practifed with the Captaine, to make Mahometes (the pledge in Guletta) King in his fathers stead; for so the common voice went. The Moores are by nature a faithlesse people, hasty, suspitious, desirous of news, which true or falle, they for the time interpret as serueth best their factions, whereunto they are exceedingly given. So at the first there rose in the City a doubtfull rumor of the making of a new Kingsthe suspicion whereof more and more increasing set all the City on an vorore. By occasion whereof, certain of the citisens to whom the very name of Muleasses was odious, speedily certified Amida (then in the gardens of Martia, fighing and grieuing at his hard fortune) how L all flood, and that now was the time to do himselfe good. He revived with that vnexpected news, and encouraged by the perfuation of Bohamar and Adulzes, and other his followers; refolued to take hold your that good offer of fortune, which would not alwaies frown, & tofollow his good hap. So in hast returning to Tunes, and entring in at the gate, which he then found open, ran presently to the Governours house, and finding him not at home, cruelly slew all his houshold, and with his bloudy company went presently to the Castle: where Fares the Captain seeking to have kept him out, and boldly laid hands upon his horses bridle to have thrust him back, was by a desperat Æthyopian, one of Amida his followers, thrust through with a fword and flain; ouer whose body yet sprawling, Amida forcing his horse, brake into the castle with his friends, & finding Mahometes gouernor of the city, presently sew him also; and M to by this means Amida in the space of an houre (a little before, a man in despair) obtained the city, the castle, and kingdom together. After that, he murthred his yonger brethren, & cmbrued with bloud, without shame polluted his fathers concubines. Muleasses landed (as we have before faid) at Guletta, with fuch forces as he had brought with him out of Italy, was aduised

A by Towares the Spaniard, not to adventure with fuch a handful of men to go to Tunes, before he were wel affored of the good disposition of the citisens toward him and was the more erneft with Lefredius not to go, because the Viceroy, had exprestly written, that he should in no safe go fartner than Guletta, except the King according to his promise had a good strength of the Numidians to joyh with him. But certain of the Noblemen among ft the Moors, who under the colour of friendship were sted out of the city, and had after the folemne manner of their nations out their fwords vnro their throats, and fworn to be faithfull vnro bim. wonderfully pricke forward both the King and Lofredine (100 hafty of chemiclues to their own deftimy) bearing them in hand, that Ameda woon the first fight of his father would for sake the Ci. ry and betake himsleff to flight. So without any more flaying, Muleaffer with onligne difplai, Muleaffer go. B ed fet forward soward Tunes, Loftedius cheerfully following him; Towares requesting them by the page 1 in vain to beware of the Turks trechery. Muleuffes marching, ftill torward, was come to nigh attitioner. that they might from the wals defery him, when fuddenly a firong troupe of Moores fallied cura the gave with a terrible cry and hercely affailed him: whom the Kings horimon valiantiviceeined, many falling on both fides. Miletifes in this hot skirmish fighting couragioutly againship enemies, was wounded in the face; and bled exceedingly; which so discouraged them about him, that they doubting of his life, turned their backes and fled; when prefuntly autonderfull furmber of horse and soot suddenly issuing out of the olive gardens, had bufor soft million and his fouldiers round; voon whom the Italians discharged certaine field pied cos: but after they had once discharged them, they had no leifure to charge them againe a for C the barbarous enemy come on to thicke and to fait, that the Italians foring themfolius too wester and compaffed an found, los fall their weapons as mon difcouraged, and caft themselves isso the like to by switting and taking hold of the little boats, to faule themselves from the spenies word which boats flood thefe diffressed men in great stead; for being furnished with finall pieces, they did beat backe the Moores, who eagerly purfued them even into the lake with their horfee! Lefredim as a man amafed with the fudden comming of the enemy, worke the lake with his horse, and was there unhorsed by the enemy and slaine, as were divers Lopediu slain. with him. Some few there were that fought couragiously, chusing rather honourably to die in the milit of their enemies, than themefully to be firangled in the flinking lake. Auleaffer Muleaffersatt. folled with his owne bloud and with the duft, flying among it the reft, was knowne and taken: By nothing middle bewraying him than his odoriforous perfumes. In this conflict 1200 Italians were lost which efcaped Tonarres relieved, and shortly after shipped them over into Sicily, from whence they trauelled home to Naples, but so poore, as well shewed the misery of their fortune. Amida having thus obtained the victory, was more carefull of nothing than to make his father virtit for government, which he did by cutting the fight of both his cies Amidanus out with a hor penknife: the like cruelty he vied upon Nahazar and Abdallat his brethren, then ta-breibrens site, ken with his father. After that, he certified Towarres Captaine of Guletta, That he had taken *few youths prifoners, which he would deliver vnto him, and that he had beteft his father of his fight, who had deferred a worfe punishment, as he that had long before done the like to his brethren; but had yet left him his life, as an example to other tyrants, and to show that he dealt B not altogether unmercifully with fo perfidious a father Laft of all, he confirmed (vpon certaine conditions) the fame league which his father had with him which he well faw was to great purpose, especially in the new hesse of his kingdome. Neither did Tourres rotale the fame, as ffanding with his prefent profit: for voon this agreement, Amida was to give him cortaine mony to pay his fouldiers, and to deliver him the prisoners he had taken, with the enfignes and body of Loffedius. For more affurance whereof he gave sebies his fon then nine yeares old, in hostage, yet upon condition, that if any affured peace could not be agreed upon, but that they must needs enter into war, then Towares should forthwith restore him his some Sehites in fafery. These capitulations, although they seemed not whreasonable, and were of them well liked; yet Touarres thought it not altogether agreeing with the honor of the Emperor, that he should enjoy the kingdome, who by most horrible treason and detestable villany

jury done by Amida) reigne in Tunes. There was an exile amongst the Numidians one Abdamalech, euer fince the time that Raf-Touarres fends cetes fled to Barbaruffa. Him, because he was Muleaffes naturall brother, Touarres fent for, put. G for Abdame ting him in hope of the kingdome, supported by Anemicaba great Prince amongst the Numileth Amida his dians, who had all that long time curteoufly entertained him. Neither was Abdamalech flow to accept the occasion presented, especially incouraged thereunto by the Numidian prince his good friend, and the predictions of the Aftrologers, who had foretold him, That he should die king of Tunes. Which vain kind of dissination having in it no maner of affurance, yet caufeth great mindes oftentimes to undertake great attempts beyond reafon, which falling out with more hap than they were with reason foretold, gineth some credit to that vanity, and causeth those cold prophets to be of some accounted as great wifards. And to worke this feare, such a time was offered, as a better could not be wished : for Amide having set all things in order as he pleased in the city, and cashing no perill, was gon to Biserta, to take order for his Customs. H which was there great voon fishing. Wherefore Touarres to keepe his promise, sent backe se. hites, Amida's fon, in a boat to Tunes, and received Abdamaleeb; who travelling most part by night, was fecretly come to Guletta, and there refting himfelfe and his horfes a few houses, to prevent the fame of his comming, posted in half with a troupe of his Numidian followers to Tunes, and passing through the city, went directly to the castle, which be entred without refestance of the warders, supposing him to have bin Amids come from Biferts : for Abdamelech had after the manner of the Moors covered his face with a skarfe, as if it had bin to have kene him from the fun & the dust, and by that happy slight got into the castle, before it was known who he was. The warder's perceiving their error, began as man amalad now too late to beselve themselues to their weapons, fortinmaking relistance they were quickly flain by the Numidians which came in with Abdamalech: who thus possessed of the salt is the chiefe frength of that kingdom) let in his friends, which were many in the city, by whom preferely be was faluted king the rest of the citisens either well liking of the matter, or at lest por paring for fear to fir. But as in these worldly things, for which men fo vainly toil, is no affurance, sp this per bemittebufes king thorrely after fel fick and died, when he had reigned but 26 daies, and was afterwards toiacholes King ally interred. After whose death, his mighty friends, with the chief of the citilens (persuaded and incouraged by Touarres the Spaniard) chose Mahameter his son (a childe scarce 12 years old) to reign in his fathers place; appointing Abdalages Maniphæt (brother to him who Amida flew) Abdelchirinus Mestuar, Schyriffus (a great man in their Mahometan Superfittion) and Perellue a Christian knight, to be his directors & gouernors which foure swaied all at their please K fure. But Abdelchirinsu tendring the welfare of his country, and diviling out of feelow how to fet up one of the roiall blond that were of himselfe able to govern the kingdom (faying, That it was not for the common good to be ruled by a childe) was for his labour by his other three fellowes suddenly slain, with all his kindred and knowne friends. After whose death the other three etected a manner of Triumvirat government, every one of them laying hand upon one part of the state or other, as liked him best. Amida thus shut out of Tunes, and having lost his kingdom, wandred up and down to Leptis, Cyrapolis, and many other places, craning aid of euery man to recouer his kingdom, milerably rent in funder (as he faid) by most wicked men who infolently triumphed ouer the boy king. Which they of Tunes knew well to be true, and daily complained of the death of Abdelchirinm, whom they called the faithfull Counfellor L and father of his countrey. Whilft Amida is thus trudging up and down crauing help of this and that prince, prouing his friends, and founding his fubicas affection towards him, Muleaffer grown miserable with his long imprisonment and the calamity of his disaster fortune, obtained of the yong king his nephew fo much fauour, as that he might fortime go out of the castle to the church:voder colour whereof he took fan auty, a place in Tunes holden in such reverence among it the Moors, as that it was a most inviolable refuge to all such as fled thereunto. Not long after, at such time as Bernardinas Mendo Zathe, Admiral of Spain, came to Guletta with the Spanish fleet, Maleaffes at the request of Tanarres was conveyed out of the fan-Quary to the Lake, and so by water to Guletta, there to be present at the consultation there bolden for the veter subversion of Amida and the driving out of the Turks out of such Cities M as they yet held along it the sea coast in Africa. Auteastes had hardly before escaped the hands of certaine of his enemies in Tunes, who fought after his life, preferred by an old woman, who mooued with pitty, hid him from their fury under a great heap of garlicke : and had he not now in good time escaped to Guletta, he had againe fallen into the hands of his

Muleaffer at fent to Gumerciles fon Amida, who shortly after recovered again his kingdom, and would not as he faid himself, have spared him for the reverence of any sanctuary. For the citisens of Tunes weary of the evil government of fuch as were in authority about the yong king, and not a little offended with the King himself, for espousing Melucen his cousin, one of Muleaffes his daugh. ters: secretly incouraged Amida by letters to repair to the city, promising to aid him in reconering of his kingdom. Wherupon he came in such hast, that the yong king had scarce time to get out of the city and Amida entring without relistance, and holpen by his friends, easily Amida recour. obtained again the kingdom, and exercised most exquisit cruelty vpon his enemies: of whom dom of Tunes, he caused some to be torn in pieces and deuoured of fierce mastines kept hungry for that purpole. Perellin he caused to be tortured, his secrets to be cut off, and himself afterward burnt to afhes in the market place.

But Muleaffes staid not long at Guletta, offended with the couctousnes of Tovarres, who as he faid had not faithfully reftored fuch things as he had before put him in trust withall, but had availtiously to his misery deceived him of part of his rich houshold stuffe, with certaine notable pretious stones and some of his treasure: whereof the blind King so grievously complained to Charles the Emperor that for deciding the matter they were both commanded to repair onto him into Germany: where in conclusion to end the strife, Towarres was discharged of his government, and Muleaffes fent into Sicily, there to bee kept of the common charge of that rich Island. Muleaffes by the way comming to Rome, was honorably feasted by Cardinal Farnelism: at which time he shewed himself both in his apparel and behaulour not forgetfull C of his better fortune : and being brought into the presence of Paulus the great Bishop, would do him no greater honor than to kiffe his knee, accounting it too great an indignity to have kissed his foot. He was of stature tall, and of a princely disposition, vnworthy of so hard a fortune had he not in the like maner before vnmercifully dealt with his own brethren.

Bathariassa weary of his long lying to so small purpose in Prouince, requested the French 1544 King either thorowly to imploy him, or els to give him leave to departioffering if he fo pleafed, to fooil all along it the coast of Spain, from the mountain Pyrenzi to Cadiz. But he not ignorant what hard speeches ran of him already in all parts of Christendom, for bringing in the Turks, was loth to leave to the memory of all posterity, the foule remembrance of so woful a flaughter: besides that he was adulted to dif burthen his Countrey of such troublesome D guests, who rouing about did much harm in the province where they lay, and as it was reported now & then fratche up one country peafant or other, and chained them for flaues in their gallies. Wherfore in supply of the Turk's that were dead, the king gaue vnto Barbarussa all the Mahometan slatter in his gallies, to the number of about 400, and furnishing him with all kind of provision, and bestowing great gifts upon him and his captains, fent him away, and with him Strozza with certain gallies, his Embassadour to Solyman. So the Turkes departing out of Province, kept along the coast vntil they came neer to Savona, whither the Germanes fent divers presents and fresh victuals to Barbarussa; which he took so thankfully, that he protested not to hurt any of their territory. From thence he took a right course to the Island of Elba belonging to the duke of Florence, ouer against Populona; where understanding that E one of the fons of Sinan his old friend was kept prisoner, he writ vnto Appianus Gouernour of the Island, for his deliverance, to this effect?

I know that a gong man a Turk feruith thee the son of Sinan syrnamed the Iem (a famous Captaine) Barbaruffa his taken of late at Tunes; him I would have thee freely to reflore which wife I wil make thee to under fland letters to asto be unto me most acceptable, for this our great fleet in passing by you shall faithfully forbeat to use any pianu. hostility. But if thou shalt in this to small a maiter refuse to gratifie me, expect upon the coast of thy country all the barms that an anery enemy can do.

Wherunto Appianus (shewing his men voon the walls in token that he was not afraid) an-F swered, That the yong man was become a Christian, & therfore might not in any case be delivered to the Turks: but that he would in any other thing gratific him what he could, and for his fake vie the yong man as his for. And to mollific the vnkindnesse of his answer, he sent him fresh victual with other presents. But Barbarassa offended with the answer, landed his men round about the Island, and commanded them to make what spoile they could. Which they Sffa performed accordingly, hunting the Island people vp and down the rocks & mountains like G hares, until that Appianus, not without cause doubting the utter spoil of the Island, redeemed his peace by deliuering the yong man to Salee the pyrat, who brought him to Barbarusa gallantly attyred after the Italian maner, of whom he was joyfully received, as the fon of a most valiant captain his old friend. And therupon Barbarusa staid his soldiers from doing any further harm voon the Island, and gaue Appianus great thanks for him. This yong man Barbarus. This man for valor was accounted little inferior to Barbarussa, but for discretion & just dealing far beyond him, nothing of fo furious and waiward a disposition as was he. Barbarussa departing from Elba, came into the bay of Telamon in Tuscany, and in short time tooke the city, which he spoiled and burnt, especially the house of Bartholomess Telamonius, whose dead body but a little before buried, he caused to be pluckt out of the graue, and his bones to bee scattered abroad, because he being admiral of the Bishop of Romes gallies, had in the Island of Lesbos wasted Barbarussa's fathers poor possessions : and marching by night eight miles farther into the land, surprised Montenum, and carried almost all the inhabitants away with him into captiuity. The like mischief he did at the portcalled Portus Herculis a but purpofing to have taken Orhatello, and there to have fortified, he was by Luna and Vitelliau (two valiant Captains before sent thither, the one by the State of Siena, and the other by the Duke of Florence) repulsed. So though disappointed of his purpose, yet having done great harme. and put the whole country of Tuscany in exceeding fear, he departed from thence & landed again at Igilium now called Gigio, an Island about twelve miles distant from Portus Herculis, where he quickly battered the town, and caried a wonderful number of all forts into milerable captiuitie. Keeping his course, he passing the cape of Linar, and comming over against Cantumcelle, had burnt that city for the same reason he did Telamon, had he not bin otherwife perfuaded by Streeza the French Embassador, searing to draw the French King into further obloquy. From thence he came with a direct course to the Island of Ischia, where landing in the night, he intercepted most part of the inhabitants of the Island, as they were fly- K ing into the mountains; and in reuenge of the hatred he had conceived against Passion at the fiege of Nice, he burnt Forino, Panfa, and Varranium, three chief townes of that Island : but Pithacufa the dwelling place of Vastina, standing upon a broken rocke somewhat distant from the sea he durst not adventure vpon. Then scraping along the Island Prochita with lesse hurt, because most part of the inhabitants were besore fled to Pithacusa, he put into the bay of Putecli, and fent Salee the pyrat with part of his fleet, to make proof if the city of Purcoli might from sea be battered. Salec drawing neer the city, shot into it with his great ordnance, and by chance flew one Saiauedra a valiant Spaniard, vpon the wals, and put the citifens in great fear lest the whole fleet should have landed, they themselves as then unprovided. But the Viceroy came presently with a power both of horse and foot from Naples: which Barbaruffa dis- L courring from fea as they came down the mountains, called back Salec, and leaping the Island of Capri, and passing by the promontory of Atheneum, was about to have seised vpon Salernum; when a tempest suddenly arising dispersed his fleet, and draue him beyond the promontory of Palinurus, vpon the coast of Calabria, where he did exceeding much harm, especially at Carreato. From thence he departed to the Island of Lipari, betwixt Italy and Sicily, which Island he miserably spoiled, and with forty great pieces so battered the City, that the Citisen's were constrained for fear to yeeld; whom he carried away all prisoners; about the number of seuen thousand of one fort of people and other, and afterwards burnt the City. So loded with the rich spoil of Italy and the Islands upon the coast, hee returned againe towards Constantinople, with such a multitude of poore Christian Captines shut up so close M under hatches among the excrements of Nature, that all the way as they went almost every hour some of them were cast dead ouer boord. Euery man detesting the endlesse hatred betwixt the Emperor and the French King, the very ground of all this and many thousand other most world and undescrued calamities of the poor subjects. With this rich prey, and an infinit number of captines Barbaruffa arrived at Constantinople in the beginning of Autumne. in the year 1544, where hee was honorably received of Solyman, and highly commended for his good feruice both by fea and land.

Solyman triumphing at Constantinople for the good succes he had in Hungary, in the mid-Mahomet Soly. dest of all his glory was advertised of the death of Mahomet his eldest son, whom of all his mans eldest son children he held dearest: whose dead body was shortly after brought from Magnesia, & with wonderful folemnity and no lesse mourning buried at Constantinople. How intirely Soleman loued this his fon, wel appeared by the great forrow he conceived at his death; and not contented to have built him a stately Tomb, he erected also in memorial of him a Mahometane church called the Church of Mohomet the leffer for the difference of Mahomet the great who won Constantinople. Wherto also he anexed a monastery and a colledge, with many things more after the groffe maner of their superstition, for the health of his foul, as he vainly suppofed. After that, Solyman according to his wonted maner, which was but enery fecond or third vear to take in hand some notable expedition, for two years space ceased from wars; in which time many of the great princes and worthy men of that age died, among & whom was Prancis the French King. Hariadenus Barbaruffa that famous Turk of whom we have so often spoken, Barbaruffa end theing a man of great years, and of no lesse same) lest this life in the year of our Lord 1547. and was buried at a house of his own called Besichas, neer to Bosphorus Thracius on Europe side not far from the mouth of Euxinum, about four miles from Pera, where he had but a few years before at one time fould about fixteen thousand Christian captiues taken out of Cor-C evra. And to make famous that place appointed for his buriall, he of his owne cost built a

Mahometan temple there, which with his sepulchre is yet to be seen. That place was in antient time called Ialonium. About which time also died of conceit the famous captain Alphon-Im Davalus Vastism, taken away by vintimely death when he had lived but forty five years. At which time Charles the Emperour by his Embassadour Gerardus Veltunich concluded a Peace with Solyman for five years, wherin King Ferdinand was also included. Which peace was afterwards before the expiration thereof, by Solyman (at the request of Henry the French King) 15 48 broken.

Solyman had now almost three years taken his rest, when infortuned that Ercases Imir Za king of Sirvan, mooued with the often injuries of Tamas his brother the great Persian King, fled D to Solyman at Constantinople to craue aid against his brother. Solyman glad of such an occasion towork you, entertained him with all currefie, and promifed to undertake his quarrel, and to protect him against his vnnatural brother: and when hee had made all things ready for so great an expedition, passed ouer into Asia, and after a long and painfull travell entred at last with a puilsant army into Armenia, and there in the borders of the Persian kingdom first befieged the city of Van, which after ten daies fiege was yeelded into him, upon condition, that the Persian soldiers there in garison might with life and liberty depart with their arms as soldiers: which was at the first by Solyman granted, and so the city surrendred. From thence So. Van yelded to lyman fent his chief Commanders with a great part of his Army to burn and spoil the Ene. the Tarte. mies country: which they for a time cheerfully performed, and running far into the country,

E from as it were among themselves who should do most harm; where Imir Za among the rest (for whom Solyman had undertaken this war) was as forward as the best to wast and spoile his brothers kingdom, sparing nothing that came to hand : the best and richest things he got he presented to Solyman, to draw him on fill in that War. But that served not his turn to recomeragain his kingdome of Sirvan: for Tamas, without shewing any power to withstand the Turks, had after his wonted manner caused his people to withdraw themselves far into the mountain Country, leaving nothing behind them in that wast country to relieve them, but the bare ground : fo that the farther the Turks went, the more they wanted, without hope of better successe than such as they had before to their losse made proof of, in their former expeditions into that great Kingdome. The conceit wherof did not fo much pierce the common fouldiers only, but even the Capraines themselves, that to make an end of that long and vaprofitable war taken in hand for another mans good, they confulted among it themselves either to kil Imirite, or elfe to difgrace him with Selyman. Which thing they so cunningly wrought, fome suggesting false suspitions of his treeherous dealing in the proceeding of that

In this expedition against the Persian king Solyman was occupied a yeare and nine moneths: all which time the Turks endured great troubles, and were often hardly diffressed by the Persians: vntill at last Solyman himself weary of that tedious war, wherin he had got neither honor nor profit, thought it best so to make an end, and the supon returned again to Constantinople H

In the mean time it fortuned that one Dragut Rayles a notable pyrat of the Turks had craft tily surprised the city of Africa in the kingdom of Tunes (called in antient time Aphrodise Trisfattiery uni, and also Leptis Parua, and now of the Moors Mahomedia) and there fetling himself as in taine cities in a place both commodious and of good assurance; exceedingly troubled the Christians both by sea and land, especially such as traded in the Mediterranian. So that the Emperor, mooued as wel with the manifold injuries don by that arch pyrat vpon the frontiers of his dominions, as by the daily complaints of his poore subjects, commaunded the Viceroy of Sicilia. and Auria his admiral, to levy a sufficient power, in time to represse that pyrat before he grow to further firength. Whereupon they with a firong fleet wel manned, and thorowly appoint ted for that purpose, and aided by the Knights of Malta, passed ouer into Africk, and landing their forces; by the space of three moneths befieged the City, before possessed by the pyrate. which with continual battery they had at length made faultable. And hearing that Diagram was comming with a new supply to relieue it, they with al celerity affailed it both by fee and land, and in the space of a few hours took it by force the 10 of September, An. 1536 in which assault many of the enemies were slain, and the rest taken. Auria having thus dispossessed the pyrat, and aduitedly confidering that the city was not without infinit charge to be holden by the Christians, among so many of the infidels, rased it down to the ground, carying away with him 7000 captines, and all the spoil of the city; and not so contented, did all the harme hee could with fire and sword all along so the coast of Africa, to the intent that the Turks should & there find no relief; and took 12 prisoners out of Monasterium, a town not far from the City of Africa and so having don what he came for, returned againe into Sicily. Dragar thus at once thrust out of all he had, with a few of his friends fled to Solyman to Constantinople, and fo infenced him with the grieuous complaint of the wrong don vito him by the Christians, that in revenge therof he refolued to make war both upon the Emperor and King Ferdinand, notwith flanding that the fine yeareb league bee had before taken with him as his going into Persia, was not yet expired. So with bhechull words and curteous entertainment comforting 1551. vp the desperat Pyrat, the Spring following (which was in the year 2551) he furnished him with a great fleet in most warlike manner appointed pro reuenge the injuries done vnto him by Auriain Africk, With this floot, in numbebrato failer Sinan one of the Turks great Bal- L fa's, accompanied with Dragurthopyrar, by the appointment of solyman departed from Constantinople, and curting thorow the scassariued aclond thin Sielly, where they suddenly sur-Malia attemp prifed the cown and callie of Augusta, which they professly facked. Departing thence, they came to the Island of Malta, and there landed their men in the port of Marza, otherwise called Moxet, neer vnto the castle, which they battered with certain great pieces of Ordnance, but so as that it was not to any great purpose. At which timediuers companies of the Turks running farther into the Island, made hauock of whatfoeuer came in their way. After they had thus a few dayes in vaine battered the Caffle; and faw thomselves both there valiantly repulfed, and in other places by ambushes and such like meaties cut off by the fouldiers and inliabitants of the Island, they removed thence to the road of Saint Paul where they landed their M ordnance with purpose to have besieged the city that perceiving by silittle what small hope there was to preuail, and feeing divers of their men dying through the extremity of the hear, they forfook the Island and went to Gautes, now called Goza, a little life about thirty miles in compas, fire miles diftant from Malta Wellward, labie & to the Knights of the Religion ;

That he might command him that was come from the Castle, for that he knew they would now do neuer a what the more for him. So the Baffa turning towards the other Knight; commanded him forthwith to go vnto them in the Castle, and to cause them to come forth swearing again as before, by the head of his great Lord, and his owne, That they n should at be deliuered & fet at liberty, according to the conventions first agreed vpon; which the Knight beleeving, went to report to them this good news; which they received with fuels joy, that without further care or confideration of their mishap so neer, they ran in prease with their wines, children, and best mooneables, strining who should first get out. But they were no fooner iffued, but they were by the enemies spoiled of all that they had, and taken prisoners: part of the Knights were fent to the gallies, and the rest to the Bassa. Who being by the goremour out in remembrance of his faith twice given, answered. That there was no faith to he kept with dogs, and that they had first violated their oath with his great Lord, vnto whom at the giving over of the Rhodes, they had (as he faid) (worn never more to beare armes against the Turks. The Castle was forthwith taken and spoiled, and about two hundred Moores of A that country that had ferued the Knights, cut in pieces, & therupon, a great peale of ordnance discharged: with great cries and shours in fign of their victory. Thus the strong castle and antion: City of Tripolis in Barbary was delivered into the Turks the fifteenth day of August. in the yeare 1551. Whilft the Baffa lay at this fiege, the Lord of Arramont, who had many yeres lien Embaffador from Francis the French King at Constantinople, and was now fent again by Henry the fecond, came to the Turks camp, being requested so to do by the Great master of the Rhodes, to have diffuaded the Baffa from that siege: wherein he nothing prevailed. Yet now grieved to fee how the faithles Turk, contrary to his oth, most villanously intreared the Governour and the other Knights, lying at his feet as men halfe desperat; was so bold as to put him in mind of his promife, confirmed by his oth, which if he would not keep, that yet D at the least according to his own voluntary offer he would release two hundred of them: but The financies he excused himselfe as before, saying, That no faith was to be kept with dogs, which had first faithing Bassa broken their own faith. Yet afterwards he condificended, that two hundred of the eldeft and to the French fuch as were most vusit for service (amongst whom was comprehended the Gouernor and certain other old Knights) should be set at liberty who were forthwith sent abourd the French Embassadors gallies, and by him transported to Malta: where they were but hardly welcom, for that they had so cowardly surrendred a place, which they might much longer have defended. The next day after the castle was delivered, which was the 16 of August, the proud Basfa for iov of his vi & or v made a folemne dinner, whereunto he invited the French Embassador, and Vallier the late Gouernour: which they refused not to come unto, in hope to recover B fomemo prisoners. This great feast for the more magnificence was kept in the Castle ditch against the breach, where were fet up two stately paullions, the one for the Bassa, and the other for the Embassadour and his company, where he was honourably seasted with wonderfull plenty both of flesh and fish and good wines, which they had found in the Castle; which feruice was done with musicke of divers forts, and officers in number above a hundred; apparelled for most part in long gownes of fine cloth of gold, tuffed or fringed; and the other of veluet or damaske. The Bassa was no sooner set down, but all the Ordnance of the sleet was discharged with such a noise and thundring, that it seemed the heavens and skies did shake. The Yurks having in their hands an antient gunner of the Castle, called John de Chabas born in Dolphin (to the end that this triumphant feast should not be unfurnished of some cruell sacrifice of Christian bloud) for that he had in time of the flege (hot off the hand of the clerke generall of the army, brought him into the

towne, and having cut off his hands and his nofe, put him quick into the ground to the waft, G and there for their pleasure shot at him with their arrows & afterward to make an end of him cut his throat. The Baffa shortly after departing out of Barbary, left Dragus the pirat Gouernor of Tripolis, honoring him with the title of Sanzack of that place; from whence he many years after grieuously molested the Moors neer unto him by land, and the Christians by sea. The same year 1551, Solyman notwithstanding the fine years peace before taken with K. Fer. dinand, at his going into Persia, sent Achomates his Lieutenant in Europe with a great Army into Hungary, who with Haly the Bassa of Buda inuaded the voper Hungary, and first tooke Transfers and the city of Temesware, and contrary to their faith given, flew the garrison foldiers. After that they took also the castle of Zolnoc, for faken by the Christians, and certain other small Cafiles. But laying fiege to Ersam, they were partly by the valor of the defendants, and partly by H the comming on of winter inforced to forfake the fiege, and to get themselves into their wintring places.

Queen Ifabel, King Iohns widow, feeing the Turks daily incroching upon that little they had left her, and that the was not able by any means to defend Transyluania against them, by the aduice of George Bishop of Veradium her old counsellor, agreed with King Ferdinand to deliuer vnto him the gouernment of the country, with al the royall dignity of Hungary, for which the was to haue of him Cassovia, and a yearly pension of an hundred thousand ducats which agreement made and thorowly concluded by Baptifta Caftaline an Italian (whom Charles the Emperor had but a little before fent to aid King Ferdinand) the Queen returned into Polonia her native country; and fo King Ferdinand by that means obtained almost all the province of I Transyluania, and what els the Queen had in Hungary. Bur the Bishop a little before made a Cardinal, being suspected by Baptista the Italian, that he fauored the Turkes faction more than King Ferdinand, and by that means fought to get the government to himself was by the Italians deuice suddenly murthered in his own house at Veradium : an end good enough for so troublesome a Prejat.

Haly Bassa of Buda proud of the good succes he had the year before, understanding that dimurderediabis uers of the chief Hungarians had withdrawn themselues into the castle of Agria, purposed in himself with all his power to besiege it, and there to take them. So aided by Achomates, Cha. fan, and other of the Turks Sanzacks and captains, by Solymans appointment ready at his call, he came with an army of 35000 Turks, and the 100f September, An. 1552, incamped round g about the castle: where after he had placed his artillery he began a most furious battery. But Legis befored doubting to preuail that way, he attempted also to undermine the Castle, omitting nothing that could be deuised for the taking therof. But all invain ; for the Hungarians by the good direction of Stephanus Dobus their Captain, couragiously indured the siege, and very manfully repulsed the enemy. At length the 29 of September, the enemy with 28 ensignes of select soldiers gaue a fresh assault to the castle, and were by the defendants inforced shamefully to retyre: at this time 24 barrels of gunpouder by mischance got fire, and besides that it blew vp divers captains and fouldiers, did much harm in the Castle, to the great dismaying of the defendants. After that, the Turks with incredible pertinacy the 12 of October fiercely affaulted the castle from morning vntil night, and for defire of revenge and hope of spoile lest no- L thing vnattempted for the gaining of the place, but were by the greater valor of the Hungarians bearen back, and with great loffe inforced at last to give ouer the assault. Thus the Bassa nothing prevailing by force, attempted by great promifes and large offers to have brought them form. Which he understanding to be nothing regarded, and his letters scornfully burnt, brought on his foldiers again, & gaue vnto them in the castle a most surious assault, but with The Turks time no better success than before; for having lost many of his best souldiers, he was inforced to retyre. So after he had in vain fix weeks befieged the castle, he was glad to raise his siege and retyre to Pesth. After whose departure there was found 12000 great shot wherewith bee had battered the wall. In this fiege 6000 Turks were flain, and of the Hungarians but three hundred. King Ferdinand glad of this victory, made Stephanas the worthy Captaine Vayuod of M Transyluania, and bountifully rewarded the other Captaines and souldiers as they had well

Henry the French king, who together with his kingdome had as it feemed received the bereditary quarels of Francis his father against Charles the Emperor, had by his Embassador the Lord of Aramont fo wrought the matter with Solyman, that the more to trouble the Emperor, be sent a great fleet into the Tyrrhenum or Tuscan sea, which in the yeare 1553, and the yere following did great harme upon the coafts of Calabria, Sicilia, Sardinia, as also in the Islands of Elba, Gorsica, Gerbe, and Majorca and fuch like places on the frontiers of the Emperours dominions:yet were the Turks in most places notably againe repulsed by the people of those Countries. The same yeare Solyman, seduced by Roxolana (sometime his faire Concubine, but then his imperious wife) and Ruffun Buffe his fon in law, most vanaturally murthered his eldest fon Mustapha, the mirrour of the Othoman Family? Which tragicall fact (the like wherof both for the tree herous contriuing and inhumane execution hath feldome times beene heard of) I have thought good here in due time to fet downe, in such fort as it is by most credible Wri-

B ters of that time tenorted. Seleman after the manner of the Othoman Kings (who to sudd the participation of their fonemignty, vie not oftentimes to marry; bitt otherwise to satisfie their pleasure with such beautiful Concubines as it pleaseth them to make choice of out of the fairest captiues of all Nations most daintily brought up for that purpose in the Court) had by a Circassian bondwoman a foncalled Multapha, who for his wonderfull toward lineffe and rate perfection, was among the Multapha, soilthe Turks had in such expectation and admiration, as that they in nothing accounted them-ingreat chimaselves more happy, than in the hope laid up in him withose noble carriage was such, as thereby tion with the Whilest he thus grew, the reasing both in yeares and fauour, it fortuned with Soloman as it doth with mendelighted in change, that he became amorous of Roxolans, of fome Soloman become called Rola (but more truly Hazothya) by condition a capting; but fo graced with beauty and of Rozolana. courtly behaviour, that in thort time the became mistresse of his thoughts, and commandresse of him that all commanded : and that which more established her in possession of his loue. the had in time made him father of foure faire fons, Mahomet, Selymus, Bajazet, and Tzihanger, and one daughter called Chameria married to Rustan or Rustemes the great Bassa. In this height of worldly bliffe nothing troubled her more than the exceeding credit of Multapha, Solymans eldest some by the Circassian woman; who honoured of the greatest, and beloued of the rest, food only in her light, imbarring her and hers (as the thought) of the hope of the Empire,

D which the now about all things fought to bring to one of her owne fons; which the better to compaffe, the vnder the colour of great good will and loue, procured that Mustapha the young Prince and his mother should as it were for their greater honor and state, with a Princely al. Mustapha sine lowance be fent into Caramania to gouerne that great country, far from the Court. Which to gouerne cawas no great matter for her to bring to passe: for that the Turkish Emperours viually send their fons after they come to any yeares of differetion, vnto such provinces as are far from the Court, attended upon with one great Baffa and some grave Doctor of their Law, so to acquaint them with the manner of gouernment; the Baffa instructing them in matters of civile policy, and the Doctor in matters concerning their fuperstition; and yet by fending them a far off, to keepe them from afpiring to the Empire by the fauour of the Court: (a thing of the Turkish E Emperors not unworthily feared even in their owne and beloved children. Roxolana having at once thus cunningly rid the Court of the great competitors both of her love and of the Empire (things of all others enduring no partners) rested not so, but began streightway to plot in her malitious head the vtter destruction of him, to whom all others wished all happi. Beside that, she was not ignorant how that Rustan as one carefull of the Emperours profit (the readiest way to preferment) had abridged the pensions and fees of the officers and servitors in Court: which he perceiuing to please the Emperour, pro-

To begin this intended tragidy, the vpon the sudden became very depout, and being by the ber for in law. 10 Degrin this intended ringing yelles pour in the fault of Solyman growne exceeding rich, pretended as if it had been upon a denout zeale for the health of her foule, after the maner of their Turkish superstition, to build an Abbey, with an Hospitall and a Church: which so godly a purpose she imparted to the Muphti or chiefe an Holpitali and a Church: which is goody a purposed and were not acceptable into God, H and auaileable for her foules health. Wherunto the Muphti answered, That those workes were no doubt gratious in the fight of God, but nothing at all meritorious for her foules health, being a bondwoman, yet very profitable for the foule of the great Emperor selyman, vn. to whom as vnto her Lord, both the and all the had appertained. With which answer of the great Priest she seemed to be exceedingly troubled, and thereupon became wonderfull penfive and melancholy, her cheerefull countenance was repleatwith ladgeffe, and her faire cies flowed with teares, her mirth was mourning, and her joy heavinefle. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, and forry to see his loue vpon conceit so to languish, sent her word to be of good cheere, and to comfort her felfe; promiting in thort time to take fuch a course as should ease Solyman manus her of all her griefes: which he forthwith did, folemnly manumifing her from her bond effate, So great a fauour obtained, Raxelana with great cheerefulneffe began those meritorious works by her before intended, as if the had thought of nothing but heaven, whereas indeed her thought were in the depth of hell. When the had thus a good while bufied her felfe in paning the way to heaven, as was supposed; Solyman not able longer to forbeare the company of her, in whom his foule lived, after his wonted manner fent for her by one of his Eunuchs, who should have brought her to his bed-chamber. To whom she with her eies cast vp to heaven, demurely answered, that her life and what socuer else she had was at her dread Soueraignes command, but againe to yeeld her body unto his appetite the might not in any case do, without the great offence of the high God, and manifest breach of his sacred Lawes, which permitted her now voluntarily to yeeld him that, being free, which he before without offence might K command of his bond-woman : and because she would not seeme to vie this as an excuse, she referred her selfe in all things to the grave judgment of the learned and reverend Muphti, with whom the had before at full conferred. This the did, prefuming of the four eignty the had ouer that great Monarch, whom the right well knew the had to fast bound in the pleating fetters of his affection towards her, as that the was fure enough of him without a keeper. Solyman rauished with her loue, and well the more for her deniall, sent for the Muphti, requiring his judgement in the matter: who before instructed in all points, agreed with that Roxolana had faid, aggrauating the hainousnesse of the fact, if he should proceed to enforce her as his Solyman mer- flaue, who being now free, he might not without great offence touch vnmarried. Whereupon sith Koxolana Solyman more and more burning in his defires, became a fresh suter to her for marriage, whom I he had sooften before commanded : which his sute easily obtained, (as the marke she had all this while aimed at) he with all speed to the great admiration of all men, and contrary to the manners of the Mahometan Emperours, folemnly married her, appointing for her yearely dowry fine thousand Sultanyns. But here before we proceed any further, stay a while, and take the view of that faire face whereon this great Monarch fo much doted, as it is by the skilfull workemans hand most lively expressed."

To fairest looks trust not too farre, nor yet to beauty braue: For hatefull thoughts fo finely maskt, their deadly poyfon haue. Loues charmed cups the fubrill dame doth to her husband fill; and caufeth him with cruell hand his childrens bloud to spill.

This woman of late a flaue, but now become the greatest Empresse, of the East, flowing in Roscolane plasall worldly felicity, attended upon with all the pleasures her heart could desire, wanted nostandard floor F Solyman be brought to forme one of her own fons. This was it that had (as is before faid) long troubled her afpiring mind, and in the midft of all her bliffe, fuffered her yet to take no reft. Noble Muffapha, Solymans eldest sonne, and heire apparant of the Empire, although far absent, was yet still before her eies present; his credit, his valour, his vertues, his persections were all bars to her defires: he was the only cloud that kept the funne from thining upon her; if he by any means might be taken away, then wanted nothing that she desired. Which to bring to G paffe, the wicked woman laboured cunningly by little and little to breed in Solymans head no finall suspition of Mustapha, That he being a yong man of a hauty spirit, desirous of Soucreignty, generally beloued, and swelling with the immoderat fauour of the men of war, which were all at his deuotion, left nothing elfe to be expected from him, but when he should (as did his grandsier Selymus) lay hand upon the Empire, and worke his aged fathers destruction. This mischieuous plot by her deuised, was not a little furthred by Rassan the great Bassa, by whom passed all great matters: who nothing omitted that could be slily deutled for the disgrace or confusion of the yong Prince. For he as a great secret, crastily told all them that were sent gouernors into Syria, that Mustapha was secretly suspected by his father, of aspiring to the Em. pire, and therefore charged them particularly, carefully to observe all his actions, with the H manner of his life and gouernment, and by their letters diligently to advertise him of whatfoeuer they should see or heare, bearing them in hand, that the more suspiciously or odiously they should write of him, the more gratious & acceptable it would be vato the great Sultan. Wherfore he by these men oftentimes certified of the princely disposition, courage, wildom, valour and bounty of Mustapha, whereby he had won all mens hearts, doubted that he would at length be preferred to the Empire : yet durft he not for all that adventure to temper with Soly. man about that detestible conspiracy against the innocent Prince, but still delittering the letters to the malitious woman, left the rest by her vngratious head to be wrought. And she still as occasion best served her purpose, ceased not with pleasing allurements and slattery (wherin the was most excellent) to infect Solymans mind, that when focuer he should chance to have any speech of Mustapha, the might take the fitter occasion to bring forth those Letters. Neither was the in her drift deceived, but having found a fit opportunity, with tears trickling downe her checks (which to ferue their turnes subtill women seldome want) the told the Emperor in what danger he flood: recounting among it other things, how Selymus his father had by such means depriued Bajazet his grandfather, both of his life and Empire together : and therefore most instantly belought him, as if it had altogether proceeded of a carefull loue, by that example warned, to looke to himselfe. But these light arguments of suspition seemed as they were indeed, vnto Solyman scarce probable, so that the little prevailed thereby. Which thing the well perceiving, and inwardly grieving thereat, converted her cruell mind to other michieuous deuices, and fought by all means how to poison the young Prince: neither wanted there K wicked men, as it were vowed to all kinde of mischiese and villany, ready to have performed what she desired, had not Gods providence withstood so horrrible a practife. For whereas Malapha in Certaine rich apparell was by her fent unto him in his fathers name, he fearing the worlf, would danger to baue not touch it before he had caused it tobe worne by one of his servants : by which curious warinesse (as it was thought) he for that time prevented the treason of his wicked stepdame, and made her malitious practife manifest to the world. Yet rested she not so, but was still plotting new deutees, tending all to one purpole for being growne to that height of honour and power as neuer was woman in the Othoman court, and by the means of Trongilla a Iew (as it was thought) having bewitched the mind of the Turkish Emperor, she still grew more and more in favor, and obtained that her fons might by turnes be still present in Court : of purpose, that L by their daily presence and continual flattery, they should more and more procure their fathers love; and if by chance Muftapha should come thither; she might have the better means to dispatch him; if not, to expect some other sie time, when the might by some one or other meane take him away. But Maffapha neuer comming (for why, the! Emperours fons vie not without their fathers leave to go out of the provinces affigued vuto them, on to come to Constantinople, but after the death of their father to receive the Empire, attended upon with a number of fouldiers) the eafily devised another practife, that her fons should wait upon their father, not in the city only, but in the Provinces alfo; fo that Taihanger, Jurnamed Cronchbacks, alwaies followed his father in the campe. Containe yeres thus frent, and the still hammering her mischieuous deuices; at length fortune sauouring herwicked desite, got from the Balls which had the government of Multapha and the province of Amalia (for as we have faid, evety one of the Kings fons hath with him one Baffa, which is as it were him licutenant in administration of justice and martial affaires) certain suspicious letters, whering as contained, that there was a speech of a marriage to be made betweene My flapha and the Persian Kings daugh-

A ter; which thing he thought good to give knowledge of to the Counfell, that if any harme should enfue therof, he might be out of all suspition. These letters being brought to Rustan, he shought he had now as good as halfe brought to passe the long desired ruin of Mastapha fo making no flay, he opened the matter to Roxolana; & afterwards both together went to the court. and declared all the matter to the Emperor: in doing wherof, they forced both their vngratious wits to fill his head, yet doubtfull, with suspition, and to possesse his mind with the scare of his own most durifull fon: saying, That he as a proud and ambitious young man, ravished Rezelana and with the defite of fog lorious an empire, fought against the laws both of God & nature, to take put soliman in his father out of the way, that so he might with more speed satisfie his aspiring mind. And to state of hu son give the more credit to this their most false suggestion, they warned him of the alliance by Multapla B him purposed with the Persian king the antient enemy of the Othoman Emperors: withing him to beware left Mustapha supported by the strength of Persia, and the sauor of the Sanzacks and Janizaries, whole loue he had by bounty purchased, thould in short time when he seared least, together depriue him both of his life and Empire. With these and such like accusations they fo prevailed with the aged man, whom they never fuffered to rest in quiet, that he at length refolued toworke his fafety (as he supposed) by the death of his owne some; in this fort: In the yeare 1552 he caused proclamation to be made almost in all the prouinces of his

Empire, That forasmuch as the Portians without resistance with a great army inuaded Syria. burning and destroying the country before them, he to represse that their outragious infolence, was inforced to fend thither Rustan Bassas with an army: which according to his appointRustan Bassas

C mentwas in front time raised. Now when all things were in readinesses if it had beene for with an army fuch a war as was pretended, he commanded Ruftan, with as much fecreey and as little tumult to take Muas was possible to lay hands upon Mustapha, and to bring him bound to Constantinople which

if he could not conveniently effect then by any other means to take him our of the way. With this wicked and cruell charge Rustan with a strong army marched towards Syria : Mustapha vnderstanding of his comming, without delay with 7000 of the best horsemen in all Turky made towards Syria alfo: whereof Rustan hearing, and perceiuing that he could not (as he defired) conveniently execute the cruell command of the vnnatural father, forthwith turned his backe, and treading the same steps he came, returned with his army to Constantinople with such speed, that he endured not to behold the very dust raised by Mustaphas horsemen, D much lesse his presence squiring it out, That he certainly understood that the province was in quiet, (as indeed it was) and that he thereupon returned. But vnto Solyman he told another tale in fectet, which he malitiously had denifed, That he by most apparant signes and manifest prefumptions had perceined the whole army fo inclined towards Mustapha, that if he should have flame attempted any thing against him by plaine force, he should have bin vtterly forsaken, and had therefore in so dangerous a case lest the matter as it was to his graue surther direction. This tale suspiciously told, raised in the wicked and vonatural sather (nothing degenerating from the naturall cruelty of his ancestors) new and great suspitions, whereof to disburden his difquiered mind, he conceived with himselse a most horrible device. Wherfore the yere following, which was the yeare 1553, he raised a great army; giving it out, That the Persians had E with greater power than before inuaded Syria, and that therefore he for the lone of his Country, and desence of his Empire, was determined to go thither with his army, and in person himselfe to represse the attempt of his enemies. Whereore the army being assembled, & all things solyman gents necessary orderly provided, he commanded to set forward, and in sew daies after followed an army to his himselse who comming at length into Syria, presently by trusty messengers commanded Mu- bu sonne. flapha to come unto him at Aleppo, for there he lay incamped. And yet for all these shadowes, He sendub for the matter was not so closely by Solyman conucied (although he was exceedingly carefull ther. Mastapha, of)but that his mortall and deadly hatred against his son was perceived by the Bassa's, & other great men about him: infomuch that Achmat Baffa by a fecret and trufty messenger gaue him warning thereof, that so he might in time the better provide for the sascgard of his life. Nei-F ther could Mustapha himselfe but maruell, that his aged father without any apparant reason should come for far with fo great an army syst trusting to his owne innocency, though woh-Mullagha perderfully troubled and perplexed in mind, he refolued (although it were with the extreme danger of his life) to obey and yeeld to his fathers command: for he thought it more commenda-

difloyalty. In so great a perplexity of mind, after he had with himselfe much discoursed too G and fro, what courie he were best to take, at length he boldly and resolutely asked the Doctor his take with whom (as we have before faid) he had alwaies with him in his court, Whether the Empire of the World, or a bleffed lifewere of man more to be defired? To whom the doctor frankly answered, That the Empire of the World, to him that would enter into the due consideration thereof, brought with it no felicity, more than a vaine flow and outer appearance of good, ao. thing being more fraile or vacertaine than worldly honor, bringing with it feare, veration of mind, tribulation, suspition, murder, wrong, wickednesse, spoile, ruin, and captiuity, with infinit mischieses of like nature, not to be desired of him that would attaine to true selicity, by which meanes the bleffed life was to be loft and not gained : But they with whom God had given the grace rightly to confider and weigh the fragility and shortnesse of this our estate (which H the common fort deemeth to be the only life) and to striue against the vanities of this World, and to embrace and follow an vpright kind of life, had vndoubtedly a place affigned for them in heaven and prepared by the great God, where they should at length enjoy life and blisse eternal!. This answer of the great doctor wonderfully satisfied the troubled mind of the yong Prince, foreseeing as it were the approch of his owne end and so staying not any longer difrulapha com- Course, sorthwith set forwards toward his father, and making great hast, came at length to his neith to hu fa- fathers campe, and not far off pitched his tents in the open field a But this his fo hafty comming the more increased the suspicion in the mind of his wicked sather:neither spared Russan in the meane time with his crafty and subtile denifes to augment the same : for by a signe giuen he caufed the Ianizaries and chiefe men in the army to go as if it had bin for honors fake to meet Mustapha; which they all without delay presently did at his command, and so all together set sorward. In the meane time he the most crafty varlet, with troubled countenance (for he could notably diffemble) as a man halfe difmaied came in hafte into Selymans paulion, and falfly told him, That the Ianizaries and almost all the best fouldiers of the army were of themselves without leave gon to meet Mustapha, and that he seared what would ensue thereof. Which news fo troubled the old tyrant, that he became pale for feare, and going out of his tent, and finding them gone, easily beleeued all to be true that the salse Bassa had told him. Neither wanted Mustapha strange warning of his end so necreat hand, for the third day before The melancholy his fetting forwards toward his father, falling afleepe in the evening, he thought he faw his diame of Mu. Prophet Mahomet in bright apparell to take him by the hand and lead him into a most pleaming to bis fa- fant place, beautified with most glorious and stately palaces, and most delicat & pleasant gardens, and pointing to enery thing with his finger, to fay thus vnto him, Here reft they for euer, which in this World have led an upright and godly life, following vertue, and detelling vice : and after that turning his face to the other fide, to have shewed him two great and swift rivers, whereof the one boiled with water blacker than pitch, and in them appeared (as he thought) numbers of men wallowing and tumbling, some vp, some downe, crying horribly for mercy: And there (faid he) are punished all such as in this fraile life have bin the malicious workers of iniquity: the chiefe of whom (as he faid) were Emperors, Kings, Princes, and other great men of the world. Mustapha awaking, and troubled with this melancholy dreame, called vnto him his doctor: and hauing told him all the matter, asked him what the same might signifie? who standing a great L while in a muse (for the Mahometans are exceeding superstitious, attributing much to dreams) full of forrow and griefe at length answered, That this vision (for fo it pleased him to terme it) was vindoubtedly to be feared, as prefaging vinto him the extreame perill of his life, and therefore requested him to have great care both of his life and honor. But Mustapha as he was of a notable spirit and courage, regarding nothing that answer, stoutly replied, What, shall I suffer my selfe to be terrified and ouercome with childish and vain seares why rather haste I not couragiously and resolutely to my father? and so much the more boldly, because I know assuredly I have alwaies (as reason was) so reverenced his Majesty, that against his wil I never turned my cies or foot against his most royall seat, much lesse affected his Empire, except the most high God had called him to a better life, neither then, without the general good liking & choice of M the whole army, that fo I might at length without murder, without bloud, without tyranny, well & justly reigne, and in loue and peace inviolate live with my brethrenifor I have set down with my felie, and chosen, if it be my fathers pleasure so, rather to die in his obedience, than reigning many yeares, to be reputed of all men, especially my competitors, a rebell or traitor.

A Hauing thus faid, he came vnto his fathers camp, & pitching his tents (as we have before faid) forted himselfe all in white, in token of his innocency, and writing certaine letters (which the Eurks when they are about togo to any place of danger, vie to write, and alwaies to carry with them, for they are wonderfull foolish in their superstition) and purting them in his bosome. atrended upon with a few of his most trusty followers, came with great reverence towards the cont of his father, fully refolued to have kiffed his hand, as their vivall manner is, But when he Maffapha comwas come to the entrance of his terit, remembring that he had yet his dagger girt to him, he there the intreduct vnrill he had pur it off; because he would not come into his fathers sight with any weapon, if happily to he might cleare himfelfe of his fathers needleffe fuspition. So when he was come into the more inward roomes of the tent, he was with fuch honour as belonged B to his flated cheerfully received by his fathers Eunuchs. But feeing nothing elfe provided but one feat whereon to fit himselfe alone, he perplexed in mind, stood still a while musing; at length asked where the Emperor his father was? Whereunto they answered, That he should by and by fee him: and with that casting his cie aside, he saw seuen Muts (these are strong men bereft of their speech, whom the Turkish tyrants have alwaies in readinesse, the more secretly to execute their bloudy but chery) comming from the other fide of the rent towards him; at whose fight strucken with a sudden terrour, faid no more, but, Long death; and with that, arifing was about to have fled that in vaine, for he was caught hold on by the cumuchs and Muts. Multasha melt and by force drawn to the place appointed for his death: where without further stay, the Muts cast a bow-string about his necke, he poore wretch stil striuing, and requesting that he might there sight. C speake but two words to his father before he died. All which the murtherer (for no addition is fufficient fignificantly to expresse his vnnaturall villany) both heard and saw by a trauers from the other fide of the tent; but was fo far from being moved with compassion, that thinking it long till he were dispatched, with a most terrible and cruell voice he rated the villains enured to bloud; faying, Will you never diffatch that I bid you? well you never make an end of this traitor, for whom I have not refled one night thefeten yeares in quiet? Which horrible commanding speeches, yet thundering in their eares, those butcherly Muts threw the poore innocent Prince upon the ground and with the helpe of the Eunuches forcecibly drawing the knotted bow string both waies, by the commandement of a monwicked father frangled him. With like barbarous cruelty, he shortly after caused Mahomet his nephew (Mustapha his sonne) to be strangled Mahomet Ma. This vanaturall and strange murther committed, he presently commanded the Bassa of Amasia Mustapha's Licutenant to be apprehended, and his head in his owne presence to be strucke off. Which done, he fent for Tzihanger the Crooked, yet ignorant of all that was happened; and in fporting wife, as if he had done a thing worth commendations, bid him go meet his brother Mustapha: which thing Tzihanger with a merry and cheerefull countenance hafted to doe, as one glad of his prothers comming. But as soone as he came vnto the place where he faw his brothef lying dead upon the ground strangled, it is not to be spoken how he was in minde tormented. He was scarcely come to the place where this detestible murther was committed, when his father fent vnto him certaine of his servants to offer vnto him all solyman officer E Mustapha's treasure, horses, servants, jewels, tents, and withall the government of the Province as Mustapha's of Amasia, but Tzibanger filled with extreame heavinesse for the vnmercifull death of his reasure and welbeloued brother, spake vnto them in this fort: Ab wicked and ungodly Caine, traitor (I may wealth not say father) take thou now the treasures, the horses, the servants, the jewels, and the Province of Mu-Stapha. How came it into thy wicked, cruell, and faunge breaft, so ungratiously and contrary to all humanity, I will not say the reuerence of thine owne bloud, to kill thy worthy, warlike, and noble sonne, the mirrour of courtefie, and Prince of greatest hope, the like of whom, the Othoman family neuer yet had, nor ever shall? I will therefore my selfe provide that thou, nor none for thee shall ever hereafter in such fort shamefully triumph ouer a poore crooked wretch. And having thus much faid, stab'd himselfer Tribanger for with his owned agger into the body, whereof he in fort time died: Which so soone as it bimselfe. F came to the old Tigers eares, it is hard to fay how much he grieued. His dead body was by his fathers commandement carried from Aleppo in Syria, to Constantinople, and after-

dy, his couetous minde was not so troubled, but that he could forthwith command all eMustreasures and riches to be brought to his tent: which his souldiers in hope to have the same given them for a prey, willingly hasted to performe. In the meane time the souldit G ers which were in Mustapha's campe, not knowing what was become of their master, seeing fuch a multitude of foldiers thrusting into their campe without allorder, to represse their ita. multuous infolency, stept out in their armour, and notably repulsed them, not without much bloudshed.

tren from it to wit a difference . Lynn At length, the noise of this stir was heard by the rest of the Kings fouldiers, who seeing the tumult to increase more and more ran in to helpe their fellowes: forthacin short time therebe. gan a hot skirmith and cruell fight on both fides, infomuch that two thousand were flaine and mo wounded : neither had the broile fo ended, had not Achomat Buffa a gratte captainciand for his long experience of no finall authority among ft the fouldiers, kept backe the lanizaries and flaied their fury; and turning likewife to Maffaphd's fouldiers, by gentle and mild words and The tomult ap- courteous persuations, in this manner appealed their rage. What my brethren (faid he) will gas now (degenerating from your antient loyalty, for which you handbeene for fo many ages commended) in puone the command of the great Sultan our dread Sourraigne ? Truely I cannot sufficiently maruel who thing should move you whom I have bitherto proped to have beene most worthy and valiant souldiers, in this civill conflict to draw those weapons against your fellowas and brethren, which you have most fortumilly wied against the the enemies of the Othornan Kings : except you meane thereby to make your felues a joyfull feet acle unto your enemies, who gricing to fee themfelues overcome by your victorious weapons, may yet rejoyce among themselves to see you turne the fame one upon another. Wherefore my Connes, for your antient honours fake, be carefull that you do not by this your infolency lofe the reputation of your wifedome, loyalty, and valour; for which you have hitherto beene above all others commended; refernethele your weapons which you have now too too much weed among your fellowes, against your enemies, of whom you may get more praise and honour. This speech of the old Bassa, so millisted the flout fouldiers, that they freely permitted all that was in Mustapha's tents to be carried to Selyman: but as soone as the death of Mustapha was blowne into the caresof the Ianizaries and the rest of the army in Solymans campe, another tumult rose among them worse than the first. the tanizaries They were quickly all vp in armes againe, and with a great noise confused with teares and laselyman inentation, as they were in rage and fury, brake violently into Solymans pauillion with their for the warmer- drawne swords; which strucke the tyrant into such a seare, that destitute of all counsell in himselfe, he was about with the extreame perill of his life to have fled ; but being holden by by his friends, and making a vertue of necessity, vpon the sudden aduentured to do that which K at better leifure he would fearcely have thought vpon : for going forth out of his tent, but The flour fleeth with a pale and wan countenance, he spake vnto the enraged fouldiers thus : What broile is this? of Colyman to what flurre : what so great infolency? what meane your instanted, sierce and angry lookes? know you not your Soutraigne? and him that hath power to command you? Have you to resolved to staine the antient and inuincible honour of your felues and your ancestours, with the bloud of your Lord and Emperour? The freee an. Whilest he was yet thus speaking, the souldiers boldly answered, That they denied not, but that he was the man whom they had many yeares before chosen for their Emperor: but in that they had by their owne valour got for him a large and mighty Empire, and in like manner preferued it; that was therefore of them done, that he should for the same gouerne them vertuoufly and justly, and not to lay his bloudy hands without discretion vponeuery just man, and L most wickedly embrue himselse with innocent bloud; and that they came thither armed, they did it (as they faid) moued with just cause to revenge the voworthy death of guiltlesse Mustapha, and that for that matter, he had no just cause to be angry with them. Wherefore they required, that they might publikely cleere themselues of the treason whereof they were accused by Mustapha's enemies, and that the accuser might be brought forth to justifie his accusation: protesting that they would neuer lay downe their weapons, vntill the accuser made his appearance in judgement, and commenced his accusation judicially, upon paine to endure the like punishment if he failed in proofe. Whilest these things were in doing, the hainousnesse of the late committed fact caused euery man to shed teares, so that Solyman himselfe seemed to be forry for the murther so lately by himselse committed : wherefore he promised vnto the soul- M diers what socuer they required, and did what he could to appeale their angry minds. For all that, they in the meane time, left he should craftily slip away and deceive them of that he had promifed, and of the expectation of fuch things as they had required, with a maruellous care and diligence all kept watch and ward.

Solyman

Solyman to appeale this fury of the Ianizaries, deprived Rustan Bassa of all his honours, and Rustan diferatooke from him his scale whereof he had the keeping, and deliuered it to Achomates Bassa. But freth to con-Ruffan worthily strucken with feare and horrour, seeing himselfe now in no safety in his owne flatinoste. tents, fled fecretly to Achomates, asking his counfell what were best for him to do, and what courie to take in so doubtfull and dangerous a case? To whom the Bassa answered, that it were best for him to yse the great Emperors aduise, and to do what he commanded. Which answer well fatisfied Ruftan: and so he which of late gaue other men accesse vnto the Emperour at his pleasure, was now glad by his old acquaintance and friends to prefer this poore sute, To know his pleasure what he would have him to do : from whom he received this answer. That he thould incontinently without further delay get him out of his fight, and out of the campe: B which the Baffa faid he could not conveniently do, being by his displeasure and the souldiers rage disfurnished of all things necessary for his departure. Whereunto Solyman sent him anfwer againe, That he could give him neither longer time nor delay, and that it were best for him without more ado to be gon for feare of further harme. Whereupon Rustan, guilty in conscience of most horrible villany and treachery, accompanied but with eight of his most faithfull friends in stead of his late world of followers, posted in hast to Constantinople, and there (not without danger of his head) with Roxolana and other the complices and contriners of the treason against Mustapha, in great seare expected the event of his fortune. This young Prince Mustapha thus shamefully murthered by his own father, was for his rare vertues generally beloued of the Turks : but of the fouldiers most for his martiall disposition. C and readines for the effusion of Christian bloud. The opinion they had conceived of him was fuch and their love to great, that they never thought there was any in the Othoman family, of whom they expected to much for the enlarging of their Empire infomuch, that ever fince, when in their privat or publike actions they faile of any great hope, they vie this proverbe guen at this day taken from him, Gietti Sultan Mustapha, Sultan Mustapha is dead: as who should fay, our hope is all loft, Achomates Baffa the great champion of the Turks, a man of exceeding contage, not ignorant of the small affurance of the great honors of that state, at such time as he received the seale from Solyman, boldly told him, That as he did then frankly bestow it voon him, to he would at one time or other to his no leffe diffrace take it from him to whom Solyman solemnly promised with an oath, not to displace him so long as he lived. For all that, he D had not long enjoyed that honor, but that Solyman falling in diflike with him, & willing again to promote Ruftan Baffa to that great honour, greater than which there was none in the Turks court, which by reason of his oath he could not do so long as Achemates lived; To save his oath, and to prefer his fon in law (whom he had indeed displaced only to please the tumultuous Ianizaries) resolued to have Achomates put to death. Of which his purpose Achomates alto. The miserable gether ignorant, and one morning after his wonted manner comming into the Divano in all end of Acto his honour, vpon the fudden received word from Solyman, that he must presently die, and forthwith was the hangman ready to have strangled him, as was given him in charge: whom the flout Baffa thrust from him with his hand, with countenance and cheere in shew no more troubled than if the matter had nothing concerned him. And looking a good while round about him, espied at last an honest man whom he had many times before pleasured, whom he most carnelly requested for all the kindnesse shewed vnto him, to do him that last fauor as to strangle him with his owne hand, which should be vnto him the greatest good turne that he could possibly deuise, detesting nothing more than to die under the hand of the executioner. Which thing, when he after much intreaty had undertaken to performe, Achomates willed him, that he should not at one twich strangle him out right, but letting the bow. String slacke againe, give him leave once to breath, and then to dispatch him : which is request was by his friend accordingly performed, and he in that fort strangled : wherein it seemeth that he was desirous, first to talk of death, and not to die all at once. Immediatly after whose death, Rustan Bassa was again restored to his place of chiefe Visier, and had the great seale deliuered vnto him: which honour he enjoyed about fix yeares after, and so at last died of the dropsie. This was the end of these two great Bassacs Achamates and Rustan, who in that time swaied that great Empire, vnder Solyman, and of whom we have to much fooken, It is reported, that Solyman having appointed Achemates to die, should say, It is better for his great heart once to die, than to die a thoufand times, in feeing his honour taken from him and bestowed vpon another.

The Turks gallies by the folicitation of the French before brought down into the Tufcan G fea, did much hame vpon the coafts of Calabria and Sicilia in this yeare 1554; as they had the yeare before, and fo did divers yeares after. At which time also Pandulphus Comarenue the Ve. netian Admirall scouring alongst the seas, carefully looking to the frontiers of the Venetian estate, chanced to meet with the Bassa of Callipolis, who in the yeare before had risled certaine Venetian Merchants, in reuenge of which injury he fer vpon him, and after a great spoile made both of the Turks and their gallies, he ranfacked Dirrachium then one of the Turks port townes in Dalmatia. 1555

The next yeare 1555, the same Bassa recoursed his strength, but not daring to be too buse with the Venetians, surprised the Islands of Blumbis and Elba, subject to the Duke of Flo. rence, and withall fent letters to Solyman, to perfuade him to take vp armes against the Veneti- H ans, as they which had broken the league.

At the same time, Haly the Bassa of Buda by policy surprised the strong castle of Baboza, in Hungary : and was in good hope by the like finenesse to have taken the Towne and Castle of 1 5 5 6 Zigesh, a place of great importance : but failing of his purpose, he came the next yeare 1556, zigeth besieged with a great army, and the thirteenth day of June incamped before the towne, wherein was by the Balfa of Gouernor Marcus Horwath a valiant Captaine, with a garrifon of notable fouldiers. Shortly after he began a most terrible battery : during which time the Christians fallying out divers times, flew many of his men; who for all that vied fuch diligence, that the twentieth of lune they won the outcomost wall, and after fine hot assaults were in hope at the sixt to hanewon the castle also : but the Christians perceiuing the danger, resolutely sallied out, and having flaine eight hundred of them, draue the rest againe from the wall. Yet the Turks gane it not fo ouer, but with a great number of carts labored to have filled up the marrish and ditches about the towne : which their attempt was by the industry of the defendants also deseated. The Basila perceiving how hardly the towns would be won by force, attempted to have persuaded them to have yeelded it vpby composition but failing therein of his purpose, began againe the twelfth of July to affault the city, which affault he maintained flue daies together without intermission, still sending in fresh men in stead of them that were wearied or slaine: yet greeth metably was the city for all that by the valour of the Christians notably defended. So when he had in vaine proued the vttermost of his forces, he raised his siege the one and twentieth day of July and departed : but within fix daies after, he returned from the city Quinque Ecclefia, and af. K faulted the city aftelh; but was at length glad to give over the fiege and be gone, when he had lost of his best fouldiers aboue two thousand, and of the defendants staine but an hundred and twenty. After his departure there was ten thousand great shot found, wherewith he had battered the towns and the castle, which was for this time thus worthily defended. The Turks in the meane time after their wonted manner ceased not to do what harme they could in the Tuscane sea, and had again miserably spoiled the Island of Corsica: for with standing of whom the Bishop of Rome exacted of his people a great subsidue; and finely stript the lewes of their mony, and seased upon their rich Merchants goods in his territory. At whose earnest sute Solyman in their behalfe writ vntothe Bishop as followeth:

Haly Falla gricued with the late repulse he had received at Zigeth, came agains the next veare, and befieged it, at which time king Ferdinand fent Nicholaus Polmiler and the county Serinus with a power raised in Sueuia and Austria, to recouer Baboza, a castle betwixt Sigeth and Stiria, before surprised by the Turkes : of whose comming the Bassa having intelligence. rose with his army and departed from Sigeth, which he had for certaine moneths hardly befieged, and not far from Baboza met with Polwiler and Serinus; who joyning battell with him. after a hard and sharpe fight ouerthrew him and put him to flight. This victory with the com. Haly Baffa ming downe of young Ferdinand, King Ferdinands fonne, Archduke of Austria with new funplies, fo terrified the Turks in that part of Hungary along the river Dranus, that they for feare forfooke Babofa, Sammartin, San-Laurence, and divers other small castles which they had before taken, and fled to Quinque Ecclefiæ. The Gouernour of Sigeth encouraged herewith, fallying out with his garrison, slew many of the Turks in their flight towards Quinque Ecclesiae, and meeting by chance with a troupe of horsemen which were bringing the Turks pay, ouerthrew them, tooke the mony, and so with an exceeding rich prey returned to his castle. At which time also Adam the Gouernour of Rab, otherwise called lauarinum, having burnt the suburbs of Alba-Regalis, and driven away many thousands of cattell, at a towne called Sian ouerthrew five hundred Turks, and as many fugitive Christians, and so with a great prey and little or no losse at all of his men, returned.

Which thing Solyman, offended with the infolency of the Embassadour, refused to doe; yet neuerthelesse commanded his adventurers all alongst the coast of Affricke, to infest those seas, and to do what harme they could vpon the coast of Italy and Sicilia, which they so diligently performed, that the Viceroy of Sicilia was faine for defence of those countries to lie in readinesse with his gallies in the ports of Caieta and Naples.

In the meane time the Guise, Lord Grand Prior of the Knights of S. Johns in France (and The Guise, Lord D brother of Francis the Duke of Guife, Generall of the French Kings army in Italy, who vpon France, Admithe ouerthrow received at S. Quintins, called out of Italy, shortly after tooke Calais) Admi. vall of Malla, the ouetthrow received at 5. Quintins, carled out of traff, finding after tooke Calais, radial rall of the gallies of Malta, went out towards the Baft with four gallies well appointed, to lie fatth training the Tayler in wait for the Turks, and by fortune met with two great thips laded with the Turks merchandife, which he tooke; and by and by after, light vpon foure of the Turks gallies, with whom he had a great fight: yet at length having funke one of them and burnt another, he tooke the other two. After which victory returning towards Malta to have repaired his gallies and cured his wounded men, he was met with foure other great gallies of the Turks: who defirous to reuenge the losse of their fellowes, set upon him, and he seeing now no remedy, but that he must needs fight couragiously, encountred them. But for a smuch as he had in the two fights before lost some of his men, and 72 of the Knights in the gallies lay sore wounded, he, by the counsell of the captaines retired towards Malta: but by the way one of his gallies was taken by the Turks, with 52 knights of the Order: yet with the rest and the prizes before taken, he recovered the Island of Malta, where he staied that Winter; and the next Spring sailed into France to be pertakers of those troubles, which beginning shortly after, have but of late taken of body and disposition of mind, as if they had not bin of the same kindred and line. Selymus G the elder brother most like vnto his mother, was in the secret determination of the aged Emperor his father appointed heire of that most mighty empire. Bajazer much resembling his fa. ther, was on the other fide strongly supported by the care and entire lone of his mother which whether it proceeded of a fecret commiseration of his ineuitable destiny, or that he had by lovalty or other means so won her fauor, is not knowne; but every man faw, that if it had lien in her power, the would vindoubtedly have preferred him before his elde to brother Selymus, and have placed him in the Empire : but the must needs give way to her old husbands will, fitmly and irremoucably fet down, that the Destinies so permitting none should reigne after him but his cldest fon Selymus. Of which his purpose and resolution Bajacet being not ignorant, began most circumspe Aly to looke about him, if he could by any means frustrat that forcible neces. H fity, and exchange his certaine destruction with an Empire: in which his deep and dangerous cogitations he was not a little comforted by the fauor & loue of Roxolana his mother, & of Refan the great Bassa his brother in law, who together had in any other matter bin able to have ouerruled the aged Emperor. Whereupon he resolutely set downe himselfe, rather to end his daies by making proofe of his good or bad forsune, than pon the death of his father (which by courie of nature could not now be far off) to be as a facrifice basely butchered by some vile hangman of his brothers. Bajazet fo resolued, and now already fallen out with his brother Selvemu, took occasion voon the generall discontentment of the people and others, for the vnworthy death of Multapha their late joy, to begin those stirs which he had before with himselfe plotted, and so to make a head, wherunto he might afterward joine the body alforforwhy, that I worthy Multapha had left behind him fo great defire of himselfe, that now it wearied many to live after him, they had so placed al the hope of their good fortune in him, they had so placed al the hope of their good fortune in him, they had so placed al the hope of their good fortune in him, they had so placed al the hope of their good for tune in him, they had so placed al the hope of their good for tune in him, they had so placed al the hope of their good for tune in him, they had so placed al the hope of their good for tune in him, they had so placed al the hope of their good for tune in him. was more defirous than to revenge the wrong don unto him, or els to rame he fame hard fortune The crafty dea with him: other some guilty of the immoderar affection they had born white him yet living, and ing of the lap fearing to be called to give an account thereof, thought any flate better and more affared than to deceme the that wherein they presently stood, and therefore sought all occasions of new stirs, and how to fet all on a hurly burly: only a captain was wanting, Mustapha could not be again revived, yet might he be strongly supposed to line. This denice pleased Bajazet, as best fitting his purpose, being not ignorant of this disposition of the people. Wherefore by certain of his most faithfull and trufty followers he found out a certaine obscure fellow of a notable audacity, which K should take voon him the name & person of Mustapha, whose stature also and countenance and proportion of body differed not much from Mustapha himselfe: he, as if he had by chance escaped, first began to shew himselfe in that part of Thracia, which is aboue Conflantinople, and lieth toward Danubius, not far from the countries of Moldauia and Valachia, & was for that cause both sittest for rebellion, and also best stored with horsemen, who of all others most honored Mustapha. Hither he comes as if it had bin from a long journy, slenderly accompanied, and as if he had bindefirous at the first not to have binknown his followers being demanded (as it chanced) who it was, did rather fearefully give them that asked occasion to ghesse, than plainly to tell them, that it was Mustapha: neither did he himselfe much deny it: wherby the people became more and more defirous to know him. Which beginning thus laied, he af- 1 terward began to rejoice of his fortunat comming thither, and to give God thanks for his fafe arrivall there among it his friends : he tels them, That at fuch time as he was fent for by his father, he durst not come in his fight, or commit himselfe vnto him in his fury, but by the counfell of his friends to have with great promifes perfuaded one that was maruellous like vnto himselse to goe in his stead : by whose danger he might make proofe of his fathers mind towards him : who before he was admitted to the speech of his father, was without hearing miferably strangled, and so cast out before his paullion: at which time there was many (as he said) which perceived the deceit, but the greater part remained in errour, deceived with the lineaments and countenance of the miserable dead man, who was much altered with the terrible paines of death, and supposing it to have bin him indeed that was slaine. Which thing at M foone as hee viderstood, he thought it not good longer to stay, but presently to sly and to prouide for his owne fafety and fo flying with a few of his owne followers, thereby the more secretly and safely to escape; and having passed aboue Pontus by the people of Bosphorus, was now come thither, where he was in good hope to finde much helpe and com-

A fort in the fidelity of his friends, whom he requested not now to forsake him, or to make lesse account of him difgraced by the malice of his step mother, than they had before in time of his prosperity, for that he was minded to reuenge the injury don vnto him, and by force of arms to defend himself. For what els had he now lest; beeing by no other meanes preserued but by the death of another man. That he had sufficiently proued how his father stood affeded toward him, and that he now lived by his militaking, not by his kindnes. The cause of all which his troubles was his step-dame, who (as he said) with her inchantments led the silly old man(now almost doting for age, and mad for loue) whither she would at her pleasure: and by her agent Ruftan Baffa forced him forward headlong into al kind of mischief. But that God bethanked he wanted not friends, by whose helpe he would find a way out of these miseries. B and take revenge of his enemies: for why, he had as yet couragious hearts, and the Ianizarics with the greater part of his fathers family on his fide; and that great multitudes of people would flock vnto him vpon bruit of his name; and that they which now mourned for him as dead (being in number many) would by heaps run to help him being alive: fo that they there present would but only curteously receive him as a guest, and protect him now distressed, till fuch time as his wel-willers and friends might repair vnto him. And this at last he gaue out not in fecret, but openly to all men wherfoeuer he came. The fame things did they also report, whom he made the people beleeve to have bin the companions of his flight: which was also confirmed by divers of good credit and authority, whom Bajazet had before dealt with to that purpose. So that a great number of men altogether vnknown to Bajazet, were therby se-C duced: for this matter was so cunningly wrought, that many who had known Mustapha aliue, &c feen him ly dead before his fathers paullion, yet lifted not greatly to beleeve that which they knew but easily suffered themselves to be persuaded that this was the true Mustapha. But the companions and followers of Mustapha (in whose mindes the lively countenance and resemblance of him was fully ingrauen) nothing could decelue, yet blinded partly with fear, partly with grief and defire of reuenge, and wishing rather to aduenture any thing, than longer to line without Muftapha, were the first men that came to offer their service to this counterfeit Mustapha, and would not suffer other men to doubt but that he was the true Mustapha, which was falfly reported to have bin slain. As for the deceiver himself, he either kept with him, or entertained them that came, fomewith fair promises, some with curtous speeches, & many D also with mony & rewards, which he made them believe he had reserved of the relique of his better fortune. For Bajazet had before notably provided that he wanted nothing for countenancing of his credit. So within the space of a few dates such a multitude of men was reforted vnto him as might almost haue made a whole army. When Solyman vpon the sudden was aducrtifed by the fearful messengers and letters of the Sanzacks therabouts, what danger was like to ensue by the concourse of so great a multitude of people to this counterfeit Mustapha, he presently suspecting (as the truth was) that this was not don without the privity of one of his sons, thought it not a thing to be neglected; and therefore by his Letters reprodued the Sanzacks, That they had fuffered the matter to run fo far, and had not in the beginning (as their duty was) suppressed the same. Grieuously threatning them, if they did not with all E speed send vnto him in bonds that counterfeit companion and the rest of his Complices: the which that it might be the easilier by them performed, he promised to send one of the chiefe solyman sends Baffa's, namely Partan Baffa (who had maried the widow of Mahometes the eldest fon of Roxo-lang, of whom we have before remembred) and with him a strong power of the soldiers of the Court. But if they would have themselves excused, they should of themselves dispatch the matter before the comming of that aid. This Partau led after him certain squadrons of souldiers, not so many in number, as notable for their fidelity. For Solyman had caused the most faithful of his Colonels, Captains, and Corporals, to be culled out; wifely doubting left his foldiers, either led with affection, or corrupted with reward, might take part with him against whom they were fent. For the common fort of Ianizaries standing in suspence at the same of F Mustapha, and expectation of some grea nouelty, favored that broil, and wished all on a hurlyburly:neither was the matter indeed without danger. The Sanzacks after they had received this streit charge from Solyman, considering how much it stood them vpon to make speedy dispatch, began now to incourage one another to bestir themselves, to make all the haste possible, and with all their power on every side to oppose themselves against the attempts of this new found Mustapha, laboring to stay such as were comming vnto him, and to disperse such as & were already come, by shewing them the greatnesse of the danger; and threatning them with all extremities. In the mean time Partan Baffa came on with his army, and was not now far off. when (as in like case it often fals out in things not yet sufficiently confirmed, and by celerity presented) the foldiers of the counterfeit Mustapha leging themselves beset on energy side, began to fear and first some few to slip away, but afterwards all without regard of shame or of their promise, to forsake their captain and fly every man whither he shought bosh The Cap. tain feeking likewife to make shift for himself, was with the chief of his counsellors and sol lowers taken by the Sanzacks and deliuered to the Baffa, who with a ftrong gard fent them all in bonds to Constantinople: where Solyman by most exquisit torments drew from them al the fecret devices of his yong fon Bajazet; and that he had purposed after such a head made H by this supposed Mustapha, as he thought convenient, to have voon the sudden to youd himself with a great power, and fo as should best serue for his purpose, to have gon directly to Constantinople, or els against his brother Selymus. But whilst he goeth somewhat too slowly to bout his busines, his varipe counsels were by his sathers celerity oppressed. Of all which mate ter Solyman now thorowly affured, caused the supposed Mustapha with his companions at midnight to be drowned in the feasthinking it not good to have thefe things commonly known and to haue his domestical wounds yet bleeding, laid open to the view of his neighbour princes. Neuertheles, being mightily offended with Bajazet for fo great an injury, he ceased not to cast in his mind how to be reuenged upon him , which his wife Roxolana a woman of great wildom was not ignorant of. Who after a few daies, at such time as the old mans fury was 1 At Rexplana's Ouerpast, falling of purpose into talk with him about the matter, she laid together in her sons behalf, and alledged the indifcreetnes of his youth, the necessity of the fact, and the example of his ancestors in like case, that it was so provided for by nature, that every man should bee careful of himselfe and his, and that every man did indifferently shun death; that young men were by euill counsel easily seduced and made to forget their duty. That it were reason hee should forgiue him his first fault, which if he amended, then was it a great gain for the father to have faved his sonne: but if he should again fall into relapse, there would not want time to punish him for both facts. And that if so be he would not pardon him for his owne sake, hee would vouchfafe to pardon him for hers ; intreating now for him for whom she had before groaned, and not to be cruel vpon him, one of the pledges of their loue, in whom refled the K bloud of them both: for in what woful case should the be, if of those two sonnes (all that God had left her) the fathers scuerity should bereaue her of the one. Wherfore she requested him to moderat his anger, & to prefer his elemency before his iust indignation; for a smuch as God himself of al power and might, did not alwaies deal with sinners in seuerity, but for most part in mercy; wheras otherwise all mankind would not suffice his wrath. And would mercy in any place be more fitting, than in the father toward his child? She promifed further, that BajaZet should from thenceforth remain in dutifull obedience towards his Maiesty; and vpon his so great elemencie, to convert the fear wherein he now lived, into a world of duty and devotion. Honorable minds the faid were retained with nothing more than with kindnes and curtefie; That the remembrance of that his fatherly forgiuenes should be a stay vnto him, for euer do- L ing the like again. At last, That she would promise for him, and take vpon her, that he should for cuer afterwards satisfie his fatherly expectation in all kind of duty and loyalty. Which words mingled with tears and other womanly gestures, so wrought with Solyman, being otherwise too much in her power, that he resolued to forgive the fault, yet so, that he should come and submit himself, and receive from him his charge. This carefull mother foreslowes no time, but by letters fecretly advertised Bajazet not to feare to come to his father at such time as he should be sent for. Assuring him that there was no danger, for that his father was by her means appealed, and he again brought into his fauor. With which good newes BajaZet well seingursans comforted, te folued to go at fuch time as he was fent for ; yet ful of fear, and oftentimes loobu fairer is king back vnto his brother Mustapha, whose dreadful example sufficiently warned him, what M a danger he aduentured himselfevnto. Yet he came vnto the place appointed for his parley, which was in a common Inne at a place called Carestran, a few miles from the city of Constantinople. For such is the suspitious maner of the Turkish Tyrants of these times, not to fuffer any of their fons that bee men growne, to fet their foot within the gates of Constantinople, as dangerous for foliciting the foldiers of the Court, and fo consequently for altering the flate. Bajazes was no fooner lighted from his horse, but his fathers Gard was ready to receine him, commanding him to lay afide his fword and dagger: which thing though ltbe a viual matter in others that are admitted to the presence of the Turkish Emperour, yet might at then in the mind of his guilty fon raile a great fear. But his kind mother (who had before foreseen in what fear and perplexity he would come) had conucied her selfe into a Chamber fast by the entrance of the same house as Bajazes was to passe; where out of a little casement coueted with a thin linnen cloth free called to him passing by , in these few words. Corcoma Oclan, Corcoma; which is as much to fay, Fear not my fonne, fear not. With which those speech BajaZet was not a little both comforted and incouraged. But as foon as he was come into his B fathers prefence, and had done his duty, Solyman commanded him to fit down by him. Then Solyman repro-began the grim Sir gricuously to reproue him of rashnes and want of discretion in taking vp also sillously, and Arms, which he could not otherwise conceive of but as taken vp against himself. And admit afterwardparthey were as he would have it, and the best that he could make of it, taken vp against his elder done him. brother, yet was it neuertheles a great prefumption and most wicked fact. Neither was there any want in him, but that the whole state of the Mahometan Religion (which at this day resteth your the Otheman family) had by his domestical discord been fore shaken, and brought in perill of viter ruin, to the great iniury, reproch, and contempt of his Majesty, a most dete-Asble and horrible crime, which could not but with condign punishment be reuenged. Yet for all that, he had determined to pardon him, and to shew himself rathers kind sather, than a C seuere judge; so that he would from thenceforth leave the care of future things to God: forasmuch as more of these things are done by our appointment, but that kingdomes and Monarchies are bestowed as it best pleaseth him. So that if it were his destiny to enjoy the Empire after his death, he should be sure therof, as of a thing that would of it self come to him, and could not by any mans power be kept from him, as that which was by God ordained for him. But if it were otherwise appointed by God, then were it a mad thing for him to labour invain to striute against the wil of God, and as it were to fight with God. Wherfore he ought now (as one wel watned) to cease to rage & storm, and not molest his quiet brother, or trouble him his aged father: for that if he should again fal and raise new stirres, it would assuredly fall vpon his own head neither would any place of mercy be found for his fecond offence; & that D he should then find him not as now, his gentle father, but a most seuere and reuenging judge. Which when he had faid, and BajaZet had thereunto briefly answered as the time would permit, rather crauing pardon for his trespasse, than excusing that was not to be excused, and promising from henceforth to live most loyally at his command; Solyman according to the manner of that nation called for drinke, which he commanded to be given to Bajazet, who not daring to refuse it, although he had rather have so done, dranke thereof what he thought good, doubting lest that should have bin his last: of which fear his father forthwith delivered him by drinking a good draught of the same cup. So Bajazet, though guilty, having with better Baiazet returfuccesse spoken with his father than had his brother Mustapha, returned againe to the former neib unio his Charge. place of his charge.

This hapned in the yeate 1555, from which time Bajazet fo long as Roxolana his mother liued, behaued himself with al durifull & brotherly kindnes both towards his father & his brother; and that rather for to keep her fauor, and not to cut off the hope which he had only in her affection towards him, than for any confidence he had in his fathers kindnesse, or for any loue he bare to his brother; the regard of her being the only thing that kept his fierce nature in quiet. But she dead about two yeres after, he as a man bereft of all hope of long life, & discharged of all bonds of duty, fell to his former course. & began more grieuously than before, to reuiue the old grudges betwist him & his brother, fomtime feeking by fecret practifes to have him made away, and other fomtimes by open force entring into his province, which was not far off, there euill intreated some of his brothers followers as he light vpon, for their ma-F sters sake, omitting nothing which he thought might tend to the diffrace of him whom of al other he wished dead he had also certain of his fauorits at Constantinople, by whom he cunningly wrought by all means to gain the loue of the foldiers of the court, and doubted not as occasion served to passe over thither himselse, and there to lurk in secret with such as were of his faction, and priny to his defiguements. Of all which things Solyman had knowledge, but especially by letters from Selymus, wherin he was also advertised to have care of his own fafe. G ty; for that he was far deceined, if he perceived not that these preambles of Bajazets wicked intentions would at last turn vpon his head, who regarded neither God nor man, so that hee might alone reignivnto whose vnruly desires his fathers welfare was no lesse abar than was his brothers, and therfore through his fides was his life shot at. Which treason had (as heefaid) bin of long time plotted, and now occasion sought to have the same performed. Wherfore he should take heed that he were not by such trechery ouerwhelmed before he were aware there of. That for himself, he could easily bear with the injuries of his brother Bajazet, yet could not chuse but be mooued with the greatnes of his fathers dangers. By which means Solymans hatred against Bajazet was more and more increased. Wherfore he by letters put him in remembrance of his duty, how curteously he had vsed him, and again what he had on his part promifed:that there would not alwaies be place for forgiuenes; that hee should therefore cease to wrong his brother, and trouble his father. That he had but a short time to liue, and that after his death God would assigne each of them their fortune. But all this was to no purpose with EajaZet, fully fee down resolutely to hasard any thing, than as a beast to haue his throat cut by his brother: which thing he as plainly faw would betide him in the reign of Selymus, as if it had bin euen then in execution. Yet he answered to his fathers commands not impertinent. ly, but his deeds agreed not with his fayings, neither did hee alter any thing of his intended Selyman remo purpose. Which thing so foon as Solyman perceived, he thought it best to take another course, weth bis ime and to remoue his fons both farther from himself, and also farther one from another. Where forche gaue them to vnderstand that it was his pleasure, That both of them within a certaine prefixed time should passeout of their gouernments (Bajazet being then gouernor of Cutai, and Selymus of Magnesia) and that now Bajazet should remove to Amasia, and Selymus to Iconium. Selymus was without imputation, and altogether in fauor with his father, yet because no occasion should be given Bajazet to fal into extremities, if he should have bin removed alone, Solyman to feem indifferent commanded them both to remoue. Vnto which command it was adjoined, That the farther they were one from another, they should be so much the neerer in mind and brotherly lose: for a finuch as neernes of dwelling of the Great did oftentimes hinder their good agreement, whilst by forwardnes of officers many things are on both sides don to the grieuing of their masters. And that they should in any case do as they were commanded; and that he which stayd longest, should not be free from the suspition of contempt. Selymus made no long stay, as he that knew a great part of all this to be don for his sake. But Rijszet delay- Bajazet hung back, and being gon a little on his way, complained of the volucky province of eibhigoing to Amasia, stained with the bloud of his late brother the noble Mustapha, to be assigned unto him as ominous; and that he could be better contented with any province what soeuer than that, where the deadly remembrance of the miserable end of the neerest to him in bloud, should be cuer before his eies, to the wounding of his heart. Wherfore he requested that he might at least Winter in those places, or els there from whence his brother was now of late departed: but Solyman would in no wise hearken unto him. Now Selymun gon before certain days journy, with fuch troups as his father had fent vnto him besides his own, for seare of Bajazet, who yet flayd loitering and trifling on the time, fuddenly returning and fetching a compas about, I shewed himselse at his brothers back, marching toward Prusa in Bithynia, the antient seat of the Turkish Kings; which he did not without the privity of his father, who liked not of the lingring of Bajazet: for what if he, having gained the good wil of the lanizaries, should have gon either to Prusa, or vnto Constantinople, what a danger might therby haue grown to Selymu, yea unto the whole State in generall? In this common feat, Solyman though it best for Selymus there to stay, from whence they might most conveniently help one another, if BajaZet should (as was feared) turn himself vpon either of them. Yet was not Selymus so strong as to aduenture to join battell with his brother, whom he knew ready to put all vnto the hafard of one day. But when Bajazet (contrary to his expectation) faw Selymus behind him, and that he had got nothing by his long delay, but that his brother should be the vadoubted heire of M the Empire if his father (hould die, (which was then by reason of his fickly constitution of body more and more feared) he writ vnro his father accusing his brother, That hee could not

caking that indired course, which was to no other purpose but to aspire to the Empire, and to

A have a short cut over to Constantinople, if hee should have any newes of his fathers death, which he ftil gaped after. Which his longing if his fathers longer life should delay, then by the feciet milifters of his treason to dispatch him, and by murdering of him to possesse himfelf of the empire; and yet nevertheles this man, as a most duriful and obedient son, to bee of him much made of and as it were put in his bofom. Wheras he on the contrary part meaning wellinto whose conceit never any such thought came, but was cuer at command, was not had in any regard, but cast off and contemned whose greatest request was but to shun an vnfortunat ominous prouince. Then converting his stile to prayers, he intreated his father to gratifie him with some other province, if it were that from which his brother was gon, or with any other whatfocuer, fo that it were more jucky than that of Amafia. For answer whereof, hee B faid he would flay where he was, to the end that finding fauour in his request, hee should not have need farther to retyre. But if he thould not obtain his request, that then he was ready to gowhithersoeuer his father should command. It was not altogether for nought, that Bajazet found fault with Amasia, being the manner of the Turks, of the smallest things of all to ditine vpon the greatest. But solyman vinder sood the matter otherwise, who not ignorant of his fonstears, knew right well, that he in them fought for nothing els but a more commodious place for him to raife new stirs in, than was Amassa, so far distant from Constantinople. So Bajazet by many delaies did what he could to frustrat his fathers appointment, ceasing not in the mean time to augment his strength with new soldiers to prouide armor, mony, & whatfeeder els settling for the desence of himself, and impugning of his brother. Which Solyman C took in no other part than as intended against his owne person : yet would he seem as not to baneany wider standing of the matter. For why, the wary old Sir would not by taking knowledge therof drive headlong his son, who was already running to fast of himself. Besides that newas not ignorant that the cies of all Nations were bent upon this discord of his two sons, and therfore he defired by all means, that thefe grudges might with as little flir as was poffiblebeappeased. Wherfore he answered Bajazet curteously, that concerning his government of Amalia he could not alter it, as resolutely set down as wel for his brother as himselfe; and that therfore they should do wel to go both to their appointed places, as he had before commanded. As for the reft, they should be of good comfort, for that hee would take such order as that neither of them should have just cause to complaine. Partau Bassa, the fourth of the bimat swo Vi-D' great Baffa's of the Court, was appointed to gowith this meffage to Bajazet; and Mehemet fier Baffa'ilene third of the fanie great Baffa's, with like charge to Selymus; because the matter should feem by olyman to condustibilities to be don with all indifferencie : and both these great men commaunded not to depart from some souther fethem they were fent vnto, before they were both comevnto the places of their gouernment werat charges, whereanto they were affigured. Which solyman wifely did, to keep them both within the comparof duty, by the presence of two such grave Counsellors. Which thing Selymus tooke in good part, but BajaZet not fo: who having resolved with himselfe to set all on a burly-burly, thought nothing more unfit for his designes, than to have one of his fathers greatest Counfellors still at his clow as Censor of all his speeches and doings: wherfore having curteoupartables still at his clow as Censor of all his speeches and doings: wherfore having curteoupartables speeches and doings: where the speeches are speeches and doings: wherfore having curteoupartables speeches and doings: where the speeches are speeches and doings: wherfore having curteoupartables speeches are speeches and doings: where the speeches are speeches are speeches and doings: where the speeches are speeches are speeches are speeches are speeches and doings: where the speeches are speeche E viwilling to depart) making this excuse, That he would vie him as his patron and defender with his father, for a smuch as he had no other in Court to defend his cause; promising not to be vnto him an vnworthy or vnthankfull Client: and to carry word back again vnto his father, That he would aboue all things have care of his command, if he might fo do for his brother Selymus, whose injuries and trecheries he had much ado to brook. Partau the great Bassa thus sent away, affured Solyman what the very mind and purpose of his yonger son was. And albeit that BajaZet, to make it feem as if fomthing had bin don by that emballage, made shew as if he would have presently gon toward Amasia, yet Solyman neuertheles searing the worst, made all the preparation he could against him: commanding the Beglerbeg of Greece, although then fick of the gout to make haft, and with his horsemen with all speed to passe ouer to ayd solyman pre-F Selymus. And Mehemet Bassa but lately returned, he sent forthwith backe again to Selymus for paring to go an the same purpose, with certain of the most trusty companies of the Ianizaries, and the old man fadi the Ianizaries, and the in readines, made semblant as if he would himself in person have gon over into Asia. But the zaise, vernit. Ianizaries, and other foldiers of the court came with cuill wil together, detelling that Warre line between the brethren, as altogether abhominable: for against whom should they draw their Vuu 3

fwords was it not against the Emperours sons, and haply the heire of the empire ? Wherfore G this war might (as they faid) wel enough he let alone as altogether vnneceflary, and not they to be inforced to imbrue their hands one in anothers bloud, and to pollute themselves with fuch impiety : as for that which Bajazet did, was to be holden excused, as proceeding from necessity. Which speeches of the lanizaries being brought to Solymans ears, he forthwith declared them to the Muphti (who in all matters of doubt they flee vnto as vnto a most facted Oracle)demanding of him, how he was to be intreated, who of himfelf prefuned whilf bee yet liued, to leuy foldiers, raife an army, ranfack towns, & trouble the flate of the whole empire? and what also he deemed of them that were his followers and took part with him? and laft of all, of them also that refused to bear arms against him, and said that he had in so doing offended nothing ? Wherunto the Muphti answered, That both the man and his partakets were all H worthy of death, and that such as refused to take up Arms against him, were as prophane and irreligious men to be accounted intestable. Which the great Priests answer was published vnto the people, and by the chiefe Chiaus fent to Bajazet, to fee if he might be therwith moo. ued. Within a few daies after there came to Constantinople one of the Chiaus (whom Bajazet had intercepted, being fent from Solyman to Selymus) by whom BajaZet gaue his father town. Bajacetreque derstand, that he was in all duty his, and that he had not taken up Arms against him, neither re-set to meddle fused to be unto him in all things obedient: but that he had to do only with his brother, and not to meaner betweene bim with him to fight for his life, by whose sword he must die, or els he by his, for that a mischief es bu broiber. was to be by one of them performed. Which quarrel he was resoluted to try while he yet liued, and that therfore he should do best not to meddle in the quarel, or give aid to either. But if so be he would needs (as the report was) passe ouer the sea to aid Selymus, he should not eafily get him into his hands, for that he knew right well, if the worst came how to escape and faue himself and would before he could get ouer into Asia, make such spoile with fire and fword, as neuer had Tameriane, or other the cruellest enemy that euer the Turks had. Which messagedid not a little trouble Solyman; and withall it was reported, that the town of Axuar, where one of Selymus his fons ruled as Sanzack, was already taken by Bajares and shamefully facked. But Selymus hearing that his brother was gon toward Amasia, and now on his way as far as Ancyra, being out of all suspition of danger which hee feared upon the way so long as his brother was yet lingring in those quarters, hasted now towards I conium, which was with a firong garifon kept for him. For amongst other cares wherwith Solyman was vexed, it was not the least, that BajaZet intercepting Iconium, should get into Syria, and from thence into Agypt, an open country, and not yet thorowly established under the Turkish gouernment; neither forgetful of the old government of the Mamalukes, & therfore defirous of change: from whence it would have bin an hard matter to have driven Bajazet, especially the Arabians being alwaies ready and at hand at every light stir, where any hope of prey was. Out of which province also in case of extremity he might easily transport himself into one of the Christian kingdoms. Solyman therfore took great care, that this passage which might seeme the last refuge of Bajazets deuices, might be stopped up : and concerning the same, had given commandement vnto most of his Commanders in Asia, to be alwaies in readines to aid Selymus whenfoeuer he should call. With them Selymus lay incamped under the wals of Iconium, at- L tending every stirring of Bajazet, resoluing there to expect further aid from his father, & not Bajazet Bager by vntimely fight to commit his safety to the hasard of one doubtful battell. But Bajazet on the other side, not unmindful what a matter he had taken in hand, slept not therupon, but first entertained a valiant fort of horsmen which the Turks cal Chiurts, and are supposed to be of that people which were somtime called Gordij, men for their known valor famous. He yet lay in the plain and open fields by Ancyra, of the commodities of which city, which were indeed great, he made great vie. In the castle therof he bestowed his concubines and children of the rich merchants he took vp mony, to be repaid with the vie vpon the good fucces of the War: and from thence he took whatfocuer was needful for the arming and furnishing of his men-Besides his own family, which was very great, and those Chiurts which we spoke of, many re- M paired vnto him, which in former time had bin beholden to his mother, to his fifter, & to 24stanthe great Bassa. Many also of the reliques of the valiant Mustapha and Achemates the great Baffa, valiant men and expert fouldiers, who defired to reuenge the vnworthy death of their Lords and Masters euen with their owne. Neither was there wanting an exceeding rabblement

A rabblement of fuch as weary of their present state, desired some new alteration and change. The commiseration also of the state of the vnfortunat BajaZet, easily drew many to take part with him, whose whole trust was in his valorithey favored the young prince lively representing his father. When as in Selymus appeared no likenes of himfelf, but the expres liniaments The description of his mothers face and body, a woman whilst the lived generally hated of all the people. He of Stiffam. went heavily, as ouercharged with his greasie panch, blub checked, and exceeding red faced: fo that the foldiers in sport would say he was fed with green malt. He was altogether given to his case, and spent his time in drunkennes and sleep, neither was he curteous of speech, hor willing to deserue wel of any manifor he would not (as he said) offend his father by being oopular, fo was he only of his father beloued, and of all other men hated. Of all kind of men hee B most disliked them that set al their hope in a bountiful and couragious prince. The same soldiers were also wont to cal Bajazet, Softie, that is to say, a man given to quietnes and study but after they faw him take vp arms, and for the fafety of himself and his children ready to aduenrure any thing, they began to admire him as a man of valour and courage, and to ask among ft themselues, Why his father should reject him of suchworth, the expresse image of him. Bajacte bie felfand prefer before him that gorbellied fluggard, in whom no spark of his fathers valor was guard generalto be feen? This his entring into arms was no fault, being therunto by necessity inforced. For, the feldiers. had not Selymus their grandfather don the like ? whereof no better example could be found. whom the force of necessity constrained not only to take vp arms against his brother, but also by hastning the death of his father; and by so doing purchased unto himself and his posterity C the empire which fo gotten, if Solyman did not vniustly possesse, why might not his son vie the same courses why should he so rigorously revenge that in his sonne, that was so lawfull in the grandfather ? Although there was, as they faid, great difference betwirt that Selymus and this Bajanet; for that this man intended no harm against his father, but wished him long to live: neither yet against his brother, if he might by his leave but live, if he would but once cease todo him wrong. That it was alwaies accounted lawfull to repel force by force, and to shun present death, if the destinies would so permit. By such affections and motions Bajazets forces daily increased which being now grown almost to the greatnes of a ful army, he thought it not best to vie longer delay, but to march forthwith against his brother to fight with him one battel for his life, state and empire: accounting it some commendation (though in vaine) D to haue attempted so great an enterprise. His purpose was, as Solyman feared, to get into Svria: which if he could bring to passe, he then doubted not of the rest. Selymus strengthned with his fathers power, lay waiting for his comming before Iconium, wel appointed of al warlike prouision:his army was exceeding strong, and in it many notable commanders, martiall men of great experience whom his father had ioyned vnto him; who all lay couered with their great ordnance, planted in places most convenient. But Bajazet nothing terrified therwith, as Bajazet post foon as he came within sight of his brothers Army, incouraged his foldiers in sew words to again to be brother. play the men, for that now was come the time they wished for, & place for them to shew their valor in: Wherfore they should shew themselues couragious and valiant, and he would make them all rich and fortunat. He told them, that their fortune was now in their owne hands, to E frame it euery man as he would himselse; so that if any of them were weary of their present flate, there was the field wherin they might exchange it with better, and therin lay down the miscry of their former liues. That of him they should if they ouercame, expect riches, promotions, honors, and what foeuer els, the rewards of valiant men. That with the victory of one battel, all their defires should be satisfied, were they never so great: which victory was by the valor that rested in them to be gotten, and his brothers Army, the heartlesse followers of a heartleffe captain ouerthrown: as for his fathers foldiers that were with his brother, they were in body present, but in mind altogether on his side. That it was only Selymus that with stood his welfare and their felicity; whom they should therfore valiantly feek for in field as their common enemy; and not to be afraid of his multitude: for a fmuch as victory was to be gained F not by number, bur by valor : and the most mighty God of heaven and earthwas stil present, not with the most, but with the best. Besides that, he willed them to remember, with what a cruell enemy they were to fight, who thirsted after nothing more than their bloud. And to conclude, he willed them all not to looke vpon his words, but his deeds; and fayd, If as you shall see me fighting for your profit, you shall likewise fight for myne honor, I dare then as-fure you of the victory. Which faid, he with great courage charged the enemy, and fighting himself a long time among the formost, and there performing all the parts of a valiant foldier and worthy Captain, was for his notable valor no lesse commended of his enemies than of The battell be- his own foldiers. The battell was bloudy and terrible, and many fell on both fiderabut after twist stigment that they with wonderfull obstinacy had a great while fought with doubtful victory, so that and Bajazet. State they thousand Turks lay there did upon the ground; at length the victory began to incline to that side wheron stood the greater strength, the inster cause, and better counsel. Many of the enemies being flain, so many of his own people also lost, Bajazet was inforced to retyre; which he did so leisurely, and without shew of any sear, that it seemed to the beholders, he had welneer as wel gained as lost the field. Neitherdurst Selymus pursue him; but stood stil fast in the fame place, neuer more glad of any thing than to fee his brothers back. But Bajazet after bee had in contempt of his fathers command, thus run his own courfe, and fatisfied his own defire, though disappointed of his purpose, and not able to perform the journey by him intended into Syria, turned now his course, and began in good earnest to go to Amasia his appoin.

Solyman speedily advertised of the event of this battel, forthwith passed over into Asiasfor as the great Basil's his counsellors thought it not convenient for him to go over the streight before the victory; fo after it was certainly known, they thought it not good longer to flay, left the ouerthrow of Baiazet might give occasion to such as secretly savored his quartel, to show themselues, and so to raise greater troubles. Besides that, the same of his passage overwould (as they faid) much avail both to the discouragement of BajaZee, and the terrifying of all his triends; and therfore it was by them thought good, haftily to purfue him, now ouerthrowne, and not to suffer him to gather courage by the example of his grandfather Selymus, Selymans father, who had bin more terribly vanquished than when hee flood in his own strength, and and might feem by that meanes especially to have prevailed, for that he was at first vnforthnatly ouerthrown. Neither were these things without reason foreseen, for it is almost incredible, what admiration and love this battel (though vnfortunat) did gain Bajazet; men wondred that he durst with so small a power, and as it were but a handfull of men, incounter with his brother far better appointed, and also supported by his fathers strength; neither fearing the great disaduantage of the place, nor the sury of the artillery: and to have behaved himselse in the battel not like a yong foldier, but like an old expert commander. Selimus might at his pleafure boast of himself (as they said) to his father for the victory; but Bajazet was the man that deserved to overcome: and that Selymus might to any thing a scribe the victory, rather than to his own valor.

These and such like speeches, as they made Bajazet gratious among the people generally s fodoubled they his fathers cares, and increased his hatred, to wish him the rather dead. For why, he was resolutely set down, not to leave any other heir of the empire than Selymus his eldest son, always loial and obedient to him: wheras the other he abhorred as stubborn & rebellious, gaping after the empire whilft he yet lived; of whom he was therfore so much the more to fland in dread, by how much he was reputed to be of more valor, and for the sid he had now so openly given to Selymus. For these causes he passed over the streit into Asia, with purpose, I not to go farre from the sea coast, but as it were afar off with his fauourable aspect to countenance Selymus his proceedings: doubting by comming too necrewith his Army, to indanger himself by the sudden revolt of the Ianizaries, which he aboue all things feared.

I my felf (faith the author of this history) faw him departing out of Constantinople the Ipin s. lepat first of Iune, Anne 1559, when as within a few daies after, I my selfe was also fent for thither: for the Baffa's thought it not amiffe to have me in the camp, and to vie me curteously as their friend, for which cause I was assigned to lodge in an Inne in a village neer to the camp, where I lay very wel. The Turks lay in the fields round about : but lying there three months, I had good leifure and opportunitie to fee the manner of their Camp, and in part to know the order of their martial discipline. So I attyring my self in such apparell as the Christians com- M. monly vie in those parts, went up and downe with one or two companions at my pleasure vnknowne. First I saw the souldiers of all forts most orderly placed, and that, which he would scarsly believe that knoweth the manner of our war, there was in every place great filence, & as a man may say, dumb quietnesse; no brawling, no insolencie, no not so much as a word or laughter passing in sport or drunkennesse. Besides that wonderfull cleanlines, no dunghils, no excrements that might offend either their eies or nose, for all such things the Turks do either bury or carry them far out of fight. They themselves so oft as they are inforced to discharge the burthen of nature, dig an hole with a spade and bury it, so is all their camp without filth. There was not to be seen any drinking or feasting, no dicing (the great shame of our wars) the loffe of mony or time at cards and dice, the Turks know not. I met only with a rough Hungarian and his companion, a foldier, who heavy himfelf, to the Lute rather houled than fung a dolefulditty, containing the last words of a fellow of his dying of his wounds vpon the green banke of Danubius; wherein he requesteth the riuer, because it ran to the place where he was born, to carry news to his friends and countrymen, that he died an honorable death, and not vn-B reuenged, for the increase of his religion, and honor of his country: wherunto his fellows fighing, bare a foot, O happy and thrice happy wight, would Fortune with thee change we might. For the Turks are of opinion, That no mens foules go more speedily to heaven, than of such valiant men as die in battell, for whole welfare their maidens daily make prayers and vowes. I would The opinion the also needs go through their butchery, where their beasts were killed, to see what flesh was to them that de be fold, where I saw but sourc, or at most fine weathers hanging ready dressed, and that was in their ware, the butchery for the Ianizaries, which I deemed to be in that camp not sewer than source thoufand. I maruelled that so little flesh should suffice so many men but I was answered, That sew of them did eat flesh, for the most part of them had their victuals transported from Constantinople. Then I demanding what it was, they shewed me a Ianizarie sitting by, who in an ear. The space dies C thendish had pilled a turnep, an onion a head of garlick, a parsnep, and a cucumber, all sauced of the Lanizewith falt & vineger, or more truly to fay, with hunger, whereon he fed as fauorly, as if they had bin feasants or partridges: his drink was the common drinke of all liuing creatures, euen faire water. By which frugall kind of diet, they prouide both for the health of their bodies, and the sparing of their purse; and that I maruelled the more at, it was the time that their great fast, or to speake after our fashion, their Lent was at hand : at which time with vs Christians, euen in well ordered cities, much more in camps, all rings with playing, dancing, finging, crying, quaffing, caroufing; and in briefe, with madding & phrenfic. So that it is not vainly reported, That a Turke sent about that time Embassador into Germany, comming home, reported, That the Christians on certain daies did ryot, and became mad, untill they, besprinkled with a certain D kind of ashes in the Church, came to themselves againe, and so recovered; and that it was a wonderful thing to fee, how much they were changed by the efficacy of that remedy, that they feemed not to be the same men : meaning indeed the disordered manner of the Christians at Shrouetide, and the Ceremonies vsed on Ashwednesday: Which thing they to whom it was told, so much the more maruelled at, for that the Turks have many medicines which cause madnes, but few or none which presently easeth the same. And they vpon those daies that go Thepressema. before their great fasts, change nothing of their wonted maner of life to the worse: but rather The kintheir better to endure the fudden change of their fast: which they so precisely observe, that on their

fasting daies they will not so much as tast a cup of water, or wash their mouths with water all E the day long, before the stars appeare in the sky, which maketh their fasts, especially in Summer when the daies be long and hot, to be vnto them very tedious. Whiles I thus lay in the camp, there came vnto me one Albertus a learned man with certain Prefents fent Presents from the emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and a most curious clock, from the Emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and the emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and the emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and the emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and the emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and the emperor to Solyman, which were certain gilt plate; and the emperor to Solyman gilt pl which was carried upon an Elephant like a castle; and some crowns to be dispersed among the 10 solyman. Bassaes: which Solyman would needs have presented to him in the campe in the fight of the whole army, to make it the better known what friendship was between him and the Emperor,

But to returne againe to BajaZet, from whom we have a while digressed : he after the battel sajazet goeth at Iconium, had rettred himselse to Amasia, the place of his government, as though he would so Amasia, and feeter be have now there quietly lived, if his father would so give him leave. He had now satisfied his father favour, youthfull desires & griefe, and seemed willing from thenceforth to satisfie his fathers better expectation: and therfore ceased not by letters & fit men to proue his fathers minde. Neither did Solyman shew himself strange from such a reconciliation: at first he easily gaue the messengers audience, read his sons letters, & courteously returned answer; so that it was commonly reported reported in the camp, that the father & the fon would agree, and that the old man would pardon the youthfull pranke already past, so that he would from thenceforth remaine dutifull, But all this was by the counsel of the Bassa's nothing but deep dissimulation in the crafty old fire, vntill he had shut vp Bajazet, and so got him aliue into his hand; for it was seared, less he despairing of pardon, should with such a power break into the borders of Persia (now the only place left for his refuge) as might preuent the watchfull diligence of his lieutenants upon those frontiers: whom Solyman charged by continuall letters so to stop all the passages into Persia, as that there should not be any crany for Bajazet to fly out by. In the mean time, if any came within his reach that were suspected to have taken part with Bajazet, or favored his proceedings, those he caused to be tortured & secretly made away, and among them somewhom Bajazet had of purpose sent to excuse themselves. For Solyman searing less Tames the Persian H King (more mindfull of his old quarrels than of the late inforced peace) should hardly with much ado suffer his son to be got out of his hands if he should fly thither, and so again raise long& dangerous war; did therfore what he possibly might to oppresse him before he should come thither. Which his purpose although it was coursed with al secrecy, yet was it not hid. den from some of Bajazet his friends, by whom he was ottentimes warned not to trust his father, but to beware of treason, and in any case speedily to prouide for his owne safety. But so. lyman thinking he had now fo provided as that he could by no means escape, and happily the more to deceiue his son, appointed to return with his army to Constantinople the day after their Easter day. But BajaZes vpon the very feast day, having performed the solemnities therof, commanded al things to be truffed up at Amafia, and fo fet forward upon his unfortunat jour. ny towards Persia, knowing right wel that he went to the antient enemy of the Othoman family, but yet fully refoluing to proue any mans mercy, rather than to fall into the hands of his angry father. Now were they all fet forward, except fuch weak fouls as were not thought able to endure the labor of fo long a journy : among whom was left Solyman, Bajazets yongest fon, but then newly born, which guiltleffe babe with his mother Bajazet thought better to leave to the mercy of his grandfather, than to take him with him, a poor companion of his wofull and miserable flight; whom Solyman, as yet vncertain of his fathers fortune, commaunded to be nursed at Prusa. Baiazet so gon from Amasia, vsed such celerity in his trauell, that almost in enery place he prevented the fame of his comming, and lighted vpon many that were ap-Pajazet deci- pointed to stay his passage, before they were aware of him. The Bassa of Sebastia he thus de- K et Sebajura and ceined: There was two waies, wherof one of them being intercepted, would greatly hinder his journy, and that the Bassa had already taken. Wherfore he sent certain as if they had bin sugitiues, to tel the Bassa that he was already gon the other way. Which the Bassa beleeuing, left the place he had before taken, and rifing with all his power speedily to pursue him the otherway, whereby it was told him that he was gon, left that way free and open for him to passe by.

The Baffa of Erzirum he also deceived by another not much vnlike shift. From whome when he was not far distant, and knowing that in passing his Country he was to indure great danger, he fet voon him with a wyle, sending unto him certain of his followers with commendations: who afterwards lamentably complaining of the yong princes calamity, to moue the 1 Baffa to pitty, at last requested that he would give him leave to shoo his horses in his territorie; telling him that he came vnprouided of all things, and therefore was defirous in that fruitful country to refresh his horses a day or two, and to new shoothem. Wherunto the Bassa curreoufly answered, That he would not let him to take what soeuer he needed. But whether it was for the compassion that he had vpon the state of Bajazet, or for the secret love he barehim, or that he thought by that means the easilier to intrap him, is vncertain; and haply presented by Bajazets quick speed, had not as yet sufficient time to draw his soldiers together. He sent alfoto Bajazet certain smal presents, seeming to be glad of his welfare and comming. Who neuertheles kept on his way resting no part of the day, and but a little of the night. The Bassa of Erzirum understanding that Bajazet came stil on, made what hast he could also, and joyned M his power with the rest of the Bassa's which followed after: for many Bassa's & Sanzacks hearing that Bajazet was fled from Amasia, pursued fall after him, being charged by Solyman, vpon pain of their heads to bring him back either alive or dead but all in vain, by reason of his speedy departure, & for that he made more hast to fly, than they did to follow. Yet it cost no

A man dearer than this Baffa of Erzirum of whom we have now spoken, whom Solyman for this cause displaced and Selymus afterwards slew, with two of his sons young striplings, whom hee before in despight shamefully abused against nature. Yea Selymus himself and Mahomes the great Baffa, with the Beglerbeg of Grecia, followed also after BajaZet, though it were afar off. This his departure grieued Solyman aboue measure; affuring hinself (as the truth was) that he was fled into Persia: wherwith he was so much moued, that he could scarsly contain himselfe, but would needs have gon with his whole power in all hast against the Persian, to have terrified him at hand from relieuing his rebellious son. But these his raging fits his grave Counfellors moderated, by declaring vnto him what danger he should aduenture himself vnto. by reason of the doubtfull faith of his best soldiers; and what if Bajazet (as he was a desperat and B sudden man) (hould in the mean time turn about aboue Pontus and the fens of Moetis, and for fetching a compas come to Constantinople, and proclaiming a general liberty in his absence possesse himself of the empire. By which wholesome persuasion Solyman staid his so hasty a journy, But Bajazer all the way as he went writ on the gates & dores, that he would gine double pay to all fuch as should follow him: which caused Solymans captains to have their owne foldiers in distrust, and the more, for that they might oftentimes hear among them speeches of great good wil and loue toward BajaZet.

After long flying, he was at length come to the river Araxis, which separates the Turkish Bajagethardkingdom from the Persian: which having passed ouer, and yet not so in safety, he left certaine is pursued. of his followers vpon the bank of the river, to keep the Sanzacks (who still eagerly pursued C him) from passing ouer. Whom the Sanzacks easily repulsed, and so passing the river entred agreat way into the Persian kingdom, vntil such time as they were met by certain of the Nobility of Persia with great troups of horsmen, who demanding what they meant, by that their pursuit, and what they fought for in another mans kingdom; were answerd by the Turks, that they pursued their kings sugitive son. To whom the Persians replied, That they did not wel. contrary to the league with their lord & master, to come in arms beyond the bounds of their own kingdom: and that there was a strong league betwirt king Tamas and Solyman, which it behooved them to regard. As for Bajazet, their king would confider what was convenient for him to do, and not in that point forget himsels in the mean time they should doe well to get them out of that country wherin they had nothing to do. Wherupon the Turkes forthwith

D left this pursuit and departed. But by and by came messengers from the Persian king to BajaZet, to salute him, and to demand the cause of his comming, and also to see what strength he brought with him, which as some account was about 20000. To whom Baja Tet declared, That he by his brothers injurie & fathers hard dealing driven out of his country, was fled vnto the facred majesty of the Perfian king, as his most assured refuge; who as he well hoped, in compassion of mans instability, would not reject him so distressed, and otherwise destitute of all help. Wherunto the Persian answered, That he had don very vinwisely to come to him that was in league and amity with his father; whereof one Condition was, That they should account the enemies of the one the enemies of the other, and the friends of the one, the friends of the other. Which Law to B break he counted a thing vtterly vnlawful. Neuertheles seeing the matter was so fallen out, he was welcom as vnto his friend, who in his behalf would leave nothing vnattempted to reconcilehim to his father, which he dispaired not to bring to passe. So BajaZet meeteth with the Persian king, but in an euill houre, although at their sirst greeting there was great welcome, Bajarett en. friendly countenance, chearfull lookes, mutuall kindnes, often conference, and great feafting terrainment one of another: things wherby the fecret thoughts of hollow hearts are best concealed. There was also a motion made of a streiter bond of allyance, and one of the Persian kings daughters promised to Orchanes one of Bajances sons; and he put in hope that the Persian king would neuer rest in quiet vitill Solyman had made him Gouernour either of Mesopotamia, Babylon, or Erzirum (which gouernments were by the Persians greatly extolled) and that he might there F line without fear of his brother, far from him and his farher also : where if any thing should fal out otherwise than well, he might have his brother the Persian King as a sure refuge to retire vnto, and so safe from all danger. Which speeches were haply given out of purpose to auert Bajazet his thoughts from the feeling of the present danger. Who seemed vnto himself fo affured of the love and friendship of Tamaethe Persian King, that at such time as hee sent his Embassadors to Constantinople, for a reconciliation to be made betwixt Solyman & him, & (as was commonly supposed) he willed the same Embassadour to tel his father, that he had lost a father at Constantinople, and found another in Persia. But whether the Persian deale fincerely in this behalf for Bajazet by his Embassadors, which were many, may well be doub. ted. Like it was, that there was more feined shew of double diligence, than of any true meaning thering and rather to feel Solymans mind, than to do the poor distressed Prince any goods and the rather, for that in the mean time all things were feriously plotted that might tend to his destruction. Which were no sooner grown to their full ripenes, but there was of purposea motion made, That such a multitude as followed this yong prince lay so close together, that there was not in one place victual sufficient for them and that it was therfore more conucnient to have them billeted in the country therabout, which would be more commodious as H well for the better vi Aualling of them, as for divers other purposes also. Truth was, that Tames the Persian King, far vnlike his noble father Ismael, stood in doubt lest he brought vp a fer. pent in his bosom. Yet there were many which thought, that it was not the Persians minde at first to have destroyed Bajazet, but to have bin therunto inforced by the practise of some of his familiars and followers: who not regarding the curteste of the Persian king, nor the laws of hospitalitie, persuaded Bajazet to thrust him out of his kingdom. Wheref there was many euident tokens; and among other things it was told King Tamas, that one of BajaZets chiefeft Captains should say, What mean we a why stay we to kil this heretical King, and topossesse his kingdom ? for we shal no doubt by his trechery all come to destruction. And that you fuch occasion the King was constrained to condifcend to a deuise more necessary than honorable. Bajazet had no great power, but most of them were valiant men, and souldiers of great experience, ready to aduenture vpon any thing; of whom the Persian not without cause stood in some sear. He knew his kingdom to be neither antient, nor yet wel affured, as gotten by his father by a counterfeit shew of a reformed religion: and who could affure him, but that among so many Nations ouer whom he lorded, but that there were many weary of the present flate, and so desired nouelties? vnto whom nothing could chance more fitting than the comming of Bajazet, a noble and valiant yong gentleman, and that more was, desperatly set: and as yet he himself might of right rather seem in the power of his guest, than hee in his gand that therfore he was to alter the matter, and not longer to entertain him as his guest, but to coupe him vp as a most dangerous wild beast: which to do, the easiest way was to disperse his power, & and so to take him vnawares. For that he could not without much bloudshed be openly taken in the middest of his strength, especially by the dainty Persian, of long time not vsed to War, and as yet not come together; against Baiazets foldiers, men of great activity and experience. So was the matter cunningly imparted to him for the dispersing of his souldiers, & all the commodities to infue therof alledged. Which BajaZet might not wel gainfay, although many of his wife followers (men of great reach) did shrewdly suspect the sequell. But what could he refuse, vpon whom necessity lay so heavy; where no hope was left; where heeliued as it pleased another man; and that again too, where once to doubt of the fidelity of his host might be imputed to him for the greatest trechery. So these most valiant souldiers, the poor 8 justifelle. Princes faithfull followers, neuer again to fee one another, are dispersed into divers countrey L villages, and bestowed where the Persians thought good. Not many days after, at a time pickt out for the purpose, they in number few, and dispersed in a strange country, were inclosed by many and flain: their horses, armor, apparel, and whatsoeuer els, became a prey vnto the muttherers. At the same instant was Bajazet and his sons cast in bonds also, and that to his grea-Bajaget impriter grief, as many report, taken as he was fitting merrily at dinner at the kings table. The Persian king seemed to have foreseen much in this his hard dealing with Bajazet: as that if he, being a valiant and couragious yong prince, and much better foldier than his brother, should have succeeded his father in the empire, much trouble and peril might have growne thereby both to himself and his kingdome: and that it flood farre better with the safety of hisestate that Selymus (a man wholly given to voluptuousnes and ease) should reign over the Turks : in M whose time he might as it were promise vnto himself all peace and security. And therefore it was thought that he would neuer let Bajazet go aliue out of his hand, but rather make him away in prison, as if he had there died for melancholy and grief. Well he was affored, that after he had flain his Followers, and imprisoned himselfe and his sonnes, hee would never bee

A friends with him that had so notably wronged him. Bajazet thus shamefully imprisoned, mesfengers ran continually too and fro betwint the two old Princes Solyman and Tamas. Amongst The Perfit his fengers ran continually too and fro betwint the two old Princes Solyman and Tamas. Amongst The Perfit his fendeth Embasses the rest, the Persian King sent a solemne Embassadour vnto the Turke with Presents, namely, faders with pre curious tents, costly carpets, an Alcoran containing the misteries of their superstition, and cer. finite Solymai taine strange beasts. The cause of his comming was pretended to be for a reconciliation to be made betweene Solyman and his Sonne, which Embaffador was bonourably entertained and feasted by his great Bassa's. Now was poore Bajazet in small hope of life, his cruell father still craying to have him delivered into his hands to be flain; and the Persian yet denying to deliuer him, and seeming to defend him, but not (as was thought) altogether faithfully. Solyman lest no means vnattempted to have wrung him from the Persian; somtimes he spake him faire. B putting him in mind of his league, wherein it was agreed, That they should both haue the same friends and the same enemies: otherwhile he terrified him with great words, and denouncing of war, except he would deliuer him his fonne : he furnished with strong garrisons all the frontiers of his dominion towards Persia; he filled all Mesopotamia and the bankes of the riuer Euphrates with fouldiers, especially with them of his owne guard, and such as he had before vied in the battell against Bajazet; ouer whom commanded Mehemet Baffa the third of the Visier Bassa's, and Selymus the Beglerbeg of Græce (for Selymus was soone weary of the field. and so betime returned home:) he also incited the Georgian people to take vp armes against the Persians: who wisely answered, That they had not such confidence in their own strength. as to prouoke King Tamas; but let Solyman himfelfe come with his army, and whey they faw C him present in the field, then they knew what they had to do, and that he should then well see that they wanted neither discretion nor valour. And because he would leave nothing vnoroued, he made shew as if he would in person himselse have gone to Aleppo in Syria, and so have on that fide inuaded the Persian: neither was the Persian King altogether out of scare, having to his cost many times proued what Solyman was able to do. But the vnwillingnesse of the soldiers, and their minds altogether estranged from that war, casily staied the raging Turke: they detected that war, and forfooke their enfignes, a great number of whom (especially horsemen) without leaue of their Captains returned to Constantinople: and being commanded againe to the campe, went indeed, but with such countenance and cheere as well declared how they were affected, and what they would do if occasion served for them to revolt. For which cause, after that Solyman perceived that Bajazer could not alive be got from the The cause who Persian (excusing himselse by feare of reuenge by him whom he had so grieuously offended, if the Persian he should by any meanes escape) he thought it best to follow that which was next, and to have no meanes set him there flaine; which he was in good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for that the Perfian space good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for the perfiance good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for the perfiance good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for the perfiance good hope to compaffe, and the rather, for the perfiance good hope to compaffe, and the rather good hope to compaffe, and the rather good hope to compaffe, and the rather good hope to compaffe good hope good hope to compaffe good hope to compaffe good hope good h had but lately written vnto him, That he could not but much maruell to fee him deale fo flenderly in a matter of fo great importance: That he on his part had fent him divers embassadors; & that he on the other fide had fent him nothing but common meffengers with papers, which caused him to thinke that he made no great account of the matter: wherefore he should doe well to fend vnto him men of account and place, with whom he might confer and conclude also according to the weightinesse and exigence of the cause: besides that, he was (as he said) E not a little in his debt, for that Bajazet and his followers had beene unto him no small charge before he could get him into his power: all which it was good reason he should have consideration of Whereby Solyman perceived, that mony was the thing the Persian King fought after; and therfore rather than he would in an unfit time of his life intangle himselfe in a dangerous and unnecessary war, he determined by the counsell of his Bassa's, rather with money than with the sword to fight with the Persian king. Hereupon was Hassan Agasone of the chief gentlemen of his chamber)appointed embassador into Persia, with whom was joined the Bassa of Maras, a man both for his age and place, reuerend: who departing with a large commission almost in the depth of Winter, with great speed and wonderfull to ile by those long and difficult waies, arrived at last at Casbin the seat of the Persian King, having by the way lost divers F of their leruants & followers. Being come to the Court, the first thing they desired was to see Bajazet, whom they found thut up in a close prison, pale and wan as a man fortorne, with his The mistrable haire and beard fo long and overgrowne, as that he was not to be knowne before he was new estate of Bajatrimmed , which done, then appeared the lively refemblance of his wonted countenance and fauor, fo that Haffan very well knew him to be him : for he had been brought vp with him of a childe in the Court, and for this cause especially had Solyman sent him thither to be affured G that it was he. At length after long discourse and conserance between the King and the Em. bassadors, it was agreed vpon, that the king should receive from Solyman full recompence of all the charges he had been at, and of the harmes by him sustained since the comming of Bajaze into Perlia, with such further reward as so great a good turne deserved: which things person. med, that then it should be in Solymans power to have Bajazet made away. With this news Hafsan posteth to his master at Constantinople, who forthwith caused the promised reward, toge. ther with such charges as the Persian King demanded, to be made ready, and with a safe conuoy to be sent unto the borders of Persia, where they were of the Persians received. Presently after returned Haffan the appointed executioner of the vnfortunat BajaZet: for fo Solyman had streitly charged him to strangle him with his owne hands. Which thing this new made hang. H man accordingly performed, and with a bow-firing firangled the vnfortunate Prince; who is reported to have requested of the executioner, that he might but see his chilnren before he died, and take of them his last farewell : which poore request could not be granted, but he forthwith commanded to die. This was the wofullend of the valucky attempts of Bajazet, a Prince of far more worth than was Selymus his brother, who in seeking to shun the death he feared, hasted the same before his time. Such as was the fathers end was also the end of his foure fons, Omer, Amurat, Selym, and Muhomet: of whom the three eldest were strangled at Caf. bin with their father, whose dead bodies together with his, were solemnly brought to Sebaflia, and there buried. The yongest but new borne left at Amasia, and sent by his grandsather to Prusa (as is before said) to be there nursed, was now upon the death of his father commanded by his faid grandfather to be strangled also. The Eunuch sent by Solyman to have done the deed, and loth to do it himselfe, tooke with him one of the porters of the Court, a desperat and otherwise a hard hearted Russian, a man thought sit to have performed any villany the comming into the chamber where the childe lay, and fitting the bow-string to the childes necke to have strengled him, the innocent babe smiled upon him, and lifting it selfe up as well as it could, with open armes offered to have imbraced the villaine about the necke and kiffed him. Which guiltlesse simplicity so wounded the stony hearted man, that he was notable to personre the intended butchery of the poore simple child, but fel down in a swoune and there lay for dead. The Eunuch standing without the doore maruelling at his long stay, goes in, & finding the ruffian lying along vpon the ground, with cruell hand performed that the other K could not find in his heart to do, and so strangled the guiltlesse childe as had bin given him in charge. Whereby it euidently appeared, that it was not the mercy or compassion of Solyman that so long caused the guilt lesse infant to be spared, but rather the opinion generally receiued amongst the Turks, who measuring all things by the good or bad successe, referre all things that fall out well, vnto God as the author thereof, be they neuer fo vngiatiously begun: and therfore fo long as it was yet vncertain what successe the attempts of Bajazet would have, Solyman spared the infant, lest vpon his fathers good hap he might seem to have striuen against the will of God. But now that his father was dead, and his quarrel by the cuill successe therof condemned as it were by the sentence of the Almighty, he thought it not good longer to suffer him to live, lest of an euill Bird might come an euill Chicke. I had sometime (saith the L reporter of this History) great reasoning with my Chiaus about this matter: for falling into talke with him of Bajazet, he began bitterly to enuigh against him for taking up armes against his brother. Wherento (faith this Author) I replied, That in my opinion he was worthy both to be pittied and pardoned, for as much as he was of necessity inforced either to take vp arms, or else thortly after to yeeld himselse to the saughter. But he still exclaiming against him, I faid vnto him, You blame poore Bajazet of great wickednesse for bearing armes against his brother: but Selyman, Solymans father you blame not, who vpon like occasion tooke vp armes both against his father and his brethren; yet he therin did nothing amisse, nor in your judgement blame worthy. And rightly, (faith the Chiaus) for the euent of the matter sheweth sufficiently, that that which he did was done by the appointment of God, and that he was from M. Heauen predestinated thereunto: whereas in Bajazet the euent sheweth the cleane contrary. So that which falleth out well, be it by neuer fo wicked means compassed or brought to passe, they take it as done according to the will of God; but if it fall otherwise, the judge it as a thing condemned by God himselfe; depending wholly vpon the good or bad event of

A things, and therefore judging them to be well done, or otherwise.

This yeare 1558, Charles the fifth that noble Emperor (of whom we have in the course of 1 < 8 this Hillory fo often spoken) who weary of the World, had two yeares before delivered all charles the emhis hereditary kingdomes and principalities to his fon Philip, did now the 24 of February, on pero refigerib which day he was borne, by his Embassadors solemnly sent for that purpose, resigne that Em- his brosher Ferpirewith all the honors and titles thereof vnto his brother King Ferdinand, requesting the dinand, and Princes Electors to confirme the same vnto him, which they did the thirteenth of March next eth. following. So living as a privat gentleman in that folitary life whereunto he had to the wonder of the World certaine yeares before retired himselse from all worldly affaires, the 21 day of September following died of a feauer, when he had lived 58 yeares, and thereof reigned B 20; aman no doubt to be worthily accounted among ft the greatest Christian Emperors that fixed before him. About which time died also his two fisters, Mary the Queene of Hungary.

and Elenor the French Queene, both Ladies of great honour.

The Knights of Malta, who of long had beene futers to the great Bishop and the King of 1550 Spaine, for the recourry of Tripolis in Barbary, about nine yeares before taken from them by The christian the Turks, at which time they also surprised the Island of Zerbivpon the coast of Barbary be- a flee for the twixt Tripolis and Tunes, from whence they much troubled the Christians trauelling by recours of tripolis those seas; had now at length so much prevailed, that the King commanded a great fleet to polla in Barbari be now forthwith made ready in September in the yeare 1559, to meet together in Sicilia. and from thence to go directly against the enemy by Malta. Vnto which fleet, the great Bi-

C shop, the Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Malta, with many other valiant men out of diuers parts of Christendome, joyned their forces also, so that at length there was a hundred gallies and thips met together under the conduct of Andreas Gonzaga the Generall. But whilft this fleet from divers places was long in comming thither, the Duke of Medina Coeli came before with part of the fleet to Malta, and in the hauen of Marza Moxet expected the comming of therest, who about the end of the yeare came thither. But whilest they were winteredexpecting the Spring many of the fouldiers fell ficke and died. At length the time of the yeare fit for their fetting forward being come, the Captaines consulted among themselues. Whether they should first set upon Tripolis or the Island of Zerbi, otherwise called Mening. The Knights of Malta being of opinion, that it were better first to besiege Tripolis, and that n with all foeed, before Dragut should come thither to furnish it with souldiers and provision.

Others thought it better first to inuade the Island of Zerbi, where the army might be relieued with plenty of all things necessary, and from whence they might at all times of danger in fafety retire; and from thence afterwards as time should serve, to go to Tripolis. Which vnfortypate counfell was by the greater part agreed upon. Wherefore in February the yeare follow. I 5 6 0 ing they departed from Malta, and failed directly to Zerbi. In the meane time Dragut the The christian most famous pyratae that time amongst the Turks, and Gouernor of Tripolis, was come this flet arrived ther with eight hundred of the Turks Ianizaries, and had notably strengthned the city with of zirbi. men, victual, and new fortifications, and prefently fent meffengers to Solyman at Constantinople, to certifie him of the arrival of the Christian fleet in Affrick. But the Christians comming E to the Island of Zerbi, were at the first landing encountered by the Moores, whom they repulfed and fo at pleasure landed. This Island is not far from the maine, here and there full of bogs and marishes, other river bath it none, and in the middest is somewhat hilly. It was inhabited with about 20000 men, which dwelt in low cottages, simply apparelled : yet is the Island reafonable fertile; yeelding dates, oliues, barley, mill, and such like. When the Christians were there landed, they fent for Caranama a poore King amongst the Moores (from whom Dragut had before taken that Island) to vie his counsell for the better proceeding in that war. In the meane time they agreed with 8000 men to beliege the strongest castle in the Island: in going whereunto, the Spaniards went formost the Germans next, and last of all the Italians. By the way as they went they light vpon 10000 Moores which lay in ambush in a wood, to have F vponthe sudden fet vpon them vnawares but being discouered, and 700 of them slain in skirmish by the Spaniards, the rest sted. So comming to the castle they planted their battery, and laid hard siege vnto it. The Captaine of the castle finding himselse too weake long to hold out, fled fecretly with his Turks, leaving the castle for the Moores to defend; who vpon con. The Castle of dition that they might in safety depart, yeelded the Castle to the Spaniards: for keeping the Christians.

whereof, Varona and Cerda two Spanish Captains were there left with their companies. Whi- G lest these things were in doing, Carauanus the Moore King came to the campe of the Christians and there talked with the Generall; in whose hoary countenance rested a reverend Majefty: his apparell was after the Moores fashion of white linnen, with him came also the King of Tunes his son. In talking with the Generall his manner was to sit flat vpon the ground, and wisely discoursed how the Turks were to be removed out of Affricke. But in the middest of these discourses, when such a thing was least feared, suddenly a pinnace brought newes from Tion Baffi So- fea, That Piall Baffa the Turks great Admiral was comming thither with a great fleet of eighty hymrn, Admi-rall fint tore. fine gallies, and that mowere daily repairing vnto him on every fide. Which was indeed true: rad fint to the for Solyman understanding from Dragut the Arch-pytat, that Island to be by the Christians now possessed and fortified, thought it not (in his fo great power & flourishing estate) to stand H with his honor to fuffer, but rather to giue aid vnto the Moores of that Island, a people agreeing in religion with himfelfe: and therfore commanded Piall Baffa his Admiral to take in hand that expedition. Who therupon rigged up a great fleet wel appointed & strongly manned with a number of the Turks best and most approued souldiers, as well Ianizaries as others : yet all both doubtfull and fearefull of the long journey, as also the same of the enemies with whom they were to incounter: for why, the Turks had conceived a great opinion of the valour of the Spaniards, as knowing great wars both of antient and later times to have been by that nation (to the immortall praise therof) most happily performed : they remembred Charles the fife and daily heard much of King Philip, the heire both of his fathers vertues and kingdomes; which made them fo careful, that many of them before their fetting forth (as in times of greatest dander) made their wils, and so departed from Constantinople, taking their leave of their friends. as if they should neuer haue thither returned again. So that all the city was in a confused fearer neither was there any man, whether he went or staid, that hung not in suspence with the doubtfull expectation of the event of that war. Howbeit Piall with his great fleet, with long failing and a prosperous wind was at length come welneere as far as Malta, and knowledge thereof(as aforefaid) given vnto the Christian fleet at Zerbi. With which vnexpected news the Christian ans there were not a little troubled : neuerthelesse they fortified the castle with new fortifications and bulwarks, and fell to agreement with the principall man among it the Moores of the Island, who commanded the rest, and had before pluckt downe the ensignes of Dragut, and set vp the King of Spaines) that he would yearely pay vnto the King of Spaine (as he had before K unto Dragut) fix thousand crownes, one camel, soure Ostriches, soure Sparrow-hawkes, and foure blew Faulcons: a tribute fit for fuch an Island.

But shortly after, viz. the ninth of May, the Great master of Malta by another pinnace gaue the Christians at Zerbi again to understand, That the Turks fleet was even now at hand, and already departed from the Island of Gozo, well appointed and strongly manned: and that therefore he aduised them with speed to hoise faile, & to get them to some place of more safety, or els to come to him to Malta, for feare of being by fo great a power of the Turks suddenly oppressed. Whereupon lohn Andreas Auria the Admirall sent vnto the Generall, requesting him to come abord, that so they might before the comming of the Turks fleet, retire themselves to some place of more affurance. But he for all that staid still at the castle, where the Christians I had built foure frong bulwarks i whereof they had named one. Auris's, another Gonzage's, the third the Viceroy's and the fourth the Knights, not yet all perfectly finished : as for the castle it selse they called it Philip Alcazer, by the name of the King. But whilest the Generall is thus busie, and vainly hopeth to keepe both his castle and his ships, he the next day descrying from far the comming of the Turks great fleet, hasted with the Admirall to be gone! and putting twice at fea, was both times by a contrary wind driven againe into the haven, fo that he and the Admirall had much ado in time to get them into the castle for the wind was so savourable for the Turks, and brought them fo fast on, that the Christians dismaied with their sudden comming, knew not well what to do, or which way to turne themselves. But by good hap, the greater part of the ships and 14 gallies were got out and gone the night before, and the M Great Master had in Aprill called home his gallies, wherewish and ten others of his owne he judde commint afterwards desended the frontiers of his Island. As for the reft of the fleet that flaied for the Generall and the Admirall, some few gallies escaped by flight, othersome ran themselves aground, ten of which were presently taken by the Turks, as were the rest also that were left, a' although they for a while did what they might to have faued themselves. The night following, the Viceroy and the Admirall fectetly flole out of the caftle, and fo by good fortune in two fmall frigors fled to Malta. Caramanas also the Moore King, with the Prince of Tunes. 20t them away into the maine. Gonzagathe Viceroy departing from Maltato Sicilia provided as he might for the fafety of that country, duria in the mean time gathered together the remainderof the dispersed fleet, having lost in this unfortunat expedition seventy gallies, with a

Now in the cast le was left as Generall, Don Aluarus de Sandes, a valiant gentleman of great foirit and long experience, with fine thousand footmen, some Germans, some Italians, but for the most part Spaniards besides a thousand other that were no foldiers. So that the Tutks be- The capit of ginning to befiege the fame the feuenteenth of May, were by them many times notably en. Zerbibefieged countered, and in their affaults repulsed. Vnto this siege at length came Dragus the pyrat, who with fifteene great pieces which he brought with him from Tripolis, encreased the fury of the Turks battery. Neithes were the Christians in the mean time wanting vnto themselves, haning in the caftle forty great pieces of artillery, wherewith they flew a number of the Turks and Moores; and fometimes fallying out, fought with them hand to hand; and having flaine and woulded many, retired againe into the caltle. In this manner the fiege continued three monethis with many an hot and desperat skirmish a during which time, nothing more troubled the defendants than thirst in that hot & dry climat and intemperattime of the yere : for why. in the castle there was but one great cisterne, which although it yeelded some good store of water, yet was it not enough to fusice so great a multitude, but was by measure still sparingly given out to the foldiers to far as it would ferue, no man having more allowed him than would fuffice to keep him affue: the quantity wherof fome augmented by distilling of the same water, and ming ling it with their allowance, and fo wel cased their thirst, vntil such time as having fpentall their wood they wanted that poore helpe also. There might a man have feene many poore foules lying upon the ground halfe dead, gaping and stil crying out nothing but Water, water: into whole dry mouths; if any man upon compassion vouchsafed to pour a little water, they as men regulared therewith would prefently fit up, until that for thirst they fell downe againe, and fo at length as men rofted gaue up the ghost. Thus many died daily, beside them whom the chance of warre and other difosfes without helpe confumed in fo great a diffreffe. Den Aluarus the Gouernor confidering the great extremity they were now brought vnto, at Jon Aluarus tempted with Don Sanchine de Leyus Admirall of the Neapolitan gallies, Belingerius de Reque- with the rell of fences Admirall of the Sicilian gallies, & fome others, by night to have escaped away into a galmanders taken ly which lay under the castle but in doing thereof were perceived by the Turks, and so all ta-prisons. ken. Whereupon such soldiers as sickenesse and the enemies sword had yet left alive, pinched with extreame necessity, for saken of their best captaines, and out of all hope of reliefe also, couenanting their lines only with the enemy, yeelded themselves into most miserable captini- The castle of ty. In this vnfortunat expedition perished about eighteene thousand Christians, some with Zerbi getland sicknesse, some drowned, but most slaine, beside the losse of a great part of the sleet also.

Of this victory Piall fent news by one of his gallies to Constantinople, which for the more manifesting thereof, dragged at the poupe thereof a great ensigne of the Christians, with the picure of Christ crucified therein. Which was no sooner come into the hauen, but that the rumor of the overthrow of the Christians was forthwith blowne thorow the whole city, the Turks exceedingly rejoycing one with another for the news of so great a victory; yea many of them not so contented, came by heaps to the gate of the house where the emperor Ferdinands embaffadot lay, & there meeting with his feruants, by way of derifion asked them, if they had any brethren kinfemen or friends, in the Spanish fleet at Zerbi; for if you have (said they) you shall shortly fee them here. Besides that, they with many words most insolently bragged of the bown valor, & feorned the cowardife of the Christians; asking who were able to with stand thetti now that the Spaniard was also our come. Al which with much more the embassadors men with great griefe were inforced to heare, but there was no remedy, feeing God had fo appolitied it. Shorter after, in September, the victorious fleet returned to Constantinople, drage Therarks with ging with it the prisoners; spoiles, and gallies of the Christians, a fight no lesse pleasant with vitter jetterne the Turks than heavy voto the Christians and that night it lay at anker neer voto the rocks in ric. the face of the city, with the greater pomp and glory to come the next day into the hauen. At which time Solyman himselfe was come downe into a gallery neere vato the hauens mouth. G adjoyning to his garden, the better to see the comming in of the fleer, and the Christian cap. taines fet there to shew vpon the poupe of the Admirall gally, namely, Don Alustus de Sandes. Den Sanchiau de Lequa, Don Billingerm de Requesenes, all of late great commanders sas for the Christian gallies all disarmed and vnrigged to to seem the more contemptible in comparison of the Turks, they were towed at the taile of the Turks gallies. They which then (am Splymans Augerlus Buf- countenance, perceiued not in him any figne at all of any infolent joy. I my felfe (faith Bushe, aniun, then the Emperour Ferdinands Embassador there) saw him two daies after going to the church with the same countenance he had alwaies, with the same severity and granity, as if this victory had nothing concerned him, nor any thing chanced ftrange or vnexpected; fo ca pable was the great heart of that old fire of any fortune, were it neuer to great and his mind to fetled, as to secciue to great applause and rejoicing without moung. Within a few daics after, the Christian captives (before almost starved with hunger) were brought to the court:many of whom could fearce stand upon their legs some others for weakenes fell down and fainted and othersome died out right: they were all scornefully led in triumph, with their armes disorde. red and scornefully put vpon them; the Turks in the meane time insulting round about them. promising voto themselves the Empire of the whole world : and vainly asking, What spemy they were to feare, now that the Spaniard was ouercome. Alwarm, Sandes, as chiefe of al the prifoners, being brought into the Diuano before the Visier Bassa's, and demanded by Russan Bass fa. That it bescenned not him to judge theron; and himselfe to have done but his duty, with such faithfulnes as was meet to put in execution what he was commanded by his lord, although he had no good fortune therein. After that, he befought the Bassa's vpon his knee, to speake for him ento Solyman, for that he had at home a poore wife, with certain small children, for whom he requested him to spare him. Wherunto Rustan Bassa (contrary to his manner) courteously answered, his sourraigne to be of a mild and gentle nature, and that he was in good hope his pardon might be of him obtained : so was he commanded away vnto Caradines his castle, towards the blacke sea. But he was not gone far, but that he was called backe againe, for that the great Chamberlain, a man in great credit with Solyman, had not as yet feen him: for which cause he was fent for backe againe; wherwith he was not a little troubled, fearing left the Baffa's hauing changed their minds, would have put him to death. The rest of the captines of the better K fort were committed to the castle of Pera, and amongst them Don Sanchine de Leyna, with his swo bale sonnes, and also Don Billingerius Requesenes : which two great men, with Don Alnama de Sandes, were neuerthelesse afterwards with much ado and almost beyond all hope, at the request of the Emperour, and by the dexterity of his Embassadour, by Solyman set at liberty, although he had before denied them vnto Salwias the French Kings Embassador, who had bin an earnest intercessor for them. Yet before they were delivered out of prison, the Muphti or Turks great priest was asked his opinion, Whether it were lawfull, for a greater number of Turks to exchange a few Christian captiues (for the Embassador beside the rewards he had promised vnto the Bassa's to further the matter, had also vndertaken, that forty common prisoners of the Turks should be set at liberty for them) whereunto the Muphti answered, That the Do- Li Rors of their law were of divers opinions concerning that question, some saying that it was lawfull, and some not; howbeit as then it was by him resoluted vpon vnto the more fauourable part, and the exchange allowed.

There were among the prisoners taken at Zerbi, besides these noblemen of whom we have before spoken, two other noble gentlemen right honourably borne, Don Lohn of Cardona, Don Billinger his son in law, and Don Gasto the Duke of Medina his son, to whom yet but a youth his father neuertheleffe had given an honourable place in the army. Of thefe two Don Jahn had wifely taken order for a great summe of mony to be left in the Island of Chio, by the way as the Turks fleet went to Constantinople, from whence he afterward in safety got into Spaine. But Gasto was by Piall Bassa (vpon hope of a great ransome) purposely hid out of the way, M. which had like to have wrought his destruction; for Selyman having gotten an inckling therof by the infligation of Rustan, laboured for nothing more than to have Gaste found out, so to have a more just occasion for the putting of Piall to death, being taken tardy in so manifelt a fault. But all that labour was spent in vaine, Gasto being by death taken away, but whether by the plague (as some report) or by Piallhis meanes (as it were more like) lest the truth should he found out, is vacertaine. But certaine it was, that being with great care fought for by the Duke his fathers feruants, he could never be heard of more: fo that it was thought Piall for the lafegard of his owne life, not to have spared Gafto his prisoners life. Who neverthelesse Platin difference for a long time lived in great feare, and not daring to come to Constantinople, tooke occasion for along time lived in great feare, and not daring to come to Constantinople, tooke occasion for the solution of the solution for t with a few gallies to wander about amongst the Islands of Ægeum, as if he had there some to Conthing to do : but indeed fo fhunning the light of his angry Lord, for feare he should have been faminage. compelled in bonds to haueanswered the matter. Vntill at length he appealed at the request of Sulciman Baffa (the Eunuch and Solymans great Chamberlaine) and of Selymu, Solymans fon, granted him his pardon in these words well worth the marking, out of the mouth of an Infi-B dell Prince : Well have he from me pardon and forginenesse for so great an offence : but let Godthe most just renenger of all villanies take of him due punishment after this life. So fully he seemed to be perfuaded that no cuill deed ought to remaine without punishment, either in this life or in the

There was in this expedition a Colonell of the Turks well acquainted with Bubeauim the Emperors Embassador, then lying at Constantinople: into whose hands in that discomfiture of the Christians, by chance was come the Imperiall enfigne of the gallies of Naples; where one of the iminwithin the compasse of an Eagle, were contained the armes of all the Prouinces belonging prists ensured to the kingdome of Spaine. Which faire ensigne the Embassador understanding him to pur-sign redetests. pose to give for a Present vnto Solyman, thought good to preuent the matter, and to get it from from the matter, him: which he easily obtained, by sending him two sutes of silke (such as the Turks make reckoning of) for it; fo prouiding that one of the Imperiall enfignes of Charles the fift, should not to the eternall remembrance of that ouerthrow, remaine still with the enemies of the Christian Religion. This so miserable a calamity received by the Christians at Zerbi, made that Island, before little or nothing spoken of, to be euer since famous.

About this time to end this vnfortunat yeare withall, the 25 day of November died Andre- The death of as Auria (that second Neptune) being ninety foure yeares old: a man in his time of great fame, the mable An-and of the greatest Princes of that age had in no small reputation, but especially of Charles the fifth in whose service he did much for the benefit of the Christian commonweale, being for most part imploied in his greatest wars against the Turks and Moores. Yet amongst all the notable things done to his immortall glory, the kindenesse by him shewed vnto his natiue country was greatest; which oppressed by the French, he set at liberty; and when he might have taken upon him the fole government thereof (as had divers others before him) modera... ting his defires, and respecting the only good thereof, appealed the great diffention that had of long reigned therein, and established such a forme of government, confirmed with so good and wholesome lawes and orders (no mans liberty infringed) as that it hath ever fince to his eternall praise, in great wealth, state, and liberty, thereby flourished. Vnto whose remembrance (for that we have before of him much spoken in the course of this History) I thought it not amisse to joyne the lively counterfeit of his reverend aged countenance, by nature framed an-

Vnto which your petition we answer you, That from henceforth for the whole pace of eight yeares shall be betweet us on both parts to be continued anew, true, and firme league : of which agreement, peace, and confederation, Thefe shall be the conditions. First That B Jon our beloved shall be bound to fend yearely to our Court as a pledge of this league thirty thousand Hungarian Duckets, with that remainder which you owe unto us for the swo yeares last past: For which we promife unto you, that we from henceforth during this eight yeares league, will take no part either by way of hostility or friendship with King Iohns some, for a smuch as belongeth to his hereditary Countries, whether they be in the hither part of Hungary, or on the further fide of Teiffe: All which for all that, by G law of armes belong unto us. And the same King Iohns some in time of this eight yeares league shall be also bound in such fort to performe unto us his obedience, as that from henceforth it shall not be lawfull for him to vse any war or hostility against you, neither to trouble your subjects with five or sword, nor to surprise your Cities, Castles, or Townes; or by violence to take away or exact of your people or subjects, their sheepe, their cattell, their goods, mony or revenewes. We also our selves shall have no right, nor take occasion to drive away your people, to burne your countries, or carry away any captines : but rather in this eight yeares space religionsly keepe peace and concord with you. And under these conditions of peace shall also be comprehended Michael Balascus, Nicholas Bashor, with all their goods and territories, and diners other such like, which shall be subject unto you and King Johns sonne. To be briefe, if happily any of yours or King Iohns sonnes subjects shall have now before in time of warre thrust one another out H of his goods, lands, or post sions, whereof new quarrels or discord may arise; We well and decree, that all such controversies, quarrels, and claimes shall be deferred untill this definite sime of the league be expired. Beside, if by chance any dissention shall bereafter arise betwiet us about our jurisdiction, which can by no meanes be composed and ordered. We will that yours shall in the meane time remaine as yours, and ours as ours; all contention and enmity fet apart: also many Townes scienate here and there by Danubing and I atta, shall be suffered to wee the same law they did in former time; so that the souldiers which are yet in garrison in the Castle of Tatta, shall have no right to insest or vexe those towner seituate meete vino Danubius. Furthermore, if after this peace concluded, any of your Noblemen or Gentlemen shall fortune to have any of our Noblemen by renolt or other occasion what focuer, captives, they shall dismosse them and fet them at liberty, to returne unto their friends freely without hurt or ransome , that so the concord and peace begun betwixt us, may be the more firmely kept, and our subjects live in more security. All and cuery one of these things we grant and promise to be of us from henceforth untill the end of the aforefaid eight yeares, without all fraud or guile religiously observed and kept : and for that purpose have caused thefe our letters of this peace and confederation to be published from our royall pallace: and moreoner, have not onely provided, that the coppy of the same should together with our edict be proclaimed to all and euery the Generalls, Captaines, Lieutenants, of our armies both by fea and land, in all the parts of our Em. pire, and to all our mercenary fouldiers, but have also streightly commanded, that it shall be firmely and sincerely kept. This peace thus concluded betwirt the Emperour Ferdinand and Solyman, held firme vntill 1564. the death of Ferdinand, who about two yeres after in the yere 1564 upon S. James his day died, The death of being fixty yeres old: whereof he reigned as Emperor not full seuen yeares. In whose place the Emperor fucceeded Maximilian his son, before chosen King of the Romans. But immediatly after the death of Ferdinand, the Captaines on the frontiers of that part of Hungary which was holden New treables for the Emperour on the one side, and the Turks Captaines with the Vayuod of Transylvania on the other side, weaty of their ease, began contrary to the forme of the League, to sur-E prise strong holds and townes one in anothers confines, whereof ensued much trouble: The author whereof was Melchior Balas the Emperours lieuetenant in that part of Hungary which bordereth voon Transyluania, who sirst surprised certaine townes voon the frontiers thereabouts: in reuenge whereof, the Vayuod suddenly set upon Sackmar a towne in the Emperors Territory, which he tooke, and therein Balas his wife and children. In despight whereof Balas rancacked and burnt Debrezin a great Towne of the Vayuods But not long after, the Vayuod Solymans Vasfall, and aided by him with foure thousand Turks and three thousand Moldauians, did much harme vpon the frontiers of that part of Hungary which belonged vnto the Emperour; and first tooke Hadad, and afterwards besieged Vngar. In requitall whereof, Maximilian the Emperour sent Lazarus Suendi a valiant Captaine; who with an Army of F eight thousand besieged the strong Castle of Tokay, which he tooke the fift of February, in the yeare 1565; and after that tooke the rich Towne of Erden. In the meane time Solyman, who had in himselse fully purposed to be reuenged of all these injuries (as well appeared by that he did the yeare following) to flay the Emperour from proceeding further, vntill fuch time as he were at better leifure to be reuenged, (for as then he was making great preparation G The Taris pur for Malta) sent Marcus Liliness a renegat Transylvanian of Cibinum, his embassador to Max. imilian, to put him in remembrance of the league made with his father, and to with him to haue regard how he further proceeded to the breach thereof. Whereupon the Emperour because he would not seeme vinwilling to hearken to peace, commanded his lieutenants and captains no more to inuade Tranfyluania or that part of Hungary which the Turks held. Howbeit that whilest this Embassadour was thus intreating of peace at Vienna, the Bassa of Temesware in the borders of Transyluania, made divers incursions into the borders of Hungary, and with fix thousand souldiers besieged the strong castle of Iula, and the Turks in great num. ber came dayly into Transyluania. At which time also Suendi Generall of Makimilian his Forces vpon the frontiers, by messengers sent for that purpose, wished him not to give any credit to the Turks Embassadout, who meaning nothing but warre, winder the colour of peace fought nothing elfe, but to take him vpon the sudden vnprouided. Neither ceased these trou. bles thus, but dayly grew from euill to worfe : for in Iune the Transyluanians besieged Erden, before taken by the Imperials, and after two moneths fiege had it yeelded vnto them. In the meane time Chernouich the Emperours Embassadour to Solyman, returned from Constanting. ple; affuring him that the great Turke for all his faire showes of peace, meant indeed nothing but warres, for which he was (as he faid) making great preparation both by fea and land. Whereupon the Emperor began to raife new forces: which thing divers Noblemen both of Germany and other places hearing of, came vnto him with their followers: and among stother Romerus one of the Knights of Malta, and divers other of his brethren, with five companies of souldiers well appointed, sent thither by George Hochenheime grand Prior of that Order in Germany, and then confirmed one of the Princes of the Empire. At the same time also, the Turks being busie voon the borders of Styria, and the places thereabouts, were many times cut off by Charles the Archduke : who taking them at an advantage, flew at one time three thousand of them. Yet for all, the Turkes Embassadour was still at Vienna treating for peace, and so cunningly handled the matter, that whereas Eccius Salma a valiant Captaine, had corrupted the chiefe Judge with certaine others of Alba-Regalis, to have betraied the City vnto him; for performance whereof they had deliuered their wives and children as hostages, and he was now voon his way from Rab, which is but eight miles off, in an affured hope to haue surprised the City; he was suddenly by Letters in post from the Emperour, K called backe againe, for corrupting the hope conceined of peace : and fo was that notoble designement unfortunately disappointed : of which practife the Turks having knowledge, afterwards most cruelly executed forty of the conspiratours, impailing some of them vpon sharpe stakes, and hanging others upon yron hookes by the jawes untill they were dead. Shortly after the Turks tooke Neostat, which was not long after recoursed agains by the Em-

At the same time one of the Turks spies was taken at Zigeth, who but thirteen daies before was sent from Constantinople of purpose to view the strength and scituation of that place:he being brought before Charles the Archduke, and examined, said, That Solyman would assuredly the next Spring come in person himselse into Hungary, to besiege the strong castles ef Zi- L geth and Iula. At which time also County Serinus tooke certaine other of the Turks Spies, by whom he was certainely aduertifed of Solymans comming the next yeare; and amongst others, Scapher Vayda the Bassa of Buda his chiese Counsellor. Besides this, the country men contributors both to the Imperials and the Turks, were now streightly commanded by the Turks, to pay no more contribution mony vnto the Imperials: whereupon it was cafily gathered, that all that talke of peace was as Suendi had oftentimes written, nothing els but to delay the time, and to put them in security. Beside that, the Turks made incursions daily into one place or other of the Emperors territories, shewing their antient hate, and sowing by those light skirmishes, as it were the feed of a greater war against the next Spring : which the Emperor now out of doubt of (being also warned thereof by many Letters from his friends) put M strong garrisons into the frontier towns, especially into Rab and Zigeth. But knowing that to be but a poore helpe against so puissant an enemy, he resolued as his father and vncle had done before, to rest vpon the strength of the Empire, and against the next yeare to call a generall affembly of the Princes of the empire at Augusta, for the better withstanding of the common Enemy. The wars thus beginning again in Hungary, Solyman at the fame time in reuenge of the manifold harms don to his subjects by the Knights of Malta (whose hand he found ever against him in all his dealings with the other Christian Princes) made great preparation by fee and land, purpofing, as feemed by the maner therof; to have rafed the memoriall of those worthy men from off the earth. Wherunto, befide the naturall hatred which he bare against all Christians in general, and them about the rest in particular, he was much incited by Casta. Solyman prenes, Barbaruffa's fon, King of Algiers, and Dragat gouernor of Tripolis, by whose persuasion he master made raused a strong fleet to be rigged vp, commanding the lieutenants and gouernors of his ports and hauens at along & the fea. coaff, to put to their helping hands, and to be ready against the B next Spring. And not long after, vnderstanding partly of his own certaine knowledge, and partly by the relation of others, in what good forwardnes things were, hee calling together a great affembly of his chief princes and men of Warre, deliuered vnto them his mind as fol-

By these means our Ancestors obtained many victories against the Instidels in the Bast. Neither is it to be doubted, but that if we shall in the fethings toyn tagether, we shall also frustrate all the force and the negligent and floathfull, we must of necessity toyn unto them these helps, which both our profession and the negligent and sloathfull, we must of necessity toyn unto them the helps, which both our profession and H the course of war requireth : which partly consistes him our selves, and partly in the other Christian Princes. For victuall, armor, mony, and other such things as in wars are requisit, we will so prouide, that no man shall iustly complain that we spared either cost or pains. I will pour cout all my store, neither will I for defire of life refuse any danger. As for the Christian princes, I canot persuade my selfe that they will lie fill in fo fit an opportunity, and in fo great danger, not of our estate only, but much more of their own. Verily I wil not spare to exhort energ one of them both by letters and messengers which in part we have already don: and I doubt not but we shall have and enough from the Pope, the Emperor, and the king of Spain (fuch is their Christian Zeal) and they I hope strall move the rest. As for you, the Princes and very light of this facred Order, and the rest of our brethren, most valiant Knights, I am well assured journists fight for the most holy Christian religion, for your lives and goods, and for the glory of the Latine name, against a most cruell Tyrant, the rooter out of all true Religion, of all civility and good learning, the plague of the world, hated of God and man, as that he shall feel the sting of the Crosse, which hee so much contemneth, enen in the city of Constantinople, yearn his houses of pleasure. For we shall not have now to do with him in the Island of the Rhodes, far from the help of our friends, (from Asia, from Enrop, from Beypt inclosed with our enemies both by sea and land) but in the cies of Italy and Spain, in places strongly sortified, from whence the Enemy may easily be vircumuented. Which that it may so fal out let us not cease to pray unto almighty God, and to crave his ready help;

When the Grand Master had thus said, all that were there present promised with one as. sent, rather to lose their lines, than in any part to fail the Common Cause, or to fall into the power of Selyman. After that, publique prayer and supplication was made in every Church thorow the Island, and three Colonels chosen out of all the Knights : one an Italian, syrnamed Imperator, another Borness a French man, and Quarriss a Spaniard the third, all adviced men and most expert souldiers, which should with all diligence provide all things necessarie prepare gains and convenient for the War. By whose appointment the suburbs and trees which might any way be huttfull to the fortified places, were operthrown; the fortifications were thoroughly viewed, the Garrisons strengthned, and all manner of prouision most plentifully distributed: and Letters from the Grand Mafter fenr unto the Great Bishop and fundry other Christian Princes, requesting their aid against the Common Enemy. Messengers were also dismissed I into divers places, to certifie both the Knights of the Order and others, of the Turks great

Solymans Fleet departing from Constantinople the two and twentieth day of March in the departeth from year 15.65, kept a direct course soward Peloponelus, and so came to Methon; where Mastan pha Baffaone of the Turks greatest Captains, a man of feuenty five years old, and General of the land forces, must red the army, wherein were numbred seven thousand horsemen of them which are of the Turks called Spachi: out of the leffer Afia, conducted by the Gouernour of that country, and two: Lieusepanes of Cilicia, fine hundred : and our of the Island of Lesbos, now called Mory lang four hundred : he had of the lanizaries four thousand fine bundred, led by two Colonels appointed by Solyman, for that the chief Captain of the lanizaties (which M shey call the Aga)neuer departeth from the city but when the Sulran gosth himfelf. Besides thele was a certain kind of men among it the Turks, who live of the revenues of the Church, of them there was in the Army thirteene thousand, who had all at Constantinople vowed their liues for their superstition. Out of Thracia and Peloponesus were come two Colonels. and one Lieutenant, with twelue hundred horsmen, and 3500 Voluntiers out of divers Countries. There also Pial Baffa, Solymans Admirall, took view of the fleet, wherin were found an hundred and thirty gallies, two and ewenty thips for burthen, some greater, some lesse, befides one that was cast away neer unto Methone, where was lost 8000 barrels of pouder, 1 200 great thot, and 400 Spahi; Besides these, there were ten gallies from the Rhodes, commaunded by Halpport a man of 70 years; two gallies from Mitylene, and 17 galliots and other small pyrats thips. With this firong fleet the Turk's departing from Methone the 13 of May, arrived at The Turk's fleet Malta the 18 of the fame month, and put into a hauen in the North East part of the lile, cal- ainti as mailed by the inhabitants Marzafiroc : but perceiving themselves not to be there in safety, they removed to another port called Major.

The Island of Malta lying betwirt Africa and Sicilia, might be doubted whether it were Thedescription to be accounted in Africk or Europ, but that the antient colmographers and the Moors lan- 00 of Malia guage, which the Maltafes have alwaies vsed, claime it for Africke: it is in length from the North East to the South-West 20 miles; and in the broadest place 12. It regards Africk Southward, ouer against Leptis parva; and Sicilia toward the North, but more towards Pachinum than Lilybeum; and is in circuit threescore miles. It seemeth to take the name Melita of Mel or hony, wherof it yeeldeth plenty. The trees there bear fruit twice a year, & they haue oftententimes twice haruelt, especially of Barly and Cotton wool, yet is the Island in some places stony, grauelly, and bare of wood. Neuertheles it beareth figs, apples, Almonds, Grapes, and other fruit trees planted by the industry of man, Date trees also, but not fruitful: it beareth thistles of such bignes that the inhabitants vse them for wood. Fresh water is there wonderful scarce, and such wels as they have are filled with tain in Winter, for in Summer they are either clean dry, or els the water becomes brachy. The Inhabitants are so burnt with the Sun that they differ little in colour from the Ethyopians: they are of a wholfom conftitution of body, foare of dyet, industrous, rather painful than warlike, dying more for age than of ficknes. Their buildings, except it be in the city (which is in the midft of the Island) and fuburbs are long and low like vnto the Moors, covered with turf or reed. It is commonly fupposed that Saint Paul was by shipwrack cast vpon this Island : but it is with greater reason to be thought that it was the other Melyta in the Adriatick, betwixt Corcyra and Illyria, and better agreeth with that which Luke writeth of the Apostles trouble and shipwracke in the Adriatique, out of which fea it is not to be gathered by the Text that Paul and the rest were driven. But again to our purpose: That side of Malta which respecteth Sicilia bath in it many good harbors and commodious hauens fit for shipping; where besides the port Marzasiroc toward the East, where the Turks fleet first landed, and the port of S. Thomas, with another called Scala not far off, it hath two other notable havens, the one called Major, the other Marza Moxet, divided the one from the other by a narrow piece of ground, which with a ridge runneth in length from the South to the North almost in maner of an Island, having the hauen Major on the East, and Marza Moxet on the VVcst. Vpon the head of this high ridge standeth the castle of S. Elmo, of great strength both by nature and art. As a man entreth into the hauen Major, on the left hand are four promontories pointing far into the hauen on that fide, almost in maner of Islands, making so many Bayes. Vpon the first standeth the Gallows, wherofalfo it taketh name : voon the point of the second, on a rough and high rock standeth a most strong castle, called the castle of S. Angelo, where adjoineth the town, separated from the castle only with a wall and a ditch and is placed in a hollownes cut out of the main rocks firengthned also with the sea and the industry of man, and is of some called the Burg, of others the New City. In this Castle resideth the grand Master, and the souldiers in the Burg. Vpon the and promontory flandeth another flrong caftle, which they call also the Burg of The fourth promontory is not inhabited a from whence the fearunneth along ft the winding banks almost into the midst of the Island, vnto a place called Aqua Marsia. Again, after the port Marza Moxet, Westward is the port of S. George : and after that another called Bennorratithen followeth the port of S. Paul, no lesse than the port Marzasiroc. After which comes the port called Salinarum Sinus: but on that fide of the Island toward Africke is only one port called Milliaria. Neer to the Island of Malta lie cettain other little Islands;

as Gaulofa, now Goza, two other called Cuminia, and another called Piper, all subject to the G Tientecontrol that good of and respect to the control of

Thus much I have thought good to fet down concerning the Turks fleet, and for the defeription of those places wherein this great action was performed, the bruce whereif then filled the World. Now that it not be amisse in like maner to declare vpon what strength, now typto God, Valetta the Grand Master stood against so mighty and putssan an enemy, First, there was in the Island 1300 Mercinaries, some Spaniards, some French, some Florentines, and the rest of Naples: there were also 1000 seamen of the Knights, and 500 in the Town of S. Az. gelo, and of the country people which were fled into the firong places five thousand, men not altogether unskilfull of the wars. There were also fine hundred Knights of the Orders, besides Priests and Squires; for of these three forts of men are they which are called Brethren of the H Order. This was the number of them which defended the castles and towns of S. Elmo, S. Angelo and S. Michael; whereunto they were proportionably divided, and in the city it fell, which is called Melita, being in the middle of the Island, was 200 fouldiers and as many Citifens. with three hundred of the Country people all horimen, commanded by 10. Vagno a valiant Cantain. Besides this, euery place was furnished with plenty of victual; armor, weapons, artillery, and what soeuer els was needfull for the induring of a long siege, and a war that should want many things: and that which passed all the rest, minds armed with inuincible courage against what soeuer thould chance, which oftentimes maketh of the vanquished victors, All these things being in readines and orderly disposed, as soon as they understood that seuen and twenty of the Turks gallies had put into the hauen Marzafiroc, and were there landing their men; Gyon Admiral for the Order, a valiant and couragious Knight, marched thither with 500 harquebusiers, to have skirmished with them. But as soon as the Turks perceived them comming they retyred again to their gallies. On the other part where the other fleet lay, two hundred of the Turks going on shore, met by chance with Riverius a Frenchman, and eight Knights more, who having his horse killed under him, and one of his Companions slaine, fell with the rest into the hands of the enemy. Whilst these things were in doing, a certain Chris stian mariner fled out from the Turks to the City Melita, who discoucred the enemies purposes, telling them, That the Turks by the appointment of Mustapha had determined to have landed the greatest part of their forces, presently to have besieged some strong place; had not Pial Baffa the Admiral exclaimed against it, doubting to be left too weak at sea, saying plain- K ly. That he would attempt nothing before the comming of Dragut, who was every houreexpected. For Solyman had expresly commanded that they should do nothing without his aduice; fo great an opinion had he of his policy and valor. But whether this his report were The Turks for all that returning with their fleet to Marzafiroc, landed twenty thousand soldiers and five field pieces, and so intrenched themselves. This don, Pial Bassa with seuen hundred went to view the castle of S. Michael; but for sear of the great shot, duist They of the Ca. not come night it: nevertheles they of the town fallying out, couragiously skirmished with the Turks; in which conflict Curfelinus, syrnamed Parda, accompanied but with one Spaniard, so furiously assailed the enemy, that he took from him one ensigne, and slew one of the Sanzacks a great commander, with divers others. When Pial was come again to the Camp, L the General began to consult with the other Captains, whether it were better to lay siege to the Castle of S. Elme, or to the town of S. Michael. In conclusion it was agreed upon. That they should with all their forces besiege the castle of S. Elmo. And going up the hil to view the castle, they were incountred by the garrison souldiers, in which fight some sew were lost on both fides. Thus by degrees things growing hoter and hoter, the grand Master thought it good to certifie Garzias of Toledo viceroy of Sicily, how things stood, that he might the soner rig vp his fleet to come to their rescue. Wherfore he commanded one gally approut of the hauen by night; and to passe ouer into Sicily, with Salvague one of the Knights sent this ther on message. In the mean time the Turks cast up a mount to have battered the Castle of S. Elmo, and beaten the gallies in the hauen Major, and fo to haue opened away for their fleet M to have entredibut they were not able long to keep that mount; for they, had scarsly well ended the work, but that it was forthwith by the continual thundring shot out of the castle beaten down again, which thing greatly abated the Turks courage. About that time, ochial came to the fleet with fix thips, drawn out of them which were left for the defence of Alexandria. The Tarks beand inchem goo foldiers. The Turks beaten from their first mount, cast vp another on a high. By the Capta er crounds whereon they placed three great pieces of Ordnance, wherewith they annoised not only the haven wherin the fleet of Malta rid, but the castle of S. Angelo also, the Great masters fest; and with a rolling trench drow neerer and neerer vnto the Castle of S. Elmo: which althoughthey had at first in vaine attempted, hindred by them which were in the Castle, vet at last with much labour and trauell they brought it to perfection : for the Turks in that kind of worke) ftill performed by their multitude, are accounted to excell others. Wherfore in short time they planted their great ordnance in fuch fort, as that they might batter both the caffles of S. Blind and S. Michael. There was in the Turks camp a gentleman of Spaine, but then a flaugunto & Turke, who understanding the enemies purpose for the besieging of the castle of Summe by a Christian fugitive advertised the Great master thereof; whereupon he forthwith some Cerda and Miranda with two companies of Spaniards into the Castle, who were afterwards a great strength vnto the Castle, and hinderance vnto the enemy. At length came Dragus Gonernor of Leptis, long looked for of the Turks, with 13 gallies, and in them 1600 Digenteenes fouldiers: after whom followed tengalliots from Bona, and in them two companies. In the 10 aid the mean time Saluagus the worthy Knight (sent before into Sicilia) came to Messana, and having certified the Viceroy of the State of Malta, was by him commanded to return to Malta in a Galliot conducted by two gallies of the Great matters; which having brought him neer vnto the Island returned again into Sicilia : but he with his galliot (not without most manifest C. danger) in the third watch of the night brake into the towne through the middeft of the enemies fleet with the losse of but one of his followers. VV here having delivered vnto the great master what he had in charge from the Viceroy, he was the same night sent back again by the Great mafter into Sicilia, to certifie the Viceroy, That he had need of more aid, requesting him with all speed to send him some supply, whereby he might the better hold out against the force of fo great an enemy. Saluagus discouraged neither with the labour nor the danger. presently committed himselfe againe to sea, and in short time arrived in the port of Siracusa. where finding the two gallies we before spake of he sent them to Malta, as he had in charge. with 400 foldiers, among whom were divers Knights of the Order, and certain skilfull canoniers: willing them to thun the West part of the Island, wheras they must need scome into the D enemies fight, and to passe by the East end theros, which was farther about, but safer, & turming Southward to land in the port Miliare, and from thence by the low places of the Island to convey the foldiers by night to the city Melita, which was but four miles off; from whence they might easily passe to the castle S. Michael. This order taken, he went to Messana, and there declared to the Vicerov the danger of the war, with the small number of the desendants: requesting of him a thousand footmen, which with those already sent, he thought would sufface to hold out the fiege til he with his whole fleet might come to relieue them. But whilst these things were slowly prouided (which with much difficultie and delay could hardly be brought to passe, the Christian Princes as it were sleeping in so great a danger) the Turks vpon the fudden the third of lune affaulted the castle S. Elmo, in hope with short scaling ladders The Taylor affa E to get ouer that part of the rampiers which was neerest vnto the bulwark of the Castle. But faut s. Elmi. the defendants in the ditch (which before had no flankers to fcour the fame) had of earth and fagots made a large flanker from whence the castle also helping them, valiantly resisted the enemy, and filled the ditches with the dead bodies of the Turks. Who for all that, trusting to their multitude (wherewith rather than with true valour, they obtain so many victories) thrust still on wrill they had by obstinat force (although long first) gained the slanker: wherby they commanded all that part of the ditch toward the port Marza Moxet. In which place they with wonderfull celerity so fortified themselues, that they could not be hurt by the defendants. Wherin they were much holpen by their own great ordnance planted on the other fide the hauen Marza; for with it they draue the defendants from the place, beat downe the corner of the rampier, and battered the front of the bulwark, whose hight and greatnes troubled the enemy, but was not fo commodious for the defendants, for that it was made without any flankers. But night comming on, five thousand of the nine thousand Turkes which gave the affault, tarried there wherfore the Christians constrained to for sake the place, retyted into the Caftle. The Turks in the mean time coursed with the darknes of the night, with facks filled with tow and earth, filled up the ditch which was under the bulwark but neither of any G niled with the again great widenesse or depthywhich don they gaue a fresh allawin wherin acoust the manufacture any part lanizaries and part Spachicand besides them, many wounded, of whom the moshpartee pair latitaties and pass section, where they perithed and could not be tellound. Of the Chi. frians were loft 45 5 among ft whom were fine Knights of the Order, Guardampes an Aurignois Maline a Colonel of Narbona, Contilie a Spaniard, Somaia a, Eloseptine, and Neinee a Schman. The same night the Great Master thinking, as reason was, that they in the Castle Saint Elme might want help, fent two hundred of his Knights and as many other foldiers into the Gaffles who if they had bin more, together with the four hundred which were before in the Casile, might haply have driven the Turks both from the rampiers and the flanker, and also kept the place longer. But for a much as the Great Master wanted soldiers, and had therefore seat sale viges into Sicily for new supplies (as we have before faid) he in the mean time couragions? expeded their comming, refuting to labor or pain, yet bewailing fomtimes with himself the expected the christian Princes, by whose negligence so fit an occasion for the ouerthrow of the barbarous enemy was let flip. But about all things, hequistuelled exceedingly that no help yet came, especially those two gallies, which (as we have said) were in all halfe fent by Salvague. But they by the Masters desquit kept not the appointed course : For first. wheras they should have shunned the West part of the Isle, and have turned toward the East. they shaped their course Westward to the Island of Gaulos; the Master vainly affirming, That he faw certain of the Turks Galliots lying before port Meleria. Which was Afterward well known not to haue bin for the truth was that he for fear (whereby notable designes are many times frustrated) durst not go forward, Wherby it came to passe that the great mafler was disappointed of so necessary a supply ; which thing much griound both the Victory & others, but especially salvages. For he saw it would come so passe, that if the Turka should take the Caftle of S. Alma (the most affured bulwark and defence of the Island of Malta)the other places must of necessity be brought into extream danger; all the way to relieve them being therby shutvp. And that it might be taken seemed not to him supossible, the enemy having already taken one fort, and laying hard flege almost on every fide of that little pile. The due gonfideration of these and such like things grieved the minds of skilful men, especially seeing such slack preparation in a case requiring such present relief. Yet in the means time foldiers were taken vp at Rome by the commandment of Pius quartus then Bishop, to be fent to Melta. And by his example to stir vp other princes, he gaue too poundsof gold to Cambianus Legat for the Order, and commanded gunpouder and other necessaries for that War to be taken out of his castle S. Angelo, that so he might seem to be wanting in nothing that was in him to performe. Ouer these soldiers, in number 600, he appointed Pampeius Ca. lumna General; and commanded Camillus Medices his Legat to accompany him. With thele went many voluntary men, of purpose to lay down their lives for the eternising of their names in fo religious a war; and that with such an ardent defire, as that every little delay seemed a year unto them. Wherfore comming to Naples, they there found Iohn Andreas Anria with eleuen ships, the Prince of Populonia with nine, Lanicius with three, and three others let forth by other privat gentlemen. In these ships were imbarqued all those sootmen which I came from Rome, and so transported to Messana, where the Kings sleet was prouiding. But' whilest the Christians make slow preparation, considering the greatnesse of the danger, the Turks not ignorant therof, resolued to proue their vtmost, before the strength of the Christians were ready or drawn together. For the castle of S, Bling once taken, they assured themfelues with more case to cary the rest; for that therby they should first have the haven Marza Moxet in their power, wherin their fleet might fafely ride as long as they pleafed; and the rifing ridge betwirt the two hauens was commodious for them, both to batter the Towne of S. Michael, and to keep the hauen Major, so that none could without their leave passe inor out therat. Wherfore upon these and other such like considerations they began against batter the Castle of S. Elmo, as it had bin with thunder. Which furious battery they continued M by the space of four daies together without intermission. The night following, they suddenly with great force gaue an affault, and with their scaling ladders had almost gained the top of the wall. When the Christians desirous of nothing more than to come to handy blower, draue them down again with fuch violence, that never after they durst fet ladder to the Wall

until the very last conflict. Whilst things were thus hot at the castle S. Elmo, Draeuts soldiers upon a brauery, as if they had bin the only men, went to a place called Martia Scala, which is betwith the garlows & S. Thomas redected if they Would have don more than the rest which the Christians beholding out of the town of S. Angel, to represent heir insolencie sallied out woon them, and fo welcommed them, that they were glad after they had received great loffe. forthwith to retyre to the place from whence they came. Of the Christians were slain Bonnemius a Frenchman one of the Knights, and seven others.

The same time Monferratus was by the Great Master sent into the castle of S. Elmo, to com-mand there as Gouernot to stead of Froita. For that he with watching and pains taking in de-fence therof was fallen liek. The same Syolia had many times before written to the great ma-ster, that the castle was so wel sortified and furnished of all things needful, as that he thought it impossible to be won by the enemy; and had with cheerful speech and braue behausour (d) incouraged the Knights of other the defendants, that they fought against their enemies with more than mens drength and greater courage than is to be beleved. Neither were the Turks for that discouraged, although they were with great loss still repulsed; but for certain dayes battered the caltie with greater fury than before, and immediatly gaue an affault. For they had made a bridge over the ditch, of masts & fail-yards, of such a bredth, that ten men might go theron in rank, and had placed about the ditch 4000 harquebusiers, and brought all their fleet to S. Georges shore, not far from the castle. And when they had by the space of 18 days fore thaken it, & torn the wals with 13000 great thot, and were now in hope even prefently to An borrible C win the castic, see Heragerium a Biscane one of the Knights, and Medramu a Spanish captain. battery. with certain other valiant men, ranne to the bridge, and to the great admiration of the beholders opposed themselves against the multitude of the miscreants. The fight hand to hand was on both fides fierce and terrible; when now one of the Turks had advanced a Turkiff enfigne vpon the bulwark, which whilft Medranus layeth hand upon, and the Turk on the other fide firingleth to clear him felf from him, in striuing together they fel down both dead, shor thotow with one bullet by one of the Turks. At which time the 400 which we faid were but a little before fent thither by the Grand Master, stood in good stead; for seeing all brought to logrest a danger, fome of them (whilf other-forme fought with the enemy) thrush barrells of gapponder under the bridge; some cast down wild fire, stones, and what soener els came unto band, upon the entirty; and others farther off with their harquebules fore gauled the Turks, fo in thore time the bridge was burnt and blown vp, which in the fall therof our welmed 800 to Ture! Turks: the rest as they might retyred few whole, but most part wounded. In this conflict the flam. Christians pluckt down two enfignes, the one Mustapha's, the other Dragues, which the Turks had fet up yoon the very battlements of the walls. On the other part toward the South well a band of the Turks had got to the top of the highest rampier; which so foon as they in the castle of S. Angelo perceived, thinking to have beaten them off with a great shot, slew by chance feuen of the defendants upon the same rampier, as they were going to and fro. But to recompense that error at the next (hot they rent in funder four of the Turks Captains, with twelue other of their most forward soldiers. Whilst they were here fighting, other Turks in E the mean time had cast vo attench on that side of the castle toward S. Angelo; out of which they were quickly driven, with fire, stones, and other like things thrown down upon them by the defendants. The Turks valiantly on every fide retyred into the Camp, when they had in The Turks this affault lost two thousand of their best soldiers, and of the Christians stain almost a hon-rune. dred, and wounded as many. The same day Valetta the great Master perceiving the port Marza Moxet not to be very fireitly kept by the Turks, commanded a light Brigandine to be carried out of the hauen over land to the place called Martia Scala, that from thence hee might send into Sicilia. For he, as reason was, considering in what danger the castle S. Elmo stood, by letters certified the Viceroy and the Bishop of Rome therof, and of such things as were theredon, requesting their speedy relief. The copy of the letters sent to the Viceroy, I have F here fet down; as for those which were sent to the great Bishop, because they were almost of the same purport. I have purposely omitted.

To GARZIAS OF Toledo, Vice Roy of Sicilia, and Lord Admiralhof the Fleet, commence to continue the place of the war and it seemed The treat blafirst letters to the Victory of

Since the sime Gaulos; which I pray God be come unto your harded affect that when as mets her letters no musses came unto us from you, I commanded a man with single that to has it the flow who when be had certain nights attempted to go out and was at last got of the was fearly gon two miles, but he fan the Turks with might and main making after him; who in the flow of the little of the li the 1 were with might and main want of the sea, to for fake his body and by flight to faur bimself. Now the Turks having removed their fleet out of the port Vulsuenus, I confidering how much it conterneth to certifie you of those things which are here don commanded a Brig andine to be carried to Martia Scala for feing the Turks fleet is gon to another part of the I fland, I hope my Letters will without let in foot time come unto you. And the things I would have you to know are thefe : The fifteenth of this moveth all the Ene. mies fleet a little before night passed by this port (the comming on of the night hindered vi, that we could not well perceive the weakenesse theref) whilst the gallies almost unarmed were with much difficulty towed forth: want of water caused them thiesty to depurt out of the port Vulturing and perceive sure fear of your fleet. For as I hand heard, they have intelligence that 150 fail lye at road in the port of Mellana : for which cause also they have not put themselves into the port of S. Paul, but have placed their I fleet about the port Marza Moxet, get a good part of their gallies lie at the port S. George, 6 to be neever to their land forces : yet is not their noormet fuch but that if your fleet come upon the fudden abof will with the same fear vetyre to their fleet that this would if they were farther off. No man is now to bee feen at Vulturnus, for they have left their first camp at S. Katharines and Smitt Johns, having burn all the country villages, and now lie with their fleet as I have faid; and with their army at the castle S. Elmo. which God bath as yet kept, and as I hope will. Which thing it even for this to be hoped for which was but reflerday don , when as our most valiant foldiers by the help of God, for the face of four hours commonly oully indured a most terrible affault. The Turks having also made a bridge Westward toward the Part Marza Moxet, we have four times repulsed them to their great loffe, yet wat without some loffe also our part; among st whom Medianus a worthy captain was to my great grief flain. With the witter our mits & are fo incouraged, that I am in hope the castle may be defended with your comming, especially the Buemies battery not fo furiously now as before maimained. If I were relieved with certain companies of fielh foldiers or at least with those our two gallies. I would never think that this Castle could betaken from vis: in defence wherof, whilf we every hour look for help, we have frent both our men, and whatfocuer warlike proussion we had els. We are resolved, although it cost us all our lives, so go thither relying upon you, who as we hope, for your denotion and noble courage wil not be unmindfull of our health and welfare: But knowing the danger wherinto we must needs fall, if you shall defer to aid us, will send us out of hand some bands of men, especially when they may so easily be sent. For now that the Turkes are departed from the East part of the Island, our foldiers may be landed at the black rocks. Our lives lie in your hands on whom (next unto God) resteth all our hope. Wherfore we besetch you most instantly not to forsake visconunit. L ting our selues and all that ours is to your compassion and protection. Fare you well.

From Maltathe 17 of June.

These letters received, and the distres of the besieged castle perceived, the Viceroy was (as he rightly ought) greatly mooued, and made semblance as if he had bin desirous to have brought forth his whole fleet against the Turks. But forasmuch as the supply of ships from Genoa & Spain were not yet come, and that without them he thought it not good to aduen-For gallier feat ture the fortune of a battell, he forthwith fent Job . Cordona with four Gallies, wherof two were serclient Mak of Malta; and with Cordena joined one Robles Camp master, with a select company of Spa- M nìards, with whom went also about fourscore Knights of Malta, who stayed at Messana, awaiting some fit occasion to passe ouer. Amongst whom were these chief men of the Order, Parisot the Great Masters Nephew, Vincentim Caraffa, Boninscana, and Maldonatus, both Spaniards, Centim of Aquitania, and some others. Who although letted by tempest and other ocA casions, they came too late to Malta, as shall be herafter declared, yet served they in great flead; and had they come in time before the castle S. Elmowas lost, haply it might have been fil kept.

The Turks making no more account of so great a slaughter of their men, than of so many theep, desperatly renued the fight, as men resolued to indure all extremities. And first they most horribly thundred day and night with their great ordnance vpon the Castle : afterwards they affaulted the breaches with such a multitude and force, that if true valour and hone of immortality had not excluded al fear out of the hearts of the defendants, the terror of the affault had inforced them either to have fled or yeelded. Dreadful was the fight, and had they not bin obstinatly fet down on both sides, the one to win the castle, and the other to defend it, describbed that day had ended the quarrel. Five hours induced that most terrible assault; at length the fall. Turks repulsed by the valor of the Christians, retyred: yet did they not for all that passe the night following in quiet, but with their great ordnance did fo beat the defendants, that they had much ado to keep the Turks from scaling the walls: Which that they should not then dare to attempt, was with exceeding indeauour prouided for by the Christians of whom in this affault was loft 200, and of the Turks a great number. And Dragut himself, whilest hee there performed the duty both of a General and most valiant soldier, got a blow on the head District State with a stone, wherof he in two daies after died. His dead body was afterwards caried to Tripolis, and there honorably buried. The Commanders of the Turks Army stil more and more inraged with this valour of the C. Christians and slaughter of their men, gathering all their fleet together, commanded them to compas about the Castle, of purpose to give therunto their last assault with all their forces both by fea and land; and to fend new supplies of fresh foldiers one after another, untill they had taken the castle. Wherfore they with great industry prepared bridges, ladders, engins, armor, weapons, shot, and what soener thing els was needful for the assault. Which Valena perceiuing out of his castle S. Angelo, and searing (as meet was) lest they in the castle should not be able longer to endure so great a fury, called together in counsel his knights, two daies before the Tutks gaue their last assault; and told them, That they all as well as hee, saw in what danger they which defended the castle of S. Elmo were: and that he doubted not, but that every one of them, voon a godly zeal and compassion, was no lesse mooned with the slaughter and danger of their fellows and other their Christian souldiers, than with their own: wherfore he requested them to declare what they thought best to be don for their safety, yet so, as that hastily they should not determin any thing that agreed not with the antient valor and honor of their facred military profession. Which motion once made, and their opinions in brief deliuered, a Decree was made. That forafmuch as the Castle could not longer be holden, regard should be had for the safegard of them that were therin: for which purpose it was agreed, that 12 pinnaces should be fent to fetch them away. But before, three knights were chosen, who should in hast the night following go thither to tel them what was in the councel agreed vpon, & carefully to confider in what state the castle was; which if the defendants thought was to be abandoned, they should poison the water and cloy the great ordnance, that it might not E afterward stand the Turks in any stead. The three knights sent thither was Medina a Spaniard, Three Knights Rocca a Frenchman, and Conftantinus Castriot an Italian: who not without danger of death (bee little view the ing oftentimes (hot at by the Turks) got into the Castle, and declared vnto them that were site S. Elms. there in garrison, how carefull the Great Master and the rest were of them. And they on their fide first gaue thanks to the grand Master and the rest for the regard they had of them: and afterward concerning the castle faid, That if they considered the streitnes of the place, the small number of the defendants, and multitude of the enemy, they should wel perceive the danger they were in if the Turks should often with such obstinacy renue the assault: yet for asmuch as they had euer hitherto felt the help of God so present, who had stil mercifully defended them against the rage of the enemy, & wanted nothing needful for the defence of the place: the keeping wherof they had requested of the grand Master as an honor, although they knew right wel, it could not without most manifest danger of their lives be holden: yet would they for all that keep it to the last man; for that perhaps the like honorable occasion for them to thew themselves in should never again be offred:wherfore they had (they said) resolved there to spend their lines for Gods glory and the Christian Religion. The course of this life (they fined it were to be wished, that the life which is to nature due, should rather seem to be by vs franckly given to God and our countrey, than referred as natures debt: which if it should so happen, they would fo vie the matter; as that the barbarous enemy should have neither pleafure nor ioy, which should not cost him much bloud even of his best fouldiers. This they willed the knights to tell the Great Mafter, and to request him not to be too careful of them bur to promife to himselfe those things of them which best bescemed resolute men, especially of them who had vowed themselues to that sacred war. This answer of greater resolution than fortune, received; the three Knights, when they had diligently viewed the castle, returned to the Grand master: who calling to counsel his knights, and having heard the answer of thebefieged, would needs heare also what opinion the three knights themselves were of concerning the keeping of the castle of whom Castrior was of opinion, That the place was stil to be defended, and that if he were there to command, he would undertake to perform it; and there rather to lose his life than to for sake it, after he had once taken vpon him the charge therof. But Rocca the French knight was far of another mind, and faid plainly, that the place could not possibly be holden against so strong an enemy, and that if Iulius Cafar himselfe were aliue, and saw to what streight the place was brought (especially all the rampiers being either beaten down or fore shaken, and such a power of obstinat enemies lying round about it) he would never suffer fo many valiant fouldiers to be loft, but quit the place, and referue his men to further fernice: for why, it was the part of valiant men to performe fo much as was of men to be performed. but to strive to do more, was no manhood at all: wherfore he thought it best to do that which menvie with members mortified, whose recouery is desperat; in which case we doubt not to make a separation, so to saue the rest of the body with life. The Spanish Knight in most part agreeing with Castriot, said, That he thought it not good, that the place should so easily be forfaken first, for that the ditches and bulwarks were yet desencible; and then because he saw so great a consent among the defendants, and such a cheerfulnesse to with stand the enemy, which thing (as he faid) presaged victory.

These opinions of the Knights throughly in counsell debated, and every particular well weighed, it feemed good to the greater part, that they which were in the castile, should for certain daies yet hold it out especially because it was not the maner of the knights of the Order eafily to abandon their fitting holds, but rather to keep them to the laft, that even therein the K barbarous enemy might perceive with whom he had to do and fo fee his pride abated. For if they should have for laken the place, they might have been thought to have done it for feare: whereby the enemies infolency might have bin increased, and the honourable Order of those

But the Turks intentiue to that they had before determined, the 2 2 day of Iune affembling all their forces both by sea and land round about the eastle, in the dead time of the night on cuery fide fet up fealing ladders, made bridges, wrought mines, and with 3 2 great pieces of The Turks fu. artillery battered the rest of the wals yet standing, and presently gaue a most terrible assault. The defendant on the other fide beat downe fome, repulfed other, flew many, euer more carefull how to wound the enemy, than to faue themselues : and where he pressed fastest on, there L' to show their greatest valour. Great were the outcries made on both sides, mixt with exhortation, mirth, and mourning; the face of the whole fight was divers, vncertain, cruell, and dreadfull: and now it was the third houre of the day, when still the victory stood doubtfull; and had not the fury of the great Ordnance been fo terrible, that it now had beaten down all the wals vnto the very rocke whereon the castle stood, the defendants might for some longer time have endured the enemies force. But the very rock bared both of wals & defendants, and more than foure hundred flain, a man could now scarcely shew himselfe, but he was presently struck in pieces. Monferratus Gouernour of the castle, and Garas of Eubœa, men of equal valout, integr tie, and honour, were both flaine with one short for a short and transitory life made partakers of immortality together. Yet the rest which stood in defence of the castle, nothing ter- M I fied with fo great a loffe and flaughter of their fellowes, but augmented rather as it were with new courage from aboue, fought with greater force than before, ouerthrew the Turks entignes now fet up in the castle, flew the ensigne-bearers, captains, and colonels; now respething nothing more, but honourably to lay downe their liues for their religion and the obtai-faid) was but short, but that honor and fame was for ever : and whereas death is to all men pre-fourth Emperor of the Turks.

A ning of immortal fame. By this time the fun was mounted to the middle of heaven great was the heat, and men exceeding weary, the murthering (hot neuer ceased, and such was the multisude of the enemy, that he fent in fresh men in stead of them that were wearied or wounded. On the other fide, the small number of the Christians, and those weakned with labour. watching thirst and wounds, did what men might; yet at length were ouercome by a greater force. The caste of and to the castle by the Turks won, but with such slaughter of their men, that it was a wonder by the Turks. so many should be slain by so few. The defendants were all slain enery man in valiant fight.

Here may I not in filence passe ouer the inhuman and more than bribarous cruelty of the Turks, against the dead bodies of the slain Knights; that therby may appear, that cruelty never wanteth wheron to fhew it felf merciles, yea euen after death. The Turks after they had Barbarous crutaken the castle, finding certain of the knights yet breathing, & but halfe dead, first cut their the hearts out of their brofts, and then their heads from their bodies: after that, they hanged them vo by the heels in their red cloaks with white croffes (which maner of attyre they after an antient custom vse in time of war, as they do black in time of peace) in the fight of the Castles S. Angelo and S. Michael. And yet Mustaphathe Turks General not so contented, commanded them afterwards to be fast bound together, and so cast into the sea, whose dead bodies were in few daies after by the furge of the fea cast up in the hauen Major, and known by their friends. were by the commandement of the forrowfull great Master honorably buried. With which barbarous cruelty of the enemy he was so mooued, that he commanded no Turk should from that time be taken prisoner, but to be presently slain. And therupon all that were before taken were forthwith put to the sword, and their heads thrown ouer the wals on that side toward the enemy. From the beginning of the fiege to the taking of the castle, of the Christians were flain 1300, among whom were 130 of the knights of the Order, all worthy to be registred in the book of euerlasting Fame.

The castle of S. Elmo thus lost, Valetta although his mind (as he had good cause) was exceedingly grieued inwardly; yet made femblant otherwise, because he would not daunt his souldiers minds : telling them, That nothing was hapned unprouided for or unforeseen. This was (as he faid) the will of God, and the chance of war shat fomtimes one, fomtimes another should be overcome and that cowardife, not such valor as was in them that were gon gave occasion to living friends to lament. Tet that the Enemy was not for that to be feared, who had also received such a losse, as hee might thereby ra-D ther feem conquered, than a victorious Conquerour : whereas the loffe of his Knights was recompensed with honor and immortality, things of themselves sufficient to inflame all Noble mindes to behave themselves valeantly. As for himself (he said) that trusting not in his own strength, but in the help of Almighty God, he had not yet cast off the hope of victory over the reliques of the discomfited enemy of that he well hoped they were all of the same mind, wherein he most carnestly requested them to perfet to the end. When he had thus faid, he being a manarmed against all fortunes, withdrew himselfe a little afide; where casting many things in his troubled mind, he determined to fend letters to Petrus Mesquina governor of the city of Melita, to certific him and the Knights of the order that were at Messana, and the Viceroy, of the losse of S. Elmo. The copy whereof, because in them cuidently appeareth the Christian mind of him the Great Master, I have thought good here

Whilft thefe Knie het are festing forward, in the mean time chanced the miferable misfortune of the values Les-Caftle S. Elmo : which although it brought unto us that grief you may eafily imagin, yet for all that, territo the Goas if it had hapned by some secret appointment of God, have taken it in such part, that he as a most mer- usa. cifull father purposeth therby to warn vs but not veterly to destroy vs. Neither do I thinke it lawfull to doubt of his mercy and power. 'Tet for all that, I may nevertheles complain, That we are of them for faken, of whom it least befreemed. So that in the space of scuen and thirty daies, wher in our most valiant souldi-ers endured all the sorce of the enemy (which truly was don rather by the power of Goddhan of indu) wee were holpen of our own (which owe so much unto us) not so much as with the least help which they oftentimes might have fent unto us. But I life to afer the it, what focuer it is, to God, of whom alone do wee have hitherto received fo many good things, fo reft wein hope herafter to receive alfo. For for any thing that I can fee we must not now trust to man's help; for asmuch so wee could by no Letters, no deligente, no prayers, no admonissions, and to be briefe, by no commaunds mount them, who of all other ought most to bane obeyed it. The Shortnes of the time Suffreth ws not to write to the Piceroy of these chings it fall G be your part to certific both him and other our friends therof, who if they had abeyed our command, or at ded us with meuer fo fmall a supply of foldiers, baply we had not loft the castle of & Elmo, in destince wher. of we have spent the best part of our soldiers. Wher fore except the Viceron make hast to deliner us from of we name pent incory party that be caused in time come; but especially if we bec here besieged before the comming of those our small helps which we as in a dream have promised was our selves, and which we now scarse been will be in time prefent. For all that, we do not distrust of Gods lone and providence by whose divine infiration the rare courage of the Viceroy being shortly stirred up will hasten bit bee to relieur us . For all our welfare confifts in selerity. Our enemies having drawn all their fleet into the haven Marza Money are busied in clensing the castle and repairing the breaches, that they may afterward vestem the better a. gainst vs. Wherfore upon fight of these our letters, send unto us the capeains Catherin, Belcacat, Bel. th melt, and Zoricius, with their companies, that we may vie their valiant and faithful fernice. God of his mercy fendus aid from some place, and keep you. Fare you mell.

From our Castle S. Angelothe 24 of June, 1565.

Melquita having received these letters, commanded a Galliot forthwith to be launched, &c therin imbarqued Masiss Codonellus one of the Knights, to whom he delivered both the letters of the grand Master, and others of his own almost of the same purport, directed to the knights of the Order which lay at Messana, requesting him with all speed possible to passe over with them into Sicilia.

In the mean time Mustapha the Turks General sent a messenger to Valetta, and with him an fa fends meffen. old Spanish captain, with promise of liberty if he would go with his messenger to the Town. Great Master, to talk with Valetta concerning the yeelding up thereof, and to try if he would by any meanes come to agreement. Who comming to the town, the Turk still waiting at the gate, the Christian was let in and brought to the Great Master, to whom he declared what he had in charge from the Bassa. But so soon as Valetta heard of the name of composition and yeelding he was fo filled with indignation, that had he not bin a Christian, he would presently have comman. ded him to have bin hanged. Wherfore he gave him choice either to tarry fill in the town if he thought fo good, or els forthwith to return and tel his Companion, that if he got him not quickly packing, he would fend him farther off with a great shot. With this shormenswerthe Turk suddenly returned into the camp. Wherupon Mustapha fel into such a rage, that openly he protested, neuer from that to forbear any kind of cruelty against the Christians. There was then with Mustapha one Philip, one of the noble Grecian family of Lascara, who of a boy taken prisoner by the Christians in Patras a city of Achaia, & by them honestly & currently vied, was cuer after wel affected toward the Christians. He privy to certain of Mashabes delignes, by a certain divine motion thought hee should not a little profit the Christians by senolting vnto them : wherfore he resolved to fly to the Castle S. Michael. Which thing when be had often attempted, at length the first of July he cast himself into the sea (forby land he could se way escape) & swam to the castle, not without danger of his life, for discouered by the Turks, he was many times shot at both with their arrows and small shot. Hee brought to the Great E Master, reuealed vnto him many of the enemies secrets, and also aduised him what was to be don at the point of S. Michaels, to frustrat the enemies purpose for affailing that place; with many other things, which were vnto the defendants no small help, and afterward as often as need was, during the fiege, fought valiantly against the Turks.

Whilft thefethings were doing, Codenellus (fent as we have before faid into Sicily) came in fafety to Messana, where he found the Christian fleet not yet ready to relieue the distressed Maltrefes; for the Spanish ships were not yet come, and John Andrew Auria with eight and twenty ships was ready to return to take in four thousand footmen, which were taken up in Etruria by Capinus Vitellius. Which backwardnes the Knights of the Order confidering, and what danger was in delay, after they had wel debated the matter among it themselves, they see M folued by the power of God, by all means possible to help their brethren. And for this expedition chose two most fit Generals of their own fellows (the Commanders of Messana and Baroli) who forthwith went to Garzias the Viceroy, declaring to him what things the faced

A Knights of their Order had done, not for the King of Spaine only, but for the Christian com. The Knights of monweale, and also what great charge they had been at the yeare before in the Pinionian expedition, wherein they had neither spared ships, victual, nor munition, neither their own liues. 199. to profit the King and the Christian commonweale. Besides this, they besought him well to consider, that the losse of Malta concerned not the facred Knights only, but all Italy, and especially Sicilia, for the neernesse of so troublesome and puissant an Enemy. For these and other like reasons, which the shortnesse of the time suffered them not to rehearle, they requested of him 4000 footmen, with whom all the Knights of the Order which were there, and many other noble and voluntary men would make all possible speed to relieue the besieged, which they had before in vaine attempted; with which strength they were in good hope, if not to re-B pulse the enemy, or to recouer that was already lost, yet at least to stop & stay his further proceeding, vntill fuch time as he having rigged vp and brought forth all his fleet, might fet vpon the Turks, and (as was to be hoped) vanquish and disperse them. But whilst the Viceroy hauing heard their request, considereth what answer to make, a messenger came vnto him from Spaine, but with what command from the King (although men gueffed diverfly) could not be knowne. But yoon his comming, the Viceroy gaue the knights this cold answer, That he could The cold and not grant what they requested, for that in so doing he should disfurnish his fleet, and not be Viceroy to the able afterwards to relieve them as he defired : but if it pleafed them to transport the Knights Knights with part of the Bishops soldiers into the Island, they might so do with their own two gallies they had already, whereunto he would also joyne another of his owne. The Knights when C they could obtain no more accepted of that which was offered.
